Secondly. Bad company is a great hindrance to religion. Those that are companions of riotous men, that choose such for their companions, and delight in their conversation, they will certainly be drawn from keeping the law of God, and drawn to transgress it, Ps. cxix. 115.

Thirdly. Wickedness is not only a reproach to the sinner himself, but to all that are akin to him. He that keeps rakish company, and spends his time and money with them, he not only grieves his parents, but shames them; it turns to their disrepute, as if they had not done their duty to him; they are ashamed that a child of theirs should be scandalous and abusive to their neighbours.

8 He that by usury and unjust gain increaseth his substance,
He shall gather it for him that will pity the poor.

Note, First. That which is ill got, though it may increase much, will not last long. A man may perhaps raise a great estate in a little time by usury and extortion, fraud and oppression of the poor, but it will not continue; he gathers it for himself, but it shall prove to have been gathered for somebody else that he has no kindness for. His estate shall go to decay, and another man's shall be raised out of the ruins of it.

Secondly. Sometimes God in his providence so orders it, that that which one got unjustly another useth charitably. It is strangely turned into the hands of one that will pity the poor, and do good with it, and so cut off the entail of the curse which he brought upon it that got it by deceit and violence. Thus the same Providence that punisheth the cruel, and disables them to do any more hurt, rewards the merciful, and enables them to do so much the more good. To him that hath ten pounds, give the pound which the wicked servant hid in the napkin; for to him that has, and useth it well, more shall be given, Lu. xix. 24. Thus the poor are repaid, the charitable are encouraged, and God is glorified.

9 He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law,
Even his prayer shall be abomination.

Note, First. It is by the word and prayer that our communion with God is kept up. God speaks to us by his law, and expects we should hear him and heed him; we speak to him by prayer, to which we wait for an answer of peace. How reverent and serious should we be whenever we are hearing from, and speaking to, the Lord of glory!

Secondly. If God's word be not regarded by us, our prayers shall not only not be accepted of God, but they shall be an abomination to him; not only our sacrifices, which were ceremonial appointments, but even our prayers, which are moral duties, and which, when they are put up by the upright, are so much his delight: see Isa. i. 11. The sinner, whose prayers God is thus angry at, is one who wilfully and obstinately refuseth to obey God's commandments, who will not so much as give them the hearing, but causeth his ear to decline the law, refuseth when God calls; God will justly refuse him when he calls: see ch. i. 24, 28.

10 Whoso causeth the righteous to go astray in an evil way,
He shall fall himself into his own pit:
But the upright shall have good things in possession.

Here is, First. The doom of seducers, that attempt to draw good people, or those that profess to be such, into sin and mischief; that would take a pride in causing "the righteous to go astray in an evil way," in drawing them into a snare, that they may insult over them. They shall not gain their point; it is impossible to deceive the elect, but they shall fall themselves into their own pit, and, having been not only sinners, but tempters, not only unrighteous, but enemies to the righteous, their condemnation will be so much the greater, Mat. xxiii. 14, 15.

Secondly. The happiness of the sincere. They shall not only be preserved from the evil way which the wicked would decoy them into, but they "shall have good things," the best things, "in possession," the graces and comforts of God's Spirit, besides what they have in reversion.

11 The rich man is wise in his own conceit;
But the poor that hath understanding searcheth him out.

Note, First. Those that are rich are apt to think themselves wise, because, whatever else they are ignorant of, they know how to get and save; and they that are purse-proud expect all they say should be regarded as an oracle, and a law, and that none should dare to contradict them, but every sheaf bow to theirs. This humour is fed by flatterers, who, because (like Jezebel's prophets) they are fed at their table, cry up their wisdom.

Secondly. Those that are poor often prove themselves wiser than they. A poor man who has taken pains to get wisdom, having no other way (as the rich man has) to get a reputation, he searcheth him out, and makes it to appear he is not such a scholar, nor such a politician as he is taken to be. See how variously God dispenseth his gifts, to some he gives wealth, to others wisdom; and it is easy to say which of these is the best gift, which we should covet most earnestly.

12 When righteous men do rejoice, there is great glory:
But when the wicked rise, a man is hidden.

Note, First. The comfort of the people of God is the honour of the nation in which they live. There is a great glory dwelling in a land when the righteous do rejoice; that is, when they have their liberty, the free exercise of their religion, and are not persecuted, when the government countenanceth them, and speaks comfortably to them, when they prosper and grow rich, and much more when they are preferred and employed, and have power put into their hands.

Secondly. The advancement of the wicked is the eclipsing of the beauty of a nation. "When the wicked rise" and get head, they make head against all that is sacred, and then "a man is hidden," a good man is thrust into obscurity, is necessitated to abscond for his own safety. Corruptions prevail so generally, that, as in Elijah's time, there seem to be no good men left, the wicked walk so thick on every side.

13 He that covereth his sins shall not prosper:
But whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy

Here is, First. The folly of indulging sin, of palliating and excusing it, denying or extenuating it, diminishing it, dissembling it, or throwing the blame of it upon others. "He that" thus "covereth his sins shall not prosper," let him never expect it. He shall not succeed in his endeavour to cover his sin, for it will be discovered sooner or later. "There is nothing hid which shall not be revealed," "a bird of the air shall carry the voice;" murder will out, and so will other sins. He shall not prosper, that is, he shall not obtain the pardon of his sin, nor can he have any true peace of conscience. David owns himself in a constant toss while he covered his sins, Ps. xxxii. 3, 4. While the patient conceals his distemper he cannot expect a cure.

Secondly. The benefit of parting with it, both by a penitent confession and a universal reformation. He that confesseth his guilt to God, and is careful not to return to sin again, he shall find mercy with God, and shall have the comfort of it in his own bosom. His conscience shall be eased, and his ruin prevented:

The margin of our Bibles has, "A great man grieveth all, and he hireth the fool, he hireth also transgressors;" and a similar rendering is advocated by some recent expositors.

xxvi. 14. The hinges of ancient doorways consisted of a prolongation of the inner edge of the door, which so turned in sockets at the top and bottom. Literally speaking, therefore, the door turned upon pivots, and it appears the same custom is still continued in the East.

xxvi. 23. It is not so much a potsherd as an earthen vessel which is here supposed to have been overlaid or plated with silver dross. The dross of silver is necessarily an inferior or base metal, containing but a small portion of silver. The idea is that the ardent words of a man whose soul is deceitful are like a piece of pottery covered with silver dross—genuine in appearance, but spurious in reality.

xxvi. 28. Others render this, "A lying tongue hates a humble man, and a flattering mouth hates a reprover;" or, "A humble man hates a lying tongue, and a reprover hates a flattering mouth."

see 1 Jno. i. 9; Jer. iii. 12, 13. When we set sin before our face, (as David, "My sin is ever before me,") God casts it behind his back.

14 Happy is the man that feareth alway:
But he that hardeneth his heart shall fall into mischief.

Here is, First. The benefit of a holy caution. It sounds strange, but it is very true, "Happy is the man that feareth alway." Most people think, happy they that never fear; but there is a fear which is so far from having torment in it, that it has in it the greatest satisfaction. Happy is the man that always keeps up in his mind a holy awe and reverence of God, his glory, goodness, and government; that is always afraid of offending God, and incurring his displeasure; that keeps conscience tender, and has a dread of the appearances of evil; that is always jealous of himself, and distrustful of his own sufficiency; and lives in expectations of troubles and changes, so that whenever they come they are no surprise to him. He that keeps up such a fear as this will live a life of faith and watchfulness, and therefore happy is he, blessed and holy.

Secondly. The danger of a sinful presumption. "He that hardeneth his heart," that mocketh at fear, and sets God and his judgments at defiance, and receives not the impressions of his word or rod, he "shall fall into mischief;" his presumption will be his ruin, and whatever sin (which is the greatest mischief) he falls into, it is owing to the hardness of his heart.

15 As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear;
So is a wicked ruler over the poor people.

It is written indeed, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people;" but if he be a wicked ruler that oppresseth the people, especially the poor people, robbing them of the little they have, and making a prey of them, whatever we may call him, this scripture calls him "a roaring lion, and a ranging bear."

First. In respect of his character. He is brutish, and barbarous, and bloodthirsty; he is rather to be put among the beasts of prey, the wildest and most savage, than to be reckoned of that noble rank of beings whose glory is reason and humanity.

Secondly. In respect of the mischief they do to their subjects. They are dreadful as the roaring lion who makes the forest tremble; they are devouring as a hungry bear; and the more necessitous they are, the more mischief they do, and the more greedy of gain they are.

16 The prince that wanteth understanding is also a great oppressor:
But he that hateth covetousness shall prolong his days.

Two things are here intimated to be the causes of the maladministration of princes:

First. The love of money, that root of all evil; for hating covetousness here stands opposed to oppression, according to Moses' character of good magistrates, men fearing God and hating covetousness, Ex. xviii. 21; not only not being covetous, but hating it, and shaking the hands from holding of bribes. A ruler that is covetous will neither do justly nor love mercy, but the people under him shall be bought and sold.

Secondly. Want of consideration. He that hates covetousness shall prolong his government and peace; shall be happy in the affections of his people, and the blessings of his God. It is as much the interest as duty of princes to reign in righteousness; oppressors, therefore, and tyrants, are the greatest fools in the world; they want understanding, they do not consult their own honour, ease, and safety, but sacrifice all to their ambition of an absolute and arbitrary power. They might be much happier in the hearts of their subjects than in their necks or estates.

17 A man that doeth violence to the blood of any person Shall flee to the pit; let no man stay him.

This agrees with that ancient law, "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," Gen. ix. 6, and speaks,

First. The doom of the shedder of blood. He that has committed murder, though he flies for his life, shall be continually haunted with terrors, shall himself flee to the pit, betray himself, and torment himself, like Cain, who when he had killed his brother became a fugitive and a vagabond, and trembled continually.

Secondly. The duty of the avenger of blood. Whether the magistrate, or the next of kin, or whoever are concerned in making inquisition for blood, let them be close and vigorous in the prosecution, and let it not be bought off. They that acquit the murderer, or do any thing to help him off, come in sharers in the guilt of blood, nor can the land be purged from blood, but by the blood of him that shed it, Num. xxxv. 33.

18 Whoso walketh uprightly shall be saved:
But he that is perverse in his ways shall fall at once.

Note, First. Those that are honest are always safe. He that acts with sincerity, that speaks as he thinks, has a single eye in every thing at the glory of God, and the good of his brethren; that would not for a world do an unjust thing if he knew it; that in all manner of conversation walks uprightly, he shall be saved hereafter. We find a glorious company of those in whose mouth was found no guile, Rev. xiv. 5. They shall be safe now, integrity and uprightness will preserve men, will give them a holy security in the worst of times; for it will preserve their comfort, their reputation, and all their interests; they may be injured, they cannot be hurt.

Secondly. Those that are false and dishonest are never safe. "He that is perverse in his ways," that thinks to secure himself by fraudulent practices, by dissimulation and treachery, or by an estate ill got, he "shall fall," nay, he "shall fall at once," not gradually, and with warning given, but suddenly, without previous notice, for he is least safe when he is most secure. He falls at once, and so has neither time to guard against his ruin nor to provide for it; and, being a surprise upon him, it will be so much the greater terror to him.

19 He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread:
But he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough

Note, First. Those that are diligent in their callings take the way to live comfortably. "He that tills his land," and attends his shop, and minds his business, whatever it is, he "shall have plenty of bread," of that which is necessary for himself and his family, and with which he may be charitable to the poor; "he shall eat the labour of his hands."

Secondly. Those that are idle, and careless, and company keepers, though they indulge themselves in living (as they think) easily and pleasantly, they take the way to live miserably. "He that hath land, and values himself upon that, but doth not till it, neglects his business, will not take pains, but "follows after vain persons," drinks with them, joins with them in their frolics and vain sports, and idles away his time with them, he "shall have poverty enough," shall be satiated, or replenished with poverty, so the word is; he takes those courses which lead so directly to it, that he seems to court it, and he shall have his belly full of it.

20 A faithful man shall abound with blessings:
But he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent.

Here, First. We are directed in the true way to be happy, and that is to be holy and honest. He that is faithful to God and man, shall be blessed of the Lord; and he "shall abound with blessings" of the upper and nether springs. Men shall praise him, and pray for him, and be ready to do him any kindness; he shall abound in doing good, and shall himself be a blessing to the place where he lives. Usefulness shall be the reward of faithfulness, and it is a good reward.

Secondly. We are cautioned against a false and deceitful way to happiness, and that is, right or wrong, raising an estate presently. Say not, that is the way to abound with blessings, for "he that maketh haste to be rich," more haste than good speed, he "shall not be innocent," and if he be not, he shall not be blessed of God, but rather bring a curse upon what he has; nor if he be not innocent, can he long be easy to himself. He shall not be accounted innocent by his neighbours, but shall have their ill-will and ill-word. He doth not say he cannot be innocent, but there is all the probability in the world he will not prove so; he that hasteth with his feet sinneth, stumbleth, falleth. Seo quæ reverentia legum, quis metus, aut pudor, est unquam properantis avari?—'What reverence for law, what fear, what shame, was ever indicated by an avaricious man hasting to be rich?'

21 To have respect of persons is not good:
For for a piece of bread that man will transgress.

Note, First. It is a fundamental error in the administration of justice, and that which cannot but lead men to abundance of transgression, to consider the parties concerned, more than the merits of the cause; so as to favour one because he is a gentleman, a scholar, my countryman, my old acquaintance, has formerly done me a kindness, or may do me one, or is of my party, and persuasion. And to bear hard on the other party, because he is a stranger, a poor man, has done me an ill turn; is or has been my rival, or is not of my mind, or has voted against me. Judgment is perverted when any consideration of this kind is admitted into the scale, any thing but pure right.

Secondly. Those that are partial will be paltry; that have once broken through the bonds of equity, though at first it must be some great bribe, some noble present, that would bias them, yet when they have debauched their consciences, they will at length be so sordid, that for a piece of bread they will give judgment against their consciences; they will rather play at small games than sit out.

22 He that hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye,
And considereth not that poverty shall come upon him.

Here again Solomon shews the sin and folly of those that will be rich. They are resolved they will be so, per fas, per nefas,—'right or wrong;' they will be so with all speed; they are riding tantivy into an estate.

First. They have no comfort in it, they have an evil eye; that is, they are always grieving at those that have more than they, and always grudging their necessary expenses; because they think the former keeps them from seeming rich, the latter from being so, and between both they must needs be perpetually uneasy.

Secondly. They have no assurance of the continuance of it, and yet take no thought to provide against the loss of it. Poverty shall come upon them, and the riches which they made wings for, that they might fly to them, will make themselves wings to fly from them; but they are secure and improvident, and do not consider this, that while they are making haste to be rich, they are really making haste to be poor, else they would not trust to uncertain riches.

23 He that rebuketh a man
Afterwards shall find more favour
Than he that flattereth with the tongue.

Note, First. Flatterers may please those for a time who, upon second thoughts, will detest and despise them. If ever they come to be convinced of the evil of those sinful courses they were flattered in, and to be ashamed of that pride and vanity which was humoured and gratified by those flatteries, they will hate the fawning flatterers, as having had an ill design upon them, and the fulsome flatteries, as having had an ill effect upon them, and being become nauseous.

Secondly. Reprovers may displease those at first who yet afterwards, when the passion is over, and the bitter physic begins to work well, will love and respect them. He that deals faithfully with his friend, in telling him of his faults, though he may put him into some heat for the present, and perhaps have hard words instead of thanks for his pains, yet afterwards he will not only have the comfort in his own bosom of having done his duty, but he also whom he reproved will acknowledge that it was a kindness; will conceive an opinion of his wisdom and faithfulness, and look upon him as fit to be a friend. He that cries out against his surgeon for hurting him when he is searching his wound, yet will pay him well, and thank him too, when he has cured it.

24 Whoso robbeth his father or his mother,
And saith, It is no transgression;
The same is the companion of a destroyer.

As Christ shews the absurdity and wickedness of those children who think it is no duty in some cases to maintain their parents, Mat. xv. 5. so Solomon here shews the absurdity of those who think it is no sin to rob their parents, either by force or secretly, by wheedling them or threatening them, or by wasting what they have, and (which is no better than robbing them) running into debt, and leaving them to pay it. Now,

First. This is commonly made light of by untoward children; they say, "It is xxvii. 9. The first words are literally "oil and incense;" but it is clear that the allusion is to fragrant oils, perfumes, and other such preparations, which were very numerous, and much coveted among the nations of antiquity, and were used alike in religious ceremonies and for personal delectation. The word "sweetness" here is fairly understood of the agreeable discourse of one's friend. (Compare Psa. xix. 10, and cxix. 103.)

xxvii. 14. Ostentatious demonstrations of friendship excite suspicion, and even when genuine may, by envy, be turned into a reproach. The very objects of this respect may learn to distrust those who pay it, and count them flatterers.

xxvii. 16. Literally the second clause is, "and the oil of his right hand will call." If a man holds perfumed oil in his right hand, it will declare its presence by the scent it exhales, and can be no more hidden than the wind. The old word "bewray" means to betray or reveal.

no transgression," for it will be their own shortly. Their parents can well enough spare it, they have occasion for it, they cannot live as gentlemen upon the allowance their parents give them, which they complain of as too strait; with such excuses as these they endeavour to shift off the conviction. But,

Secondly. How light soever an ungoverned youth makes of it, it is really a very great sin. He that doth it "is the companion of a destroyer," no better than a robber on the highway. What wickedness will he stick at that will rob his own parents?

25 He that is of a proud heart stirreth up strife:
But he that putteth his trust in the LORD shall be made [fat.

Note, First. Those make themselves lean, and continually unquiet, that are haughty and quarrelsome; for they are opposed to those that shall be made fat. "He that is of a proud heart," that is conceited of himself, and looks with a contempt upon all about him, that cannot bear either competition or contradiction, he "stirs up strife," makes mischief, and creates disturbance to himself and everybody else.

Secondly. These make themselves fat, and always easy, that live in a continual dependence upon God and his grace. "He that putteth his trust in the Lord," that, instead of struggling for himself, commits his cause to God; he "shall be made fat," he saves the money which others spend upon their pride and contentiousness, he enjoys himself, and has abundant satisfaction in his God, and thus his soul dwells at ease, and he is most likely to have plenty of outward good things. None live so easily, so pleasantly, as those that live by faith.

26 He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool:
But whoso walketh wisely, he shall be delivered.

Here is, First. The character of a fool: He trusts to his own heart, to his own wisdom and counsels, his own strength and sufficiency, his own merit and righteousness, and the good opinion he hath of himself. He that doth so is a fool, for he trusts to that not only which is deceitful above all things, Jer. xvii. 9, but which has many a time deceived him; this implies that it is the character of a wise man, as before, ver. 25, to put his trust in the Lord, and in his power and promise, and to follow his conduct, ch. iii. 5, 6.

Secondly. The comfort of a wise man: He "that walks wisely," that trusts not to his own heart, but is humble, and self-diffident, and goes on in the strength of the Lord God, "he shall be delivered," when the fool that trusts in his own heart shall be destroyed.

27 He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack:
But he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse.

Here is, First. A promise to the charitable: "He that gives to the poor" shall himself be never the poorer for so doing, he "shall not lack;" if he have but little, and so be in danger of lacking, let him give out of his little, and that will prevent it from coming to nothing. As the bounty of the widow of Sarepta to Elijah, for whom she made a little cake first, saved what she had when it was reduced to a handful of meal. If he have much, let him give much out of it, and that will prevent its going less; he and his shall not want what is given in pious charity. What we gave we have.

Secondly. A threatening to the uncharitable. "He that hideth his eyes," that he may not see the miseries of the poor, nor read their petitions, lest his eye should affect his heart, and extort some relief from him, he "shall have many a curse," both from God and man; and neither causeless, and therefore they shall come. Woful is the condition of that man that has the word of God and the prayers of the poor against him.

28 When the wicked rise, men hide themselves:
But when they perish, the righteous increase.

This is to the same purpose with what we had, ver. 12.

First. When ill men are preferred, that which is good is clouded and run down. When power is put into the hands of the wicked, "men hide themselves;" wise men retire into privacy, and decline public business, not caring to be employed under them. Rich men get out of the way, for fear of being squeezed for what they have; and, which is worst of all, good men abscond, despairing to do good, and fearing to be persecuted and ill-treated.

Secondly. When ill men are displaced, degraded, and their power taken from them, then that which is good revives again, then "the righteous increase;" for "when they perish," good men will be put in their room that will by their example and interest countenance religion and righteousness. It is well with a land when the number of good people increaseth in it; and it is therefore the policy of all princes, states, and potentates to encourage them, and to take special care of the good education of youth.

CHAPTER XXIX.

HE, that being often reproved hardeneth his neck,
Shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy

Here, First. The obstinacy of many wicked people in a wicked way is to be greatly lamented. They are often reproved by parents and friends, by magistrates and ministers, by the providence of God, and by their own consciences; have had their sins set in order before them, and fair warning given them of the consequences of them, but all in vain; they harden their necks, perhaps they fling away and will not so much as give the reproof a patient hearing, or if they do, yet they go on in the sins for which they are reproved; they will not bow their necks to the yoke, but are children of Belial, they refuse reproof, ch. x. 17; despise it, ch. v. 12; hate it, ch. xii. 1.

Secondly. The issue of this obstinacy is to be greatly dreaded. They that go on in sin in despite of admonition, they shall be destroyed; those that will not be reformed must expect to be ruined; if the rods answer not the end, expect the axes. They "shall be suddenly destroyed" in the midst of their security, "and without remedy;" they have sinned against the preventing remedy, and therefore let them not expect any recovering remedy. Hell is remediless destruction; they "shall be destroyed," 'and no healing,' so the word is. If God wounds, who can heal?

2 When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice:
But when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn.

This is what was said before, ch. xxviii. 12, 28.

First. The people will have cause to rejoice or mourn according as their rulers are righteous or wicked; for, if the righteous be in authority, sin will be punished and restrained, religion and virtue will be supported, and kept in reputation. But if the wicked get power in their hands wickedness will abound religion and religious people will be prosecuted, and so the ends of government will be perverted.

Secondly. The people will rejoice or mourn according as their rulers are righteous or wicked. Such a conviction are even the common people under of the excellency of virtue and religion, that they will rejoice when they see it preferred and countenanced; and, on the contrary, let men have never so much honour and power, if they be wicked, and vicious, and use it ill, they make themselves contemptible, and base before all the people, as those priests, Mal. ii. 9. And subjects will think themselves miserable under such a government.

3 Whoso loveth wisdom rejoiceth his father:
But he that keepeth company with harlots spendeth his substance.

Both the parts of this verse repeat what had been often said, but, comparing them together, the sense of them will be enlarged from each other.

First. Be it observed, to the honour of a virtuous young man, that he loves wisdom; he is a philosopher, (for that signifies a lover of wisdom,) for religion is the best philosophy. He avoids ill company, and especially the company of lewd women; hereby he rejoiceth his parents, and hath the satisfaction of being a comfort to them, and increaseth his estate, and is like to live comfortably.

Secondly. Be it observed, to the reproach of a vicious young man, that he hates wisdom; he keeps company with scandalous women, that will be his ruin, both soul and body. He grieves his parents, and, like the prodigal son, devours their living with harlots. Nothing will beggar men sooner than the lusts of uncleanness, and the best preservative from those ruinous lusts is wisdom.

4 The king by judgment establisheth the land:
But he that receiveth gifts overthroweth it.

Here is, First. The happiness of a people under a good government. The care and business of a prince should be to establish the land, to maintain its fundamental laws, to settle the minds of his subjects, and make them easy, to secure their liberties and properties from hostilities, and for posterity, and to set in order the things that are wanting. This he must do by judgment, by wise counsels, and by the steady administration of justice, without respect of persons, which will have these good effects.

Secondly. The misery of a people under a bad government. 'A man of oblations,' so it is in the margin, overthrows the land, a man that is either sacrilegious, or superstitious, or invades the priest's office, as Saul and Uzziah; or, a man that aims at nothing but getting money, and will for a good bribe connive at the most guilty, and in hope of one prosecute the innocent. Such governors as these will ruin a country.

5 A man that flattereth his neighbour
Spreadeth a net for his feet.

Those may be said to flatter their neighbours, who commend and applaud that good in them, the good they do, or the good they have, which really either is not, or is not such as they represent it, and who profess that esteem and affection for them which really they have not; these spread a net for their feet.

First. For their neighbour's feet whom they flatter. They have an ill design in it, they would not speak them thus fair but that they hope to make a hand of them; and it is therefore wisdom to suspect those who flatter us, that they are secretly laying a snare for us, and stand on our guard accordingly. Or, it has an ill effect on those who are flattered, it puffs them up with pride, and makes them conceited and confident of themselves, and so proves a net that entangles them in sin.

Secondly. For their own feet, so some understand it. He that flatters others, in expectation they will return his compliments, and flatter him, doth but make himself ridiculous and odious, even to those he flatters.

6 In the transgression of an evil man there is a snare:
But the righteous doth sing and rejoice.

Here is, First. The peril of a sinful way. There is not only a punishment at the end of it, but a snare in it; one sin is a temptation to another, and there are troubles which as a snare come suddenly upon evil men, in the midst of their transgressions; nay, their transgression itself often involves them in vexations, their sin is their punishment, and they are "holden in the cords of their own iniquity," ch. v. 22.

Secondly. The pleasantness of the way of holiness. The snare that is in the transgression of evil men spoils all their mirth; but righteous men are kept from those snares, or delivered out of them, they walk at liberty, walk in safety, and therefore they sing and rejoice. They that make God their chief joy have him for their exceeding joy; and it is their own fault if they do not rejoice evermore. If there be any true joy on this side heaven, doubtless they have it whose conversation is in heaven.

7 The righteous considereth the cause of the poor:
But the wicked regardeth not to know it.

It is pity but that every one that sues sub forma pauperis,—'as a pauper, should have an honest cause, (they are of all other inexcusable, if they have not,) because the Scripture has so well provided, that it should have a fair hearing; and that the judge himself should be of counsel, as for the prisoner so for the pauper.

First. It is here made the character of a righteous judge, that he "considereth the cause of the poor." It is every man's duty to consider the poor, Ps. xli. 1; but the judgment of the poor is to be considered by those that sit in judgment. They must take as much pains to find out the right in a poor man's cause as in a rich man's. Sense of justice must make both judge and advocate as solicitous and industrious in the poor man's cause as if they hoped for the greatest advantage.

Secondly. It is made the character of a wicked man, that because it is a poor man's cause, which there is nothing to be got by, he "regardeth not to know it," in the true state of it, for he cares not which way it goes, right or wrong: see Job xxix. 16.

xxvii. 17. It is probable that "brighten," rather than "sharpen," is meant by the verbs in this verse. Some, indeed, translate "gladden," but less appropriately.

xxvii. 21. Silver and gold are tested by fire, and a man is regarded according to his reputation, which is a public test of character.

xxvii. 22. To "bray" is to pound or crush. It is uncertain if wheat was actually ground in a mortar, and it has been thought that the process here described was intended to separate the corn from the husk. Rice is still so treated by the Arabs, according to Dr. Kitto.

xxviii. 2. The first clause may mean either that there are many rulers at one time or that changes of government follow in rapid succession.

xxviii. 15. Some have suggested that the bear is not here to be thought of as ranging or prowling about, but there is no need for altering our version.

8 Scornful men bring a city into a snare:
But wise men turn away wrath.

See here, First. Who are the men that are dangerous to the public; scornful men. When such are employed in the business of the state they do things with precipitation, because they scorn to deliberate, and will not take time for consideration and consultation; they do things illegal and unjustifiable, because they scorn to be hampered by laws and constitutions; break their faith, because they scorn to be bound by their word; provoke the people, because they scorn to please them. Thus they "bring a city into a snare" by their ill conduct, or, as the margin reads it, they 'set a city on fire;' they sow discord among the citizens, and run them into confusion. Those are scornful men that mock at religion, the obligations of conscience, and the fears of another world, and every thing that is sacred and serious. Such men are the plagues of their generation; they bring God's judgments upon a land, set men together by the ears, and so bring all to confusion.

Secondly. Who are the men that are the blessings of a land. The wise men who, by promoting religion, which is true wisdom, turn away the wrath of God; and who, by prudent counsels, reconcile contending parties, and prevent the mischievous consequences of divisions. Proud and foolish men kindle the fires which wise and good men must extinguish.

9 If a wise man contendeth with a foolish man,
Whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest

A wise man is here advised not to set his wit to a fool's; not to dispute with him, or by contending with him to think either of fastening reason upon him, or gaining right from him. If a wise man contend with a wise man he may hope to be understood, and, as far as he has reason and equity on his side, to carry his point, at least to bring the controversy to a head, and issue it amicably; but if he contend with a foolish man there is no rest, he will see no end of it, nor will he have any satisfaction in it, but must expect to be always uneasy.

First. Whether the foolish man he contends with rage or laugh, whether he take heinously, or take scornfully, what is said to him; whether he rail at it, or mock at it, one of the two he will do, and so there will be no rest. However it is given it will be ill taken, and the wisest man must expect to be either scolded or ridiculed, if he contend with a fool. He that fights with a dunghill, whether he be conqueror or conquered, is sure to be ill dirtied.

Secondly. Whether the wise man himself rage or laugh, whether he takes the serious or the jocular way of dealing with the fool, whether he be severe or pleasant with him, whether he come with a rod, or with the spirit of meekness, (1 Cor. iv. 21,) it is all alike, no good is done. "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced, mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented."

10 The bloodthirsty hate the upright:
But the just seek his soul.

Note, First. Ill men hate their best friends. "The bloodthirsty," all the seed of the old serpent, who was a murderer from the beginning, and inherit his enmity against the seed of the woman, they "hate the upright," they seek the ruin of good men, because they condemn the wicked world, and witness against it. Christ told his disciples they should be hated of all men. Bloody men do especially hate upright magistrates, that would restrain and reform them, and put the laws in execution against them, and so really do them a kindness.

Secondly. Good men love their worst enemies. The just, whom the bloody hate, seek their soul, pray for their conversion, and would gladly do any thing for their salvation. This Christ taught us: "Father, forgive them." "The just seek his soul;" that is, the soul of the upright, whom the bloody hate, so it is commonly understood. Seek to protect it from violence, and save it from, or avenge it at, the hands of the bloodthirsty.

11 A fool uttereth all his mind:
But a wise man keepeth it in till afterwards.

Note, First. It is a piece of weakness to be open. He is "a fool" that "uttereth all his mind," that tells every thing he knows, and hath in his mouth presently whatever he has in his thoughts, and can keep no counsel; that, whatever is started in discourse, shoots his bolt presently; that when he is provoked will say any thing that comes uppermost, whoever is reflected upon by it; that when he is to speak of any business will say all he thinks, and yet never thinks he saith enough; whether choice or refuse, corn or chaff, pertinent or impertinent, you shall have it all.

Secondly. It is a piece of wisdom to be upon the reserve. A wise man will not utter all his mind presently, but will take time for a second thought, or reserve the present thought for a fitter time, when it will be more pertinent and likely to answer his intention; will not deliver himself in a continued speech, or starched discourse, but with pauses, that he may hear what is to be objected, and answer it. Non minus interdum oratorium est tacere quam dicere, —'True oratory requires an occasional pause.'—Plin. Ep. vii. 6.

12 If a ruler hearken to lies,
All his servants are wicked.

Note, First. It is a great sin in any, especially in rulers, to "hearken to lies;" for thereby they not only give a wrong judgment themselves of persons and things, according to the lies they give credit to, but they encourage others to give them wrong informations. Lies will be told to those that will hearken to them; but the receiver in this case is as bad as the thief.

Secondly. Those that do so will have "all their servants wicked." All their servants will appear wicked, for they will have lies told of them; and they will be wicked, for they will tell lies to them. All that have their ear will fill their ear with slanders, and false characters and representations; and so, if princes as well as people will be deceived, they shall be deceived; and, instead of devolving the guilt of their own false judgments upon their servants that misinformed them, they must share in their servants' guilt, and on them will much of the blame lie for encouraging such misinformations, and giving countenance and ear to them.

13 The poor and the deceitful man meet together:
The LORD lighteneth both their eyes.

This shews how wisely the great God serves the designs of his providence by persons of very different tempers, capacities, and conditions in the world; even,

First By those that are contrary the one to the other. Some are poor and forced to borrow, others are rich, have a great deal of the mammon of unrighteousness, deceitful riches they are called, and they are creditors, or usurers, as it is in the margin. Some are poor, and honest, and laborious; others rich, slothful, and deceitful; they meet together in the business of this world, and have dealings with one another, and "the Lord enlighteneth both their eyes;" he causeth his sun to shine upon both, and gives them both the comforts of this life; to some of both sorts he gives his grace. He enlightens the eyes of the poor by giving them patience; and of the deceitful by giving them repentance, as Zaccheus.

Secondly. By those that we think could best be spared. The poor and the deceitful we are ready to look upon as blemishes of providence, but God makes even them to serve the beauty of providence; he has wise ends not only in leaving the poor always with us, but in permitting "the deceived and the deceiver," for both "are his," Job xii. 16, and turn to his praise.

14 The king that faithfully judgeth the poor,
His throne shall be established for ever.

Here is, First. The duty of magistrates; and that is to judge faithfully between man and man, and to determine all causes brought before them according to truth and equity; particularly to take care of the poor; not to countenance them in an unjust cause for the sake of their poverty, Ex. xxiii. 3, but to see that their poverty do not turn to their prejudice if they have a just cause. The rich will look to themselves, but the poor and needy the prince must defend, Ps. lxxxii. 3; and plead for, ch. xxxi. 9.

Secondly. The happiness of those magistrates that do their duty; "Their throne" of honour, their tribunal of judgment, "shall be established for ever." This will secure to them the favour of God, and strengthen their interest in the affections of their people, both which will be the establishment of their power, and help to transmit it to posterity, and perpetuate it in the family

15 The rod and reproof give wisdom:
But a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame.

Parents, in educating their children, must consider,

First. The benefit of due correction. They must not only tell their children what is good and evil, but they must chide them and correct them too, if need be, when they either neglect that which is good or do that which is evil. If a reproof will serve without the rod it is well; but the rod must never be used without a rational and grave reproof; and then, though it may be a present uneasiness both to the father and to the child, yet it will give wisdom. Vexatio dat intellectum,—'vexation sharpens the intellect.' The child will take warning, and so get wisdom.

Secondly. The mischief of undue indulgence. A child that is not restrained or reproved, but is left to himself, as Adonijah was, to follow his own inclinations, he may do well if he will, but if he take ill courses nobody will hinder him; it is a thousand to one he proves a disgrace to his family, and brings his mother that fondled him, and humoured him in his licentiousness, to shame, to poverty, to reproach, and perhaps will himself be abusive to her, and give her ill language.

16 When the wicked are multiplied, transgression increaseth:
But the righteous shall see their fall.

Note, First. The more sinners there are the more sin there is. When the wicked, being countenanced by authority, grow numerous, and walk on every side, no marvel if transgression increaseth; as a plague in the country is said to increase when still more and more are infected with it. Transgression grows more impudent and bold, more imperious and threatening, when there are many to keep it in countenance. In the old world, when men began to multiply, they began to degenerate, and corrupt themselves and one another.

Secondly. The more sin there is the nearer is the ruin threatened. Let not the righteous have their faith and hope shocked by the increase of sin and sinners, let them not say they have cleansed their hands in vain, or that God has forsaken the earth, but wait with patience; the transgressors shall fall. The measure of their iniquity will be full, and then they shall fall from their dignity and power, and fall into disgrace and destruction, and the righteous shall have the satisfaction of seeing their fall, Ps. xxxvii. 34; perhaps in this world, however in the judgment of the great day, when the fall of God's implacable enemies will be the joy and triumph of glorified saints: see Isa. lxvi. 24; Gen. xix. 28.

Yea, he shall give delight unto thy soul.

Note, First. It is a very happy thing when children prove the comfort of their parents. Good children are so; they give them rest, make them easy, and free from the many cares they have had concerning them, yea, they give delight unto their souls. It is a pleasure to parents which none know but they that are blessed with it, to see the happy fruit of the good education they have given their children, and to have a prospect of their well-doing for both worlds; it gives delight proportionable to the many thoughts of heart that have been concerning them.

Secondly. In order to this, children must be trained up under a strict discipline, and not suffered to do what they will, and to go without rebuke when they do amiss. The foolishness bound up in their hearts must by correction be driven out when they are young, or it will break out, to their own and their parents' shame, when they are grown up.

18 Where there is no vision, the people perish:
But he that keepeth the law, happy is he.

See here, First. The misery of the people that want a settled ministry. "Where there is no vision," no prophets to expound the law, no priests or Levites to teach the good knowledge of the Lord, no means of grace, the word of the Lord is scarce, there is no open vision, 1 Sam. iii. 1; where it is so, "the people perish." The word has many significations, which will any of them suit well enough. 1. The people are made naked, stripped of their ornaments, and so exposed to shame; stripped of their armour, and so exposed to danger. How bare doth a place look without Bibles and ministers, and what an easy prey is it to the enemy of souls! 2. The people rebel not only against God, but against their prince. Good preaching would make people good subjects, but for want of it they are turbulent and factious, and despise dominion, because they know no better. 3. The people are idle; or, they play, as the scholars are apt to do when the master is absent. They do nothing to any good purpose but stand all the day idle and sporting in the market-place, for want of instrucxxviii. 17. "The man who does violence in the blood of a person," as the Hebrew may be rendered, is the man who sheds blood, or who is a murderer. We translate the second clause, "shall hasten to the grave," shall speedily be put to death; "let men not sustain him," let none protect him.

xxviii. 22. The "evil eye" here, as elsewhere, signifies a jealous or envious disposition. The margin suggests the rendering, "He that hath an evil eye hasteth to be rich;" but no change is required.

xxviii. 25. "Shall be made fat" is literal enough, but the sense is that he shall be enriched or prosperous.

xxviii. 28. "When the wicked rise," i.e., are elevated, or in power. The Greek translators seem to have followed a different reading: "In the places of the wicked the righteous groan."

xxix. 8. For "bring a city into a snare" the margin has "set a city on fire." The Syriac has, "Men who mock set cities on fire." The Chaldee is, "Men who mock speak falsehood." The Latin is, tion what to do, and how to do it. 4. They are scattered as sheep having no shepherd; for want of the masters of assemblies to call them and keep them together, Mar. vi. 34. They are scattered from God and their duty by apostacies; from one another by divisions. God is provoked to scatter them by his judgments, 2 Chr. xv. 3, 5. 5. They perish; they "are destroyed for lack of knowledge," Hos. iv. 6. See what reason we have to be thankful to God for the plenty of open vision which we enjoy.

Secondly. The felicity of a people that has not only a settled but a successful ministry among them. The people that heareth and keepeth the law, among whom religion is uppermost, happy is that people, and every particular person among them. It is not having the law, but obeying it, and living up to it, that will entitle us to blessedness.

19 A servant will not be corrected by words:
For though he understand he will not answer.

Here is the description of an unprofitable, slothful, wicked servant; a slave that serves not for conscience or love, but purely for fear. Let those that have such servants put on patience to bear the vexation, and not disturb themselves at it. See their character.

First. No rational words will work upon them; they will not be corrected and reformed, not brought to their business, nor cured of their idleness and laziness, by fair means, no, nor by foul words. Even the most gentle master will be forced to use severity with them; no reason will serve their turn, for they are unreasonable.

Secondly. No rational words will be got from them; but they are dogged and sullen, and though they understand the questions you ask them they will not give you an answer; though you make it never so plain to them what you expect from them, they will not promise you to mend what is amiss, nor to mind their business. See the folly of such servants, whose mouth by their silence calleth for strokes; they might be corrected by words, and save blows, but they will not.

20 Seest thou a man that is hasty in his words?
There is more hope of a fool than of him.

Solomon here shews that there is little hopes of bringing a man to wisdom that is hasty. Either,

First. Through rashness and inconsideration: "Seest thou a man that is hasty in his matters;" that is of a light, desultory wit; that seems to take a thing quick, but takes it by the halves; gallops over a book or science, but takes no time to digest it; no time to pause or muse upon a business; there is more hopes of making a scholar and a wise man of one that is dull and heavy, and slow in his studies, than of one that hath such a mercurial genius, and cannot fix.

Secondly. Through pride and conceitedness: "Seest thou a man" that is forward to speak to every matter that is started, and affects to speak first to it to open it, and speak last to it to give judgment upon it, as if he were an oracle, "there is more hope of a" modest "fool" who is sensible of his folly, than of such a self-conceited one.

21 He that delicately bringeth up his servant from a child
Shall have him become his son at the length

Note, First. It is an imprudent thing in a master to be too fond of a servant; to advance him too fast, and admit him to be too familiar with him; to suffer him to be over nice and curious in his diet, and clothing, and lodging, and so to bring him up delicately because he is a favourite and a pretty servant. Remember he is a servant, and by being thus indulged will be spoiled for any other place. Servants must endure hardness.

Secondly. It is an ungrateful thing in a servant, but what is very common, to carry himself insolently because he has been used tenderly. The humble prodigal thinks himself unworthy to be called a son, and is content to be a servant; the pampered slave thinks himself too good to be called a servant, and will be a son at the length, will take his ease and liberty, will be hail fellow with his master, and perhaps pretend to the inheritance. Let masters give their servants that which is equal and fit for them, and neither more nor less. This is very applicable to the body, which is a servant to the soul. Those that delicately bring up the body, that humour it, and are over tender of it, it will at length forget its place, and become a son, a master, and a perfect tyrant.

22 An angry man stirreth up strife,
And a furious man aboundeth in transgression.

See here the mischief that flows from an angry, passionate, furious disposition.

First. It makes men provoking to one another. "An angry man stirreth up strife," is troublesome and quarrelsome in the family, in the neighbourhood, blows the coals, and even forceth those to fall out with him that would live peaceably and quietly by him.

Secondly. It makes men provoking to God. "A furious man," that is wedded to his humours and passions, cannot but "abound in transgressions." That is a sin that is the cause of many sins; it not only hinders men from calling upon God's name, but it occasions their swearing and cursing, and profaning God's name.

23 A man's pride shall bring him low:
But honour shall uphold the humble in spirit.

This agrees with what Christ said more than once,

First. That "those who exalt themselves shall be abased." They that think to gain respect by lifting up themselves above their rank, by looking high, talking big, appearing fine, and applauding themselves, will, on the contrary, expose themselves to contempt, lose their reputation, and provoke God by humbling providences to bring them down and lay them low.

Secondly. That "those who humble themselves shall be exalted," and shall be established in their dignity. "Honour shall uphold the humble in spirit;" their humility is their honour, and that shall make them truly and safely great, and recommend them to the esteem of all that are wise and good.

24 Whoso is partner with a thief hateth his own soul:
He heareth cursing, and bewrayeth it not

See here what sin and ruin they involve themselves in who are drawn away by the enticement of sinners.

First. They incur a great deal of guilt. He doth so that goes partner with such as rob and defraud, and casts in his lot among them, ch. i. 11, &c.; the receiver is as bad as the thief. And being drawn in to join with him in the commission of the sin, he cannot escape joining with him in the concealment of it, though it be with the most horrid perjuries and execrations. They hear cursing, when they are sworn to tell the whole truth, but they will not confess.

Secondly. They hasten to utter ruin. They even hate their own souls, for they wilfully do that which will be the inevitable destruction of them. See the absurdities sinners are guilty of,—they love death, than which nothing more dreadful, and hate their own souls, than which nothing more dear.

25 The fear of man bringeth a snare:
But whoso putteth his trust in the LORD shall be safe.

Here, First. We are cautioned not to dread the power of man; neither the power of a prince, nor the power of the multitude. Both are formidable enough, but the slavish fear of either brings a snare; that is, exposeth men to many insults, some take a pride in terrifying the timorous; or rather, exposeth men to many temptations. Abraham, for fear of man, denied his wife, and Peter his Master, and many a one his God and religion. We must not baulk duty or commit sin, to avoid the wrath of man, nor, though we see it coming upon us, be disquieted with fear, Dan. iii. 16; Ps. cxviii. 6; he must himself die, Isa. li. 12, and can but kill our body, Lu. xii. 5.

Secondly. We are encouraged to depend upon the power of God, which would keep us from all that fear of man which hath either torment or temptation in it. "Whoso putteth his trust in the Lord," for protection and supply in the way of duty, he shall be set on high, above the power of man, and above the fear of that power. A holy confidence in God makes a man both great and easy, and enables him to look with a gracious contempt upon the most formidable designs of hell and earth against him. If God be my salvation, "I will trust and not be afraid."

26 Many seek the ruler's favour;
But every man's judgment cometh from the LORD.

See here, First. What is the common course men take to advance and enrich themselves, and make themselves great. They "seek the ruler's favour," and, as if all their judgment did proceed from him, to him they make all their court. Solomon was himself a ruler, and knew with what sedulity men made their application to him, some on one errand, others on another, but all for his favour. It is the way of the world to make an interest with great men, and expect much from the smiles of second causes, which yet are uncertain, and frequently disappoint them. Many take a great deal of pains in seeking the ruler's favour, and yet cannot have it. Many have it for a little while, but they cannot keep themselves in it; by some little turn or other they are brought under his displeasure. Many have it and keep it, and yet it doth not answer their expectation; they cannot make that hand of it that they promised themselves they should. Haman had the ruler's favour, and yet it availed him nothing.

Secondly. What is the wisest course men can take to be happy? Let them look up to God, and seek the favour of the Ruler of rulers; for "every man's judgment proceedeth from the Lord." It is not with us as the ruler will, his favour cannot make us happy, his frowns cannot make us miserable, but it is as God will; every creature is that to us that God makes it to be, no more, and no other. He is the First Cause, on which all second causes depend. If he help not, they cannot, 2 Kin. vi. 27; Job xxxiv. 29.

27 An unjust man is an abomination to the just:
And he that is upright in the way is abomination to the wicked.

This speaks not only the innate contrariety that there is between virtue and vice, as between light and darkness, fire and water, but the old enmity that has always been between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, Gen. iii. 15.

First. All that are sanctified have a rooted antipathy to wickedness and wicked people. They have a good-will to the souls of all, (God hath so, and would have none perish,) but they hate the ways and practices of those that are impious towards God and injurious towards men; they cannot hear of them, or speak of them, without a holy indignation; they loathe the society of the ungodly and unjust, and dread the thought of giving them any countenance; but would do all they could to bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end. Thus an unjust man makes himself odious to the just, and it is one part of his present shame and punishment that good men cannot endure him.

Secondly. All that are unsanctified have a like rooted antipathy to godliness and godly people. "He that is upright in the way," that makes conscience of what he saith and doth, "is abomination to the wicked," whose wickedness is restrained perhaps and suppressed, or, however, shamed and condemned, by the uprightness of the upright. Thus Cain did, who was of his father the devil. And this is not only the wickedness of the wicked, that they hate those whom God loves, but their misery too, that they hate those whom they shall shortly see in everlasting bliss and honour, and who "shall have dominion over them in the morning," Ps. xlix. 14.

CHAPTER XXX.

This and the following chapter are an appendix to Solomon's proverbs; but they are both expressly called prophecies in the first verses of both, by which it appears that the penmen of them, whoever they were, were Divinely inspired. This chapter was penned by one that bears the name of Agur Ben Jakeh. What tribe he was of, or when he lived, we are not told. What he wrote, being indited by the Holy Ghost, is here kept upon record. We have here, I. His confession of faith, ver. 1—6. II. His prayer, ver. 7—9. III. A caution against wronging servants, ver. 10. IV. Four wicked generations, ver. 11—14. V. Four things insatiable, ver. 15, 16; to which is added fair warning to undutiful children, ver. 17. VI. Four things unsearchable, ver. 18—20. VII. Four things intolerable, ver. 21—23. VIII. Four things little and wise, ver. 24—28. IX. Four things stately, ver. 29—33.

THE words of Agur the son of Jakeh,
Even the prophecy: the man spake unto Ithiel,
Even unto Ithiel and Ucal,
2 Surely I am more brutish than any man,
And have not the understanding of a man.
3 I neither learned wisdom,

"Pestilent men dissipate a city." The Greek has, "Lawless men have burned a city." These various renderings point to no real difficulty, as the sense is that scornful men excite or agitate a city.

xxix. 10. The "bloodthirsty" here, or "men of blood," are men of a sanguinary disposition, cruel, and merciless.

xxix. 13. Instead of "deceitful man," the margin has "the usurer," which is the sense adopted by some good critics. Others think that a man who oppresses or vexes the poor is meant. The Vulgate gives the word "creditor," the Chaldee gives the sense of "destitute," and the Syriac "sorrowful." The Greek is nearly like the Latin in its explanation of the phrase. By "deceitful" it is plain that our translators meant fraudulent. The general idea seems to be that of debtor and creditor, or, as in chap. xxii. 2, "rich and poor." The Lord "enlightens the eyes" of men in different circumstances by preserving them alive, as the words are sometimes inter-

Nor have the knowledge of the holy.
4 Who hath ascended up into heaven, or descended?
Who hath gathered the wind in his fists?
Who hath bound the waters in a garment?
Who hath established all the ends of the earth?
What is his name, and what is his son's name, if thou [canst tell?
5 Every word of God is pure:
He is a shield unto them that put their trust in him.
6 Add thou not unto his words,
Lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar.

Some make Agur to be not the name of this author, but his character. He was a collector, so it signifies, a gatherer, one that did not compose things himself, but collected the wise sayings and observations of others; made abstracts of others' writings; which some think is the reason why he saith, ver. 3, I have not learned wisdom myself, but have been a scribe, or amanuensis, to other wise and learned men. Note, We must not bury our talent, though it be but one; but, as we have received the gift, so minister the same, if it be but to collect what others have written. But we rather suppose it to be his name, which, no doubt, was well-known then, though not mentioned elsewhere in Scripture.

Ithiel and Ucal are mentioned, either, 1. As the names of his pupils, whom he instructed, or who consulted him as an oracle, having a great opinion of his wisdom and goodness. Probably they wrote from him what he dictated, as Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah, and by their means it was preserved, and they were ready to attest it to be his, for it was spoken to them; they were two witnesses of it. Or, 2. As the subject of his discourse. Ithiel signifies 'God with me,' the application of Immanuel, "God with us." The Word calls him "God with us;" faith appropriates this, and calls him 'God with me,' who loved me, and gave himself for me, and into union and communion with whom I am admitted. Ucal signifies 'the mighty one;' for it is upon One that is mighty that help is laid for us. Many good interpreters apply this, therefore, to the Messiah, for to him all the prophecies bare witness, and why not this then? It is what Agur spake concerning Ithiel, even concerning Ithiel (that is the name on which the stress is laid) and Ucal,—The mighty God, Isa. ix. 6, with us, Isa. vii. 14.

Three things the prophet here aims at:

First. To abase himself. Before he makes confession of his faith he makes confession of his folly, and the weakness and deficiency of reason, which makes it so necessary that we be guided and governed by faith. Before he speaks concerning the Saviour, he speaks of himself as needing a Saviour, and as nothing without him. We must go out of ourselves before we go into Jesus Christ.

1. He speaks of himself as wanting a righteousness, and having done foolishly, very foolishly. When he reflects upon himself he owns, "Surely I am more brutish than any man:" "Every man is become brutish," Jer. x. 14. But he that knows his own heart knows so much more evil by himself than he doth by any other, that he cries out, "Surely" I cannot but think that "I am more brutish than any man;" sure no man has such a corrupt, deceitful heart as I have. I have acted as one that has not the understanding of Adam, as one that is wretchedly degenerated from the knowledge and righteousness in which man was at first created; nay, I have not the common sense and reason of a man, else I had not done as I have done. Agur, when he was applied to by others as wiser than most, acknowledged himself more foolish than any. Whatever high opinion others may have of us, it becomes us to have low thoughts of ourselves.

2. He speaks of himself as wanting a revelation to guide him in the ways of truth and wisdom. He owns, ver. 3, "I neither learned wisdom" by any power of my own, the depths of it cannot be fathomed by my line and plummet, "nor know I the knowledge of the holy ones," the angels, our first parents in innocency, nor of the holy things of God; I can get no insight into them, nor make any judgment of them farther than God is pleased to make them known to me. The natural man, the natural powers, perceive not, nay, they receive not, the things of the Spirit of God. Some suppose Agur to be asked, as Apollo's oracle was of old, 'Who was the wisest man?' answered, 'He that is sensible of his own ignorance,' especially in Divine things. Hoc tantum scio, me nihil scire,—'All that I know is, that I know nothing.'

Secondly. To advance Jesus Christ, and the Father in him; ver. 4, "Who hath ascended up into heaven," &c.

1. Some understand this of God and of his works, which are both incomparable and unsearchable. He challengeth all mankind to give an account of the heavens above, of the winds, the waters, the earth: Who can pretend to have ascended up to heaven, to take a view of the orbs above, and then to have descended to give us a description of them? Who can pretend to have had the command of the winds, to have grasped them in his hand, and managed them as God doth, or to have bound the waves of the sea with a swaddling band, as God has done? Who hath established the ends of the earth, or can describe the strength of its foundations, or extent of its limits. Tell me what is the man's name who can undertake to vie with God, or to be of his cabinet council; or, if he be dead, what is his name to whom he has bequeathed this great secret?

2. Others refer it to Christ, to Ithiel, and Ucal, the Son of God; for it is the son's name as well as the father's that is here inquired after, and a challenge given to any to compare with him. We now must exalt Christ as one revealed; they then magnified him as one concealed, as one they had heard something of, but had very dark and defective ideas of; "We have heard the fame of him with our ears," but cannot describe him, Job xxviii. 22. Certainly it is God that has "gathered the winds in his fists," and "bound the waters as in a garment." But, "What is his name?" It is "I am that I am," Ex. iii. 14, a name to be adored, not to be understood. "What is his Son's name," by whom he doth all these things? The Old Testament saints expected the Messiah to be the Son of the blessed, and he is here spoken of as a person distinct from the Father, but his name as yet secret. Note, The great Redeemer, in the glories of his providence and grace, can neither be paralleled nor found out to perfection. 1st. The glories of the kingdom of his grace are unsearchable and unparalleled; for who but he hath ascended into heaven and descended? Who but he is perfectly acquainted with both worlds, and has himself a free correspondence with both, and is therefore fit to settle a correspondence between them as Mediator, as Jacob's ladder? He was in heaven, in the Father's bosom, Jno. i. 1, 18; thence he descended to take our nature upon him, and never was there such a condescension. And in that nature he again ascended, Eph. iv. 9, to receive the promised glories of his exalted state; and who but he has done this? Rom. x. 5. 2nd. The glories of the kingdom of his providence are likewise unsearchable and unparalleled. The same that reconciles heaven and earth was the Creator of both, and governs and disposeth of all. The three lower elements of air, water, and earth, he here instanceth in his government of. First. The motions of the air are of his directing. Satan pretends to be the prince of the power of the air; but even there Christ has all power, he rebuked the winds, and they obeyed him. Secondly. The bounds of the water are of his appointing; he binds them as in a garment; "Hitherto they shall come, and no farther," Job xxxviii. 9—11. Thirdly. The foundations of the earth are of his establishing; he founded it at first, he upholds it still. If Christ had not interposed, the foundations of the earth had sunk under the load of the curse upon the ground for man's sin. Who and what is the mighty He that doth all this? We cannot find out God, nor the Son of God, unto perfection. Oh the depth of that knowledge!

Thirdly. To assure us of the truth of the word of God, and to recommend it to us, ver. 5, 6. Agur's pupils expect to be instructed by him in the things of God; Alas! saith he, I cannot undertake to instruct you, go to the word of God; see what he hath there revealed of himself, and of his mind and will; you need know no more than what that will teach you, and that you may rely upon as sure and sufficient. "Every word of God is pure;" there is not the least mixture of falsehood and corruption in it. The words of men are to be heard and read with jealousy, and with allowance; but there is not the least ground to suspect any deficiency in the word of God; it is "as silver purified seven times," Ps. xii. 6; without the least dross or alloy. "Thy word is very pure," Ps. cxix. 140.

1. It is sure, and therefore we may trust to it, and venture our souls upon it. God in his word, God in his promise, is a shield, a sure protection to all them that put themselves under his protection, and put their trust in him. The word of God, applied by faith, will make us easy in the midst of the greatest dangers, Ps. xlvi. 1, 2.

2. It is sufficient, and therefore we may not add to it; ver. 6, "Add thou not unto his words," because they are pure and perfect. This forbids not only the advancing of any thing in contradiction to the word of God, but in competition with it. Though it be under the plausible pretence of explaining it, yet if it pretend to be of equal authority with it, it is adding to his words, which is not only a reproach to them as insufficient, but opens a door to all manner of errors and corruptions; for, that one absurdity granted, that the word of any man or company of men is to be received with the same faith and veneration as the word of God, a thousand follow. We must be content with what God has thought fit to make known to us of his mind, and not covet to be wise above what is written. For, 1st. God will resent it as a heinous affront; he will reprove thee, will reckon with thee as a traitor against his crown and dignity, and lay thee under the heavy doom of those that add to his words, or diminish from them, Deu. iv. 32; xii. 32. 2nd. We shall run ourselves into endless mistakes. Thou wilt be found a liar, a corrupter of the word of truth; a broacher of heresies, and guilty of the worst of forgeries, counterfeiting the broad seal of heaven, and pretending a Divine mission and inspiration, when it is all a cheat. Men may be thus deceived, but "God is not mocked."

7 Two things have I required of thee;
Deny me them not before I die:
8 Remove far from me vanity and lies:
Give me neither poverty nor riches;
Feed me with food convenient for me:
9 Lest I be full, and deny thee,
And say, Who is the LORD?
Or lest I be poor, and steal,
And take the name of my God in vain.

After Agur's confession and creed, here follows the litany, where we may observe,

First. The preface to his prayer. "Two things have I required," that is, requested of thee, O God. Before we go to pray, it is good to consider what we need, and what the things are which we have to ask of God; what doth our case require, what do our hearts desire, what would we that God should do for us, that we may not be to seek for our petition and request when we should be presenting it. He begs, "Deny me not before I die." In praying we should think of dying, and pray accordingly; Lord, give me pardon, and peace, and grace before I die, "before I go hence and be no more;" for if I be not renewed and sanctified before I die, it will not be done after. If I do not prevail in prayer before I die, prayers after will not prevail; no, not "Lord, Lord." There is none of this wisdom or working in the grave. Deny me not thy grace, for if thou do I die, I perish; if thou be silent to me, I am like them that go down to the pit, Ps. xxviii. 1. "Deny me not before I die," that is, as long as I continue in the land of the living, let me continue under the conduct of thy grace and good providence.

Secondly. The prayer itself; the two things he requires, grace sufficient and food convenient.

1. Grace sufficient for his soul: "Remove from me vanity and lies;" that is, deliver me from sin, from all corrupt principles, practices, and affections; from error and mistake, which is at the bottom of all sin; from the love of the world and the things of it, which are all vanity and a lie. Some understand it as a prayer for the pardon of sin, for when God forgives sin he removes it; he takes it away; or, rather, it is a prayer of the same import with that, "Lead us not into temptation." Nothing is more mischievous to us than sin, and therefore nothing which we should more earnestly pray against, that we may do no evil.

2. Food convenient for his body. Having prayed for the operations of Divine grace, he here begs the favours of the Divine providence, but such as might tend to the good and not the prejudice of his soul.

1st. He prays that of God's free gift he might receive a competent portion of the good things of this life. 'Feed me with the bread of my allowance;' such bread as thou thinkest fit to allow me; for as to all the gifts of the Divine providence, we must refer ourselves to the Divine wisdom. Or the bread that is fit for me as a man, as a master of a family; that which is agreeable to my rank and condition in the world, for as is the man so is his competency. Our Saviour seems to refer to this when he teacheth us to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread;" as this seems to refer to Jacob's vow, in which he wished for no more but "bread to eat and raiment to put on." Food convenient for us is what we ought to be content with, though we have not dainties, varieties, and superfluities; what is for necessity, though we have not for delight and ornament. And it is what we may in faith pray for, and depend upon God for.

2nd. He prays that he might be kept from every condition of life that would be a temptation to him.

First. He prays against the extremes of abundance and want; "Give me

preted, e.g., Psa. xiii. 3; or by giving them relief and aid, e.g., 1 Sam. xiv. 27, 29; Ezra ix. 8.

xxix. 18. The first clause may be rendered, "without a vision a people is broken up," where it seems that a vision means a Divine revelation. If a nation is without a knowledge of the will and law, grace and truth of God, it is destitute of proper guarantees for stability, peace, and prosperity. It is not well to limit the words to the presence of a prophet or of a preacher. In the second clause, not one man, but a people, seems to be intended. A nation which observes the law of the Lord is happy and blessed.

xxix. 21. If a man pampers and humours a servant from his childhood, it is only to be expected that he will turn out contumacious. Two of the words in this verse occur nowhere else in the Hebrew Scriptures. To the first we give the sense of pamper or indulge. The other is more difficult, and is rendered "son" in our version, and by many older expositors. The Latin Vulgate gives the sense of neither poverty nor riches." He doth not hereby prescribe to God, nor pretend to teach him what condition he shall allot to him, nor doth he pray against poverty or riches absolutely, as in themselves evil; for either of them, by the grace of God, may be sanctified and be a means of good to us; but, 1*st*. He thereby intends to express the value which wise and good men have for a middle state of life, and, with submission to the will of God, desires that that might be his state; neither great honour nor great contempt. We must learn how to manage both, as St. Paul, Phil. iv. 12, but rather wish to be always between both. Optimus pecuniæ modus qui nec in paupertatem cedit nec procul a paupertate discedit,—'The best condition is that which neither implies poverty nor yet recedes far from it.'—Seneca. 2*nd*. He hereby intimates a holy jealousy he had of himself, that he could not keep his ground against the temptations either of an afflicted or a prosperous condition. Others may preserve their integrity in either, but he is afraid of both, and therefore grace teacheth him to pray against riches as much as nature against poverty, but "the will of the Lord be done."

Secondly. He gives a pious reason for this prayer, ver. 9. He doth not say, Lest I be rich and cumbered with care, and envied by my neighbours, and eaten up with a multitude of servants; or, "lest I be poor" and trampled on, and forced to work hard and fare hard; but, Lest I be rich and sin, or poor and sin. Sin is that which a good man is afraid of in every condition and under every event: witness Nehemiah, ch. vi. 13, That I should be afraid, and do so, and sin. 1*st*. He dreads the temptations of a prosperous condition, and therefore even deprecates that: "Lest I be full and deny thee," as Jeshurun, that waxed fat, and kicked, and forsook God that made him, Deu. xxxii. 15, and say, as Pharaoh in his pride, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?" Prosperity makes people proud, and forgetful of God, as if they had no need of him, and were therefore under no obligation to him. What can the Almighty do for them? Job xxii. 17, and therefore they will do nothing for him. Even good men are afraid of the worst sins, so deceitful do they think their own hearts to be, and they know that the greatest gains of the world will not balance the least guilt. 2*nd*. He dreads the temptations of a poor condition, and for that reason, and no other, deprecates that: "Lest I be poor, and steal." Poverty is a strong temptation to dishonesty, and such as many are overcome by, and are ready to think it will be their excuse; but it will not bear them out at God's bar, no more than at men's, to say, I stole because I was poor; yet "if a man steal for the satisfying of his soul when he is hungry," it is a case of compassion, ch. vi. 30, and what even those that have some principles of honesty in them may yet be drawn to. But observe why Agur dreads this, not because he should endanger himself by it, Lest I steal and be hanged for it, whipped, or put in the stocks, or sold for a bondman, as among the Jews poor thieves were, who had not wherewithal to make restitution; but lest he should dishonour God by it, "Lest I should steal, and take the name of my God in vain;" that is, discredit my profession of religion by practices disagreeable to it. Or, "Lest I steal," and, when I am charged with it, forswear myself. He therefore dreads one sin, because it would draw on another, for the way of sin is down hill. Observe, he calls God his God, and therefore he is afraid of doing any thing to offend him, because of the relation he stands in to him.

10 Accuse not a servant unto his master,
Lest he curse thee, and thou be found guilty.
11 There is a generation that curseth their father,
And doth not bless their mother.
12 There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes,
And yet is not washed from their filthiness.
13 There is a generation, O how lofty are their eyes!
And their eyelids are lifted up.
14 There is a generation, whose teeth are as swords,
And their jaw teeth as knives,
To devour the poor from off the earth,
And the needy from among men

Here is, First. A caution not to abuse other people's servants any more than our own, nor to make mischief between them and their masters, for it is an ill office, invidious, and what will make a man odious, ver. 10. Consider, 1. It is an injury to the servant, whose poor condition makes him an object of pity, and therefore it is barbarous to add affliction to him that is afflicted. 'Hurt not a servant with thy tongue,' so the margin reads it; for it argues a sordid disposition to smite any body secretly with the scourge of the tongue, especially a servant, that is not a match for us, and whom we should rather protect, if his master be severe with him, than exasperate him more. 2. It will perhaps be an injury to thyself. If a servant be thus provoked, perhaps he will curse thee, will accuse thee, and bring thee into trouble; or give thee an ill word, and blemish thy reputation; or appeal to God against thee, and imprecate his wrath upon thee, who is the patron and protector of oppressed innocency.

Secondly. An account, upon occasion of this caution, of some wicked generations of men, that are justly abominable to all that are virtuous and good.

1. Such as are abusive to their parents, give them ill language, and wish them ill, call them ill names, and do them ill turns. There is a generation of such; young men of that black character commonly herd together, and irritate one another against their parents, a generation of vipers they are, who curse either their natural parents, or their magistrates, or ministers, because they cannot endure the yoke. And they are near of kin to them who, though they are not yet arrived to such a pitch of wickedness as to curse their parents, yet do not bless them, cannot give them a good word, and will not pray for them.

2. Such as are conceited of themselves, and, under a show and pretence of sanctity, hide from others, and perhaps from themselves too, abundance of reigning wickedness in secret, ver. 12. They are "pure in their own eyes," as if they were in all respects such as they should be; they have a very good opinion of themselves and their own character, that they are not only righteous, but rich and increased with goods, Rev. iii. 17, "and yet are not cleansed from their filthiness," the filthiness of their hearts, which they pretend to be the best part of them; they are, it may be, swept and garnished, but they are not washed, not sanctified, as the Pharisees, that within were full of all uncleanness, Mat. xxiii. 25, 26.

3. Such as are haughty and scornful to those about them, ver. 13. He speaks of them with amazement at their intolerable pride and insolence, "O how lofty are their eyes;" with what disdain do they look upon their neighbours, as not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock; what a distance do they expect every body should keep. And when they look upon themselves, how do they strut and vaunt, like the peacock, thinking they make themselves illustrious, when really they make themselves ridiculous. There is a generation of such, on whom he that resists the proud will pour contempt.

4. Such as are cruel to the poor and barbarous to all that lie at their mercy, ver. 14. Their teeth are iron and steel, swords and knives, instruments of cruelty, with which they devour the poor with the greatest pleasure imaginable, and as greedily as hungry men cut their meat and eat it. God has so ordered it that the poor we should always have with us, that they shall never cease out of the land; but there are those who, because they hate to relieve them, would, if they could, abolish them from the earth, from among men, especially God's poor. Some understand it of those who wound and ruin others by slanders and false accusations, and severe censures of their everlasting state; their tongues and their teeth too, which are likewise organs of speech, are as swords and knives, Ps. lvii. 4.

15 The horseleach hath two daughters, crying, Give, give.
There are three things that are never satisfied,
Yea, four things say not, It is enough:
16 The grave; and the barren womb;
The earth that is not filled with water;
And the fire that saith not, It is enough
17 The eye that mocketh at his father,
And despiseth to obey his mother,
The ravens of the valley shall pick it out,
And the young eagles shall eat it.

He had spoken before of those that devoured the poor, ver. 14, and had spoken of them last, as the worst of all the four generations there mentioned; now here he speaks of their insatiableness in doing this. The temper that puts them upon it is made up of cruelty and covetousness; now those are two daughters of the horseleech, its genuine offspring, that still cry, Give, give; give more blood, give more money. For the bloody are still bloodthirsty; being drunk with blood, they add thirst to their drunkenness, and will seek it yet again. They also that love silver shall never be satisfied with silver. Thus while from these two principles they are devouring the poor, they are continually uneasy to themselves, as David's enemies, Ps. lix. 14, 15.

Now, First. For the farther illustration of this he instanceth in four other things which are insatiable, to which those devourers are compared, which say not, "It is enough;" or, 'It is wealth.' Those are never rich that are always coveting. Now these four things are always craving: 1. The grave, into which multitudes fall, and yet still more will fall, and it swallows them all up, and returns none. "Hell and destruction are never full," ch. xxvii. 20; when it comes to our turn we shall find the grave ready for us, Job xvii. 1. 2. The barren womb, which is impatient of its affliction in being barren, and cries as Rachel did, "Give me children." 3. The parched ground in time of drought, especially in those hot countries which still soaks in the rain that comes in abundance upon it, and in a little time wants more. 4. The fire, which, when it has consumed abundance of fuel, yet still devours all the combustible matter that is thrown into it. So insatiable are the corrupt desires of sinners, and so little satisfaction have they even in the gratification of them.

Secondly. He adds a terrible threatening to disobedient children, ver. 17, for warning to the first of those four wicked generations that curse their parents, ver. 11; and shews here,

1. Who they are that belong to that generation. Not only they that curse their parents in heat and passion, but 1st. They that mock at them, though it be but with a scornful eye, looking with disdain upon them, because of their bodily infirmities, or looking sour and dogged at them when they instruct or command, impatient of their checks, and angry at them. God takes notice with what eye children look upon their parents, and will reckon for the leering look and the casts of the evil eye, as well as for ill language given them. 2nd. They that despise to obey them, that think it a thing below them to be dutiful to their parents, especially to the mother. They scorn to be controlled by her; and thus she that bare them in sorrow in greater sorrow bears their manners.

2. What their doom will be. They that dishonour their parents shall be set up as monuments of God's vengeance; they shall be hanged in chains, as it were, for the birds of prey to pick out their eyes, those eyes with which they looked so scornfully on their good parents. The dead bodies of malefactors were not to hang all night, but before night the ravens would have picked out their eyes. If men do not punish undutiful children God will, and will load those with the greatest infamy that carry themselves haughtily towards their parents. Many that have come to an ignominious end have owned that the wicked courses that brought them to it began in a contempt of their parents' authority.

18 There be three things which are too wonderful for me,
Yea, four which I know not:
19 The way of an eagle in the air;
The way of a serpent upon a rock;
The way of a ship in the midst of the sea;
And the way of a man with a maid.
20 Such is the way of an adulterous woman;
She eateth, and wipeth her mouth,
And saith, I have done no wickedness.
21 For three things the earth is disquieted,
And for four which it cannot bear:
22 For a servant when he reigneth;
And a fool when he is filled with meat;
23 For an odious woman when she is married;
And an handmaid that is heir to her mistress.

Here is, First. An account of four things that are unsearchable, too wonderful to be fully known. And here,

"contumacious," which we prefer. The other ancient translations agree in making the whole verse mean that he who is given to self-indulgence from his childhood will become a servant, and will come at length to ruin.

XXX. 1. This verse is manifestly the heading or title of a distinct section. The words have provoked a good deal of discussion, and are diversely rendered in the ancient versions. In the Greek they come, with part of the chapter, near the end of chap. xxiv., in a shorter form: "These things saith the man to them that believe in God; and I cease." In the Chaldee, Syriac, and Latin they occupy the same place as in the Hebrew. Our translation requires very little change. The word for "prophecy," however, means a "burden," which term is not unusual as a designation of prophecy. Nothing whatever is known of the persons mentioned in this verse, and all speculations in regard to them are of small value. It is by no means likely that Agur is a name for Solomon, and Jakeh for David, because Solomon

1. The first three are natural things, and are only designed as comparisons for the illustration of the last. We cannot trace, 1st. "An eagle in the air." Which way she is flown cannot be discovered, either by the footstep or by the scent, as the way of a beast may upon the ground; nor can we account for the wonderful swiftness of her flight, how soon she has gone beyond our ken. 2nd. "A serpent upon a rock." The way of a serpent in the sand we may find by the track, but not of a serpent upon the hard rock, nor can we describe how a serpent will, without feet, in a little time creep to the top of a rock. 3rd. "A ship in the midst of the sea." The leviathan indeed "makes a path to shine after him, one would think the deep to be hoary," Job xli. 32, but a ship leaves no mark behind it, and sometimes it is so tossed upon the waves that one would wonder how it lives at sea and gains its point. The kingdom of nature is full of wonders, marvellous things which the God of nature doth, past finding out.

EAGLE AND SERPENT.—ver. 19.

2. The fourth is a mystery of iniquity more unaccountable than any of these; it belongs to the depths of Satan, that deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the heart which none can know, Jer. xvii. 9. It is twofold: 1st. The cursed arts which a vile adulterer hath to debauch a young maid, and to persuade her to yield to his wicked and abominable lust. This is what a wanton poet wrote a whole book of, long since, De Arte Amandi,—'On the Art of Love.' With what pretensions and protestations of love, and all its powerful charms, promises of marriage, assurances of secrecy and reward, is many an unwary virgin brought to sell her virtue, and honour, and peace, and soul, and all to a base traitor; for so all sinful lust is in the kingdom of love. The more artfully the temptation is managed, the more watchful and resolute ought every pure heart to be against it. 2nd. The cursed arts which a vile adulteress hath to conceal her wickedness, especially from her husband, from whom she treacherously departs. So close are her intrigues with her lewd companions, and so craftily disguised, that it is as impossible to discover her as to track an eagle in the air. She eats the forbidden fruit, after the similitude of Adam's transgression, and then wipes her mouth, that it may not betray itself, and with a bold and impudent face saith, "I have done no wickedness." First. To the world she denies the fact, and is ready to swear it, that she is as chaste and modest as any woman, and never did that wickedness which she is suspected of. They are works of darkness, which are industriously kept from coming to the light. Secondly. To her own conscience, if she have any left, she denies the fault, and will not own that that great wickedness is any wickedness at all, but an innocent entertainment: see Hos. xii. 7, 8. Thus multitudes ruin their souls by calling evil good, and outfacing their convictions with a self-justification.

Secondly. An account of four things that are intolerable; that is, four sorts of persons that are very troublesome to the places where they live, and the relations and companies they are in; the earth is disquieted for them, and groans under them as a burthen it cannot bear, and they are all much alike. 1. A servant, when he is advanced and intrusted with power, who is of all others most insolent and imperious: witness Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, Neh. ii. 10. 2. A fool, a silly, rude, boisterous, vicious man, when he has grown rich, and has got his belly full, and his head full too, at a good dinner, he will disturb all the company with his extravagant talk and the affronts he will put upon those about him. 3. An ill-natured, cross-grained woman, when she gets a husband, which, having made herself odious by her pride and sourness, so that one would not have thought anybody should have loved her, yet if at last she be married, that honourable estate makes her more intolerably scornful and spiteful than ever. It is pity that that which should sweeten the disposition should have a contrary effect. A gracious woman, when she is married, will be yet more obliging. 4. An old maid-servant, that has prevailed with her mistress, by humouring her and getting the length of her foot, to leave her what she has, or is as dear to her as if she were to be her heir; such a one likewise will be intolerably proud and malicious, and think all too little that her mistress gives her, and herself wronged if any thing be left from her. Let those, therefore, whom Providence has advanced to honour from mean beginnings, carefully watch against that sin which will most easily beset them, pride and haughtiness, which will in them, of all others, be most insufferable and inexcusable, and let them humble themselves with the remembrance of the rock out of which they were hewn.

24 There be four things which are little upon the earth,
But they are exceeding wise:
25 The ants are a people not strong,
Yet they prepare their meat in the summer;
26 The conies are but a feeble folk,
Yet make they their houses in the rocks;
27 The locusts have no king,
Yet go they forth all of them by bands;
28 The spider taketh hold with her hands,
And is in kings' palaces.

Agur, having instanced in four things that seem great, and yet are really contemptible, here instanceth in four things that are little to see to, and yet are very admirable, great in miniature; in which, as Bishop Patrick observes, he teaches us several good lessons; as, 1. Not to admire bodily bulk, or beauty, or strength, or to value persons for that, or think the better of them; but to judge of men by their wisdom and conduct, their industry, and application to business, which are characters that deserve respect. 2. To admire the wisdom and power of the Creator in the smallest and most despicable animals, in an ant as in an elephant. 3. To blame ourselves who do not act so much for our own true interest as the meanest creatures do for theirs. 4. Not to despise the weak things of the world. There are those that are little upon the earth, poor in the world, and of small account, and yet are exceeding wise, wise for their souls and another world, and those are exceeding wise, wiser than their neighbours. Margin, 'They are wise, made wise,' by the special instinct of nature; all that are wise to salvation are made wise by the grace of God. Those he instanceth in are,

First. The ants; minute animals, and very weak, and yet they are very industrious in gathering proper food, and have a strange sagacity to do it in the summer, the proper time. This is so great a piece of wisdom, that we may learn of them to be wise for futurity, ch. vi. 6. When the ravening lions lack, and suffer hunger, the laborious ants have plenty, and know no want.

Secondly. The conies, or, as some rather understand it, the Arabian mice, field-mice; weak creatures, and very timorous, yet they have so much wisdom as to "make their houses in the rocks," where they are well guarded, and their feebleness makes them take shelter in those natural fastnesses and fortifications. Sense of our own indigence and weakness should drive us to Him that is a rock higher than we, for shelter and support; there let us make our habitation.

Thirdly. "The locusts;" they are little also, and "have no king" as the bees have, but "they go forth all of them by bands," like an army in battle array; and, observing such good order among themselves, it is not any inconvenience to them that they have no king. They are called God's great army, Joel ii. 25; for, when he pleaseth, he musters, he marshals them, and wages war by them, as he did upon Egypt. 'They go forth all of them gathered together;' so the margin. Sense of weakness should engage us to keep together, that we may strengthen the hands one of another.

Fourthly. The spider; an insect, but as great an instance of industry in our houses as the ants are in the field. Spiders are very ingenious in weaving their webs with a fineness and exactness such as no art can pretend to come near; they "take hold with their hands," and spin a fine thread out of their own bowels, with a great deal of art; and they are not only in poor men's cottages, but in kings' palaces, notwithstanding all the care that is there taken to destroy them. Providence wonderfully keeps up these species of creatures, not only which men provide not for, but which every man's hand is against, and seeks the destruction of. Those that will mind their business, and take hold of it with their hands, shall be in kings' palaces, sooner or later will get preferment, and may go on with it, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements they meet with. If one well-spun web be swept away, it is but making another.

29 There be three things which go well,
Yea, four are comely in going:
30 A lion which is strongest among beasts,
And turneth not away for any;
31 A greyhound; an he goat also;
And a king, against whom there is no rising up.
32 If thou hast done foolishly in lifting up thyself,
Or if thou hast thought evil,
Lay thine hand upon thy mouth
33 Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter,
And the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood:
So the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife.

Here is, First. An enumeration of four things that are majestic and stately in their going, which look great:

1. A lion, the king of beasts, because strongest among beasts, and among beasts it is strength that gives the preeminence; but it is pity it should do so among men, whose wisdom is their honour, not their strength and force. The lion turns not away, nor alters his pace for fear of any pursuers, since he knows he is too hard for them. Herein the righteous are bold as a lion, that they turn not away from their duty for fear of any difficulty they meet with in it.

2. A greyhound, that is girt in the loins, and fit for running; or, as the margin reads it, a horse, which ought not to be omitted among the creatures that are comely in going, for so he is, especially when he is dressed up in his harness or trappings.

3. A he goat; the comeliness of whose going is when he goes first, and leads the flock. It is the comeliness of a Christian's going, to go first in a good work, and to lead others in the right way.

4. A king; who when he appears in his majesty is looked upon with reverence and awe, and all agree there is no rising up against him. None can compare with him, none can contend with him; whoever doth it, it is at his peril; and, if there is no rising up against an earthly prince, woe to him then that strives with his Maker. It is intended that we should learn courage and fortitude in all virtuous actions from the lion, and not to turn away for any difficulty we meet with; from the greyhound we may learn quickness and despatch; from the he goat, the care of our family, and those under our charge; and from a king, to have our children in subjection with all gravity; and from them all to go well, and to order the steps of our conversation, so as that we may not only be safe, but comely in going.

Secondly. A caution to us to keep our temper at all times, and under all provocations, and to take heed of carrying our resentments too far upon any occasion, especially when there is a king in the case, against whom there is no rising up; when it is a ruler, or our superior, that is offended; nay, the rule is always the same.

1. We must bridle and suppress our own passion, and take shame to ourselves whenever we are justly charged with a fault, and not insist upon our own innocency. If we have lifted up ourselves, either in a proud conceit of ourselves or a peevish opposition to those that are over us, if we have transgressed would not have spoken of himself as Agur does in verses 2, 3; nor can we accept the opinions of those who imagine that Ithiel and Ucal are names of the Messiah.

xxx. 15. The horseleech is very probably referred to here, as our translators and many others have supposed, neither is there any ground for the suggestion that some wholly or semi-fabulous blood-sucking monster is meant, as has been thought by a few eccentric critics. The leech is a symbol of rapacity, and it is represented as having two daughters, "Give, Give;" not crying "give, give," as our translation has it, but so called. The words may be contrasted with the petitions in verse 8: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me."

xxx. 17. The word for "valley" more aptly describes the ravines or wadys of hilly districts in and around Palestine. The raven has a habit of picking out the eyes of its victims, whether dead or alive. The eagle here intended is perhaps the great griffon vulture.

the laws of our place and station, we have therein done foolishly. Those that magnify themselves over others, or against others that are haughty and insolent, they do but shame themselves, and betray their own weakness; nay, if we have but thought evil, if we be conscious to ourselves that we have harboured an ill design in our minds, or it has been suggested to us, we must lay our hand upon our mouth; that is, 1st. We must humble ourselves for what we have done amiss, and even lie in the dust before God in sorrow for it, as Job did when he repented of what he had said foolishly, ch. xl. 4, "I will lay my hand upon my mouth," and as the convicted leper, "put a covering upon his upper lip." If we have done foolishly we must not stand in it before men, but by silence own our guilt, which will be the best way of appeasing those we have offended. 2nd. We must keep the evil thought we have conceived in our minds from breaking out in any evil speeches. Do not give the evil thought an imprimatur,—'a license;' allow it not to be published, but "lay thy hand upon thy mouth," use a holy violence with thyself, if need be, and enjoin thyself silence; as Christ suffered not the evil spirits to speak. It is bad to think ill, but it is much worse to speak it; for that implies a consent to the evil thought, and a willingness to infect others with it.

2. We must not irritate the passions of others. Some are so very provoking in their words and carriage, that they even force wrath, they make those about them angry, whether they will or no, and put them into a passion, who are not only not inclined to it, but resolved against it. Now this "forcing of wrath brings forth strife," and where that is, there is confusion, and every evil work. As the violent agitation of the cream fetcheth all the good out of the milk, and the hard wringing of the nose will extort blood from it, so this forcing of wrath wastes both the body and spirits of a man, and robs him of all the good that is in him. Or, as it is in the churning of milk, and the wringing of the nose, that is done by force which otherwise would not be done, so the spirit is heated by degrees with strong passions; one angry word begets another, and that a third; one passionate debate makes work for another, and so it goes on, till it ends at length in irreconcilable feuds. Let nothing therefore be said or done with violence, but every thing with softness and calmness.

CHAPTER XXXI.

This chapter is tacked to Solomon's proverbs, some think because it is of the same author, supposing king Lemuel to be king Solomon; others only because it is of the same nature, though left in writing by another author, called Lemuel; however it be, it is a prophecy, and therefore given by inspiration and direction of God, which Lemuel was under in the writing of it and putting it into this form, as his mother was in dictating to him the matter of it. Here is, I. An exhortation to Lemuel, a young prince, to take heed of the sins he would be tempted to, and to do the duties of the place he was called to, ver. 1—9. II. The description of a virtuous woman, especially in the relation of a wife, and the mistress of a family, which Lemuel's mother drew up, not as an encomium of herself, though, no doubt, it was her own true picture, but either as an instruction to her daughters, as the foregoing verses were to her son, or as a direction to her son in the choice of a wife. She must be chaste and modest, diligent and frugal, dutiful to her husband, careful of her family, discreet in her discourse, and in the education of her children, and, above all, conscientious in her duty to God; such a one as this, if he can find her, will make him happy, ver. 10—31.

THE words of king Lemuel,
The prophecy that his mother taught him.
2 What, my son?
And what, the son of my womb?
And what, the son of my vows?
3 Give not thy strength unto women,
Nor thy ways to that which destroyeth kings.
4 It is not for kings, O Lemuel,
It is not for kings to drink wine;
Nor for princes strong drink:
5 Lest they drink, and forget the law,
And pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted.
6 Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish,
And wine unto those that be of heavy hearts.
7 Let him drink, and forget his poverty,
And remember his misery no more.
8 Open thy mouth for the dumb
In the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction.
9 Open thy mouth, judge righteously,
And plead the cause of the poor and needy.

Most interpreters are of opinion that Lemuel is Solomon; the name signifies one that is for God, or devoted to God; and so it agrees well enough with that honourable name, which by Divine appointment was given to Solomon, 2 Sam. xii. 25, Jedidiah, 'beloved of the Lord.' Lemuel is supposed to be a pretty, fond, endearing name, by which his mother used to call him, and so much did he value himself upon the interest he had in his mother's affections, that he was not ashamed to call himself by it; and one would the rather incline to think it is Solomon that here tells us what his mother taught him, because he tells us, ch. iv. 4, what his father taught him. But some think, (and the conjecture is not improbable,) that Lemuel was a prince of some neighbouring country, whose mother was a daughter of Israel, perhaps of the house of David, and taught him these good lessons. Note, 1. It is the duty of mothers, as well as fathers, to teach their children what is good, that they may do it, and what is evil, that they may avoid it. When they are young and tender, they are most under the mother's eye, and she has then an opportunity of moulding and fashioning their minds well, which she ought not to let slip. 2. Even kings must be catechized. The greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of God. 3. Those that are grown up to maturity should often call to mind, and make mention of, the good instructions they received when they were children for their own admonition, the edification of others, and the honour of those who were the guides of their youth. Now in this mother's (this queen mother's) catechism, observe,

First. Her expostulation with the young prince, by which she lays hold of him, claims an interest in him, and awakens his attention to what she was about to say; ver. 2, "What, my son," what shall I say to thee? She speaks as one considering what advice to give him, and choosing out words to reason with him, so full of concern is she for his welfare; or, What is this that thou dost? It seems to be a chiding question. She observed when he was young that he was too much inclined to women and wine, and therefore she found it necessary to take him to task, and deal roundly with him; What, my son? Is this the course of life thou intendest to lead? Have I taught thee no better than thus? I must reprove thee, and reprove thee sharply, and thou must take it well, for,

1. Thou art descended from me, thou art "the son of my womb;" and therefore, what I say comes from the authority and affection of a parent, and cannot be suspected to come from any ill-will. Thou art a piece of myself. I bore thee with sorrow, and I expect no other return for all the pains I have taken with thee, and undergone for thee, but this only, be wise and good, and then I am well paid.

2. Thou art devoted to my God, thou art "the son of my vows;" the son I prayed to God to give me, and promised to give back to God, and did so, (thus Samuel was the son of Hannah's vows;) thou art the son I have often prayed to God to give his grace to, Ps. lxxii. 1; and shall a child of so many prayers miscarry? and shall all my hopes concerning thee be disappointed? Our children that by baptism are dedicated to God, for whom, and in whose name, we covenanted with God, may well be called the children of our vows; and as this may be made a good plea with God in our prayers for them, so it may be made a good plea with them in the instructions we give them. We may tell them they are baptized, are the children of our vows, and it is at their peril if they break those bonds in sunder which in their infancy they were solemnly brought under.

Secondly. The caution she gives him against the two destroying sins of uncleanness and drunkenness, which, if he allowed himself in them, would certainly be his ruin.

1. Against uncleanness; ver. 3, "Give not thy strength unto women," unto strange women. He must not be soft and effeminate, nor spend that time in a vain conversation with the ladies which should be spent in getting knowledge and despatching business, nor empty that wit (which is the strength of the soul) in courting and complimenting them, which he should employ about the affairs of his government. Especially shun all adultery, fornication, and lasciviousness, which wastes the strength of the body, and brings it into dangerous diseases. Give not thy ways, thy affections, thy conversation, to that which destroys kings, which has destroyed many; which gave such a shock to the kingdom even of David himself, in the matter of Uriah. Let others' harms be thy warnings. It lessens the honour of kings, and makes them mean; are those fit to govern others that are themselves slaves to their own lusts? It makes them unfit for business, and fills their court with the basest and worst of animals. Kings lie exposed to temptations of this kind, having wherewith both to please the humours and to bear the charges of the sin, and therefore they ought to double their guard, and, if they would preserve their people from the unclean spirit, must themselves be patterns of purity. And meaner people may apply it to themselves; let none give their strength to that which destroys souls.

2. Against drunkenness, ver. 4, 5. He must not drink wine or strong drink to excess; must never sit to drink, as they used to do "in the day of their king," when "the princes made him sick with bottles of wine," Hos. vii. 5. Whatever temptation he might be in by the excellency of the wine, or the charms of the company, he must deny himself, and be strictly sober. Considering, 1st. The indecency of drunkenness in a king. However some may call it a fashionable accomplishment and entertainment, "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings," to allow themselves that liberty; it is a disparagement to their dignity, and profanes their crown by muddling the head that wears it; that which for the time unmans them doth for the time unking them. Shall we say they are gods? no, they are worse than the beasts that perish. All Christians are made to our God kings and priests, and must apply this to themselves: it is not for Christians to drink to excess; they debase themselves if they do. It ill becomes the heirs of the kingdom, and the spiritual priests, Lev. x. 9. 2nd. The ill consequences of it; ver. 5, "Lest they drink" away their understandings and memories; drink, "and forget the law" by which they are to govern; and so, instead of doing good with their power, do hurt with it, "and pervert," or alter "the judgment of all the sons of affliction," and when they should right them, wrong them, and add to their affliction. It is a sad complaint which is made of the priests and prophets, Isa. xxviii. 7, that "they have erred through wine," and "through strong drink they are out of the way;" and the effect is as ill in kings, who, when they are drunk or intoxicated with the love of wine, cannot but stumble in judgment. Judges must have clear heads, which those cannot have who so often make themselves giddy, and incapacitate themselves to judge of the most common things.

Thirdly. The counsel she gives him to do good.

1. He must do good with his wealth. Great men must not think that they have their abundance, only that out of it they may make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts of it, and may the more freely indulge their own genius; no, but that with it they may relieve such as are in distress, ver. 6, 7. Thou hast wine and strong drink at command, instead of doing thyself hurt with it do others good with it; let them have it that need it. Those that have wherewithal, must not only give bread to the hungry, and water to the thirsty, but they must "give strong drink to him that is ready to perish" through sickness or pain, and wine to those that are melancholy, and of heavy heart; for it was appointed to cheer and revive the spirits, and make glad the heart, as it doth where there is need of it, not to burthen and oppress the spirits, as it doth where there is no need of it. We must deny ourselves in the gratifications of sense, that we may have to spare for the relief of others' miseries, and be glad to see our superfluities and dainties better bestowed upon those whom they will be a real kindness to, than upon ourselves whom they will be a real injury to. Let those that are ready to perish drink soberly, and it will be a means so to revive their drooping spirits that they will "forget their poverty" for the time, and "remember their misery no more," and so be the better able to bear it. The Jews say, that upon this was grounded the practice of giving a stupifying drink to condemned prisoners when they were going to execution, as they did to our Saviour; but the scope of the place is to shew that wine is a cordial, and therefore to be used for want, and not for wantonness; by those only that need cordials, as Timothy, who is advised to drink a little wine only for his stomach's sake, and his often infirmities, 1 Tim. v. 23.

2. He must do good with his power, his knowledge, and interest; must administer justice with care, and courage, and compassion, ver. 8, 9. 1st. He must himself take cognizance of the causes his subjects have depending in his courts, and inspect what his judges and officers do, that he may support those that do their duty, and lay those aside that neglect it, or are partial. 2nd. He must in all matters that were before him judge righteously, and without fear of the face of man,—boldly pass sentence according to equity. "Open thy mouth," which notes the liberty of speech that princes and judges ought to use in passing sentence; and some observe, that wise men only open their mouths, for fools have their mouths always open; are full of words. 3rd. He

xxx. 19. The word for "air" is the one usually rendered "heaven," which describes all space external to this earth. The word for "maid" signifies a virgin, as in Isa. vii. 14.

xxx. 23. "Handmaid" here means only a maid-servant, and not a concubine. That servants did sometimes become heirs to their employers is clear from Gen. xv. 2, 3.

xxx. 25. The question as to the provision made by ants is referred to in a note on chap. vi. 8.

xxx. 26. See note on Psa. civ. 18. Dr. Tristram says, "The habits of the coney (hyrax) are very accurately portrayed in the Psalms and in Proverbs." The coney, or rabbit of England, has not been observed in Palestine; but the hyrax is common.

xxx. 27. That locusts are gregarious, and are without any apparent leader in their movements, are well-known facts.

xxx. 28. Some think the so-called spider here is a sort of lizard; but the Chaldee explains it as in our version.

must especially look upon himself as obliged to be the patron of oppressed innocency; the inferior magistrates perhaps had not zeal and tenderness enough to "plead the cause of the poor and needy," therefore the king himself must interpose, and appear as an advocate. First. For those that were unjustly charged with capital crimes, as Naboth was, that were appointed to destruction, to gratify the malice either of a particular person or a party. It is a case which it well befits a king to appear in for the preserving of innocent blood. Secondly. For those that had actions unjustly brought against them, to defraud them of their right, because they were poor and needy, and unable to defend it, not having wherewithal to fee counsel; in such a case also kings must be advocates for the poor. Especially, Thirdly. For those that were dumb, and knew not how to speak for themselves, either through weakness or fear, or being over-talked by the prosecutor, or over-awed by the court. It is generous to speak for those that cannot speak for themselves; that are absent, or have not words at command, or are timorous. Our law appoints the judge to be of counsel for the prisoner.

10 Who can find a virtuous woman?
For her price is far above rubies.
11 The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her,
So that he shall have no need of spoil.
12 She will do him good and not evil
All the days of her life.
13 She seeketh wool, and flax,
And worketh willingly with her hands.
14 She is like the merchants' ships;
She bringeth her food from afar.
15 She riseth also while it is yet night,
And giveth meat to her household,
And a portion to her maidens.
16 She considereth a field, and buyeth it:
With the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard.
17 She girdeth her loins with strength,
And strengtheneth her arms.
18 She perceiveth that her merchandise is good:
Her candle goeth not out by night.

SPINNING.

19 She layeth her hands to the spindle,
And her hands hold the distaff.
20 She stretcheth out her hand to the poor;
Yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy.
21 She is not afraid of the snow for her household:
For all her household are clothed with scarlet.
22 She maketh herself coverings of tapestry;
Her clothing is silk and purple.
23 Her husband is known in the gates,
When he sitteth among the elders of the land.
24 She maketh fine linen, and selleth it;
And delivereth girdles unto the merchant.
25 Strength and honour are her clothing;
And she shall rejoice in time to come.
26 She openeth her mouth with wisdom;
And in her tongue is the law of kindness.
27 She looketh well to the ways of her household,
And eateth not the bread of idleness.
28 Her children arise up, and call her blessed;
Her husband also, and he praiseth her.
29 Many daughters have done virtuously,
But thou excellest them all.
30 Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain:
But a woman that feareth the LORD, she shall be praised.
31 Give her of the fruit of her hands;
And let her own works praise her in the gates.

TAPESTRY, OR DRESSES OF NEEDLEWORK.—ver. 22.

This description of the virtuous woman is designed to shew what wives the women should make, and what wives the men should choose. It consists of twenty-two verses, each beginning with a several letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order, as some of the psalms, which makes some think it was no part of the lesson which Lemuel's mother taught him, but a poem by itself, written by some other hand; and perhaps had been commonly repeated among the pious Jews, for the ease of which it was made alphabetical. We have the abridgment of it in the New Testament, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10; 1 Pet. iii. 1—6; where the duty prescribed to wives agrees with this description of a good wife. And with good reason is so much stress laid upon it, since it contributes as much as any one thing to the keeping up of religion in families, and the entail of it upon posterity, that the mothers be wise and good; and of what consequence it is to the wealth and outward prosperity of a house, every one is sensible. He that will thrive must ask his wife leave. Here is,

First. A general inquiry after such a one, ver. 10. where observe. 1. The person inquired after, and that is "a virtuous woman." 'A woman of strength,' so the word is, though the weaker vessel, yet made strong by wisdom and grace, and the fear of God. It is the same word that is used in the character of good judges, Ex. xviii. 21, that they are able men, men qualified for the business to which they are called,—men of truth, fearing God. So it follows, a virtuous woman is a woman of spirit, that is, that has the command of her own spirit, and knows how to manage other people's; one that is pious and industrious, and a help-meet for a man. In opposition to this strength, we read of the weakness of the heart of an imperious whorish woman, Eze. xvi. 30. A virtuous woman is a woman of resolution, that, having espoused good principles, is firm and steady to them, and will not be frightened with winds and clouds from any part of her duty. 2. The difficulty of meeting with such a one; "Who can find her?" Which intimates, that good women are very scarce, and many that seem to be so do not prove so, but he that thought he had found a virtuous woman was deceived; behold it was Leah, and not the Rachel he expected. But he that designs to marry ought to seek diligently for such a one, to have this principally in his eye in all his inquiries, and to take heed that he be not biassed by beauty or gaiety, wealth or parentage, dressing well or dancing well, for all these may be, and yet the woman not virtuous; and there is many a woman truly virtuous who yet is not recommended by these advantages. 3. The unspeakable worth of such a one, and the value which he that hath such a wife ought to put upon her, and to shew it by his thankfulness to God, and his kindness and respect to her, whom he must never think he can do too much for. "Her price is far above rubies," and all the rich ornaments with which vain women adorn themselves. And the more rare such good wives are, the more they are to be valued.

Secondly. A particular description of her, and of her excellent qualifications. 1. She is very industrious to recommend herself to her husband's esteem and affection. Those that are good really will be good relatively. A good woman, if she be brought into the married state, will be a good wife, and make it her business to please her husband, 1 Cor. vii. 34. Though she is a woman of spirit herself, yet her desire is to her husband, to know his mind, that she may accommodate herself to it, and she is willing that he rule over her.

1st. She carries herself so that he may repose an entire confidence in her,—in her chastity, which she never gave him the least occasion to suspect, or to entertain any jealousy of. She is not morose and reserved, but modest and grave, and has all the marks of virtue in her countenance and carriage. Her husband knows it, and therefore his "heart doth safely trust in her;" he is easy, and makes her so. He trusts in her conduct, that she will speak in all companies, and act in all affairs, with prudence and discretion, so as not to occasion him either damage or reproach. He trusts in her fidelity to his interests, and that she will never betray his counsels, or have any interest separate from that of his family. When he goes abroad to attend the concerns of the public, he can confide in her to order all his affairs at home as well as if he himself were there. She is a good wife that is fit to be trusted, and he a good husband that will leave it to such a wife to manage for him.

2nd. She contributes so much to his content and satisfaction, that "he shall have no need of spoil;" he needs not be griping and scraping at road, as those must be whose wives are proud and wasteful at home. She manages his affairs so that he is always beforehand; hath such plenty of his own that he is in no temptation to prey upon his neighbours. He thinks himself so happy in her that he envies not those who have most of the wealth of this world; he needs it not; he has enough, having such a wife. Happy the couple that have such a satisfaction as this in each other!

3rd. She makes it her constant business to do him good, and is afraid of doing any thing, even through inadvertency, that may turn to his prejudice, ver. 12. She shews her love to him, not by a foolish fondness, but by prudent endearments, accommodating herself to his temper, and not crossing him, giving him good words, and not ill ones, no, not when he is out of humour. Studying to make him easy, to provide what is fit for him both in health and sickness, and attending him with diligence and tenderness when anything ails him; and would not for the world wilfully do any thing that might be a damage to his person, family, estate, or reputation. And this is her care all the days of her life; not at first only, or now and then, when she is in a good humour, but perpetually; and she is not weary of the good offices she doth him. She doth him good, not only all the days of his life, but of her own too; if she survive him, still she is doing him good in her care of his children, his estate, and good name, and all the concerns he left behind him. We read of kindness shewn, not only to the living, but to the dead, Ru. ii. 20.

4th. She adds to his reputation in the world; ver. 23, "Her husband is known in the gates," known to have a good wife. By his wise counsels, and prudent management of affairs, it appears that he has a discreet companion in his bosom, by conversation with whom he improves himself. By his cheerful countenance, and pleasant humour, it appears that he has an agreeable wife at home; for many that have not have their tempers strangely soured by it. Nay, by his appearing clean and neat in his dress, every thing about him decent and handsome, and not gaudy, one may know he has a good wife at home that takes care of his clothes.

xxx. 31. The greyhound of the text is called a horse in the margin, and other suggestions are, war-horse, eagle, cock, wrestler, stag. The Hebrew literally means "he that is girt about the loins," which could scarcely be spoken except of a man or a horse. The Greeks used a similar expression to signify active or nimble, or merely in marching order, ready for action.

xxx. 33. "Churning" is scarcely the word here. It is in the Hebrew the same as that rendered "wringing" in this verse. The reference seems to be to the pressure by which the whey or watery parts must be separated from curds, or from the butter after churning.

xxxi. 1. We have here another appendix to the Book of Proverbs, certainly in form, and probably in fact. As no King Lemuel is known, various suppositions have been made, the most common of which is that Solomon is meant. On referring to the ancient versions we find our version agreeing with the Chaldee and the Latin. The

2. She is one that takes pains in the duty of her place, and takes pleasure in it. This part of her character is much enlarged upon here.

1st. She hates to sit still and do nothing; "She eats not the bread of idleness," ver. 27. Though she needs not work for her bread, she has an estate to live upon, yet she will not eat it in idleness, because she knows we were none of us sent into this world to be idle; and when we have nothing to do, the devil will soon find us something to do; and those that will not labour it is not fit they should eat. Some eat and drink because they can find themselves nothing else to do, and needless visits must be received with fashionable entertainments. These are eating the bread of idleness, which she has no relish of at all, for she neither gives nor receives idle visits, or idle talk.

2nd. She is careful to fill up time, that none of that be lost. When daylight is done, she doth not then think it time to lay by her work, as those are forced to do whose business lies abroad in the field, Ps. civ. 23; but, her business lying within doors, and her work worth candlelight, with that she lengthens out the day, and "her candle goes not out by night," ver. 18. It is a mercy to have candlelight to supply the want of daylight; and a duty, having that advantage, to improve it. We say of an elaborate piece, that it smells of the lamp.

3rd. "She riseth" early, "while it is night," ver. 15, to give her servants their breakfast, that they may be ready to go cheerfully about their work as soon as the day breaks. She is none of those who sit up playing at cards, or dancing till midnight, till morning, and then lie in bed till noon; no, the virtuous woman loves her business better than her ease, or her pleasure, is in care to be found in the way of her duty every hour of the day, and has more true satisfaction in having "given meat to her household" betimes in the morning, than those can have in the money they have won, much more in what they have lost, who sat up all night at play. Those that have a family to take care of should not love their bed too well in a morning.

4th. She applies herself to the business that is proper for her. It is not in scholar's business, or statesman's business, or husbandman's business, that she employs herself, but in women's business; "She seeks wool and flax," where she may have the best of each, at the best hand, and best cheap, has a stock of both by her, and every thing that is necessary to the carrying on both of the woollen and linen manufacture, ver. 13; and with this she doth not only set the poor on work, which is a very good office, but doth herself work, and work willingly with her hands; she works with the counsel, or delight of her hands, so the word is; she goes about it cheerfully and dexterously; not only lays her hand, but her mind to it, and goes on in it without weariness in well-doing. "She lays her own hands to the spindle," or spinning-wheel, "and her hands hold the distaff," ver. 19; and she doth not reckon it either an abridgment of her liberty, or a disparagement to her dignity, or at all inconsistent with her repose. The spindle and the distaff are here mentioned as her honour, while the ornaments of the daughters of Zion are reckoned up to their reproach, Isa. iii. 18.

5th. She doth what she doth with all her might, and doth not trifle in it, ver. 17. "She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms." She doth not employ herself in sitting-work only, or in that which is only the nice performance of the fingers, (there are works that are scarce one remove from doing nothing,) but, if there be occasion, she will go through with work that requires all the strength she has, which she will use as one that knows it is the way to have more.

3. She is one that makes what she doth to turn to a good account, by her prudent management of it. She doth not toil all night and catch nothing; no, "She herself perceives that her merchandize is good," ver. 18. She is sensible that in all her labour there is profit, and that encourageth her to go on in it. She perceives that she can make things herself better and cheaper than she can buy them. She finds, by observation, what branch of her employment brings in the best returns, and that she applies herself most closely to.

1st. She brings in provisions of all things necessary and convenient for her family, ver. 14. No merchant's ships, no, not Solomon's navy, ever made a more advantageous return than her employments do. Do they bring in foreign commodities with the effects they export? so doth she with the fruit of her labours. What her own ground doth not produce, she can furnish herself with it if she have occasion for it, by exchanging her own goods for it, and so "she brings her food from afar." Not that she values things the more for their being far-fetched, but if they be never so far off, if she must have them, she knows how to come by them.

2nd. She purchaseth lands, and enlargeth the demesne of the family; ver. 16, "She considereth a field, and buyeth it." She considers what an advantage it will be to the family, and what a good account it will turn to, and therefore she buys it; or rather, though she have never so much mind of it, she will not buy it till she has first considered it, whether it be worth her money, whether she can afford to take so much money out of her stock as must go to purchase it; whether the title be good, whether the ground will answer the character given of it, and whether she have money at command to pay for it. Many have undone themselves by buying without considering, but those who would make advantageous purchases, must consider, and then buy. She also plants a vineyard, but it is with the fruit of her hands; she doth not take up money, or run into debt to do it, but she doth it with what she can spare out of the gains of her own housewifery. Men should not lay out any thing upon superfluities, till, by the blessing of God upon their industry, they are got beforehand, and can afford it. And then the fruit of the vineyard is likely to be doubly sweet, when it is the fruit of honest industry.

3rd. She furnisheth her house well, and has good clothing for herself and her family; ver. 22, "She maketh herself coverings of tapestry" to hang her rooms, and she may be allowed to use them when they are of her own making; her own clothing is rich and fine, it is silk and purple, according to her place and rank. Though she is not so vain as to spend much time in dressing her, nor make the putting on of apparel her adorning, nor values herself by it, yet she has rich clothes, and puts them on well. The senator's robes her husband wears are of her own spinning, and they look better, and wear better, than any that is bought. She also gets good warm clothing for her children, and her servants' liveries; she needs not fear the cold of the most pinching winter, for she and her family are well provided with clothes, sufficient to keep out cold, which is the end chiefly to be aimed at in clothing. "All her household are clothed in scarlet," strong cloth, and fit for winter, and yet rich, and making a good appearance. 'They are all double clothed,' so some read it; have change of raiment, a winter suit and a summer suit.

4th. She trades abroad. She makes more than she and her household have occasion for, and therefore, when she has sufficiently stocked her family, she "sells fine linen and girdles to the merchants," ver. 24, who carry them to Tyre, the mart of the nations, or some other trading city. Those families are likely to thrive that sell more than they buy, as it is well with the kingdom when abundance of its home manufactures are exported. It is no disgrace to those of the best quality to sell what they can spare, nor to deal in trade, and send ventures by sea.

5th. She lays up for hereafter. "She shall rejoice in time to come," having laid in a good stock for her family, and having good portions for her children. Those that take pains when they are in their prime will have the pleasure and joy of it when they are old, both in reflecting upon it, and reaping the benefit of it.

4. She takes care of her family, and all the affairs of it; "gives meat to her household," ver. 15; to every one their portion of meat in due season, so that none of her servants have reason to complain of being kept short, or faring hard. She gives also a portion, that is, an allotment of work, as well as meat, to her maidens; they shall each of them know their business, and have their task. "She looks well to the ways of her household," ver. 27: that is, she inspects the manners of all her servants, that she may check what is amiss among them, and oblige them all to carry themselves decently, and do their duty to God and one another, as well as to her; as Job, who put away iniquity far from his tabernacle, and David, who would suffer no wicked thing in his house. She doth not intermeddle in the concerns of other people's houses; she thinks it enough for her to look well to her own.

5. She is charitable to the poor, ver. 20. She is as intent upon giving as she is upon getting; often serves the poor with her own hand, and she doth it freely, and cheerfully, and very liberally, with an outstretched hand. Nor doth she relieve her poor neighbours only, and those that are nigh at hand, but "she reacheth forth her hands to the needy" that are at a distance; seeking opportunities to do good, and to communicate, which is as good housewifery as any thing she doth.

6. She is discreet and obliging in all her discourse, not talkative, censorious, or peevish, as some are that know how to take pains; no, "she opens her mouth with wisdom." When she doth speak, it is with a great deal of prudence, and very much to the purpose; you may perceive by every word she saith how much she governs herself by the rules of wisdom. She not only takes prudent measures herself, but gives prudent advice to others; and this not as assuming the authority of a dictator, but with the affection of a friend, and an obliging air; "In her tongue is the law of kindness;" that is, all she saith is under the government of that law. The law of love and kindness is written in the heart, but it shews itself in the tongue. If we are kindly affectioned one to another, it will appear by affectionate expressions. It is called a law of kindness, because it gives law to others, to all she converseth with; her wisdom and kindness together put a commanding power into all she saith, they command respect, they command compliance. "How forcible are right words!" 'In her tongue is the law of grace,' or mercy, so some read it, and understand it of the word and law of God, which she delights to talk of among her children and servants. She is full of pious, religious discourse, and manageth it prudently; which shews how full her heart is of another world, even when her hands are most busy about this world.

7. That which completes and crowns her character is, that she fears the Lord, ver. 30. With all those good qualities she lacks not that one thing needful; she is truly pious, and in all she doth is guided and governed by principles of conscience, and regard to God. This is that which is here preferred far before beauty, that is vain and deceitful; all that are wise and good account it so, and neither value themselves nor others by it. Beauty recommends none to God, nor is it any certain indication of wisdom and goodness, but has deceived many a man who has made his choice of a wife by it. There may be an impure, deformed soul lodged in a comely and beautiful body; nay, many have been exposed by their beauty to such temptations as have been the ruin of their virtue, their honour, and their precious souls. It is a fading thing at the best, and therefore vain and deceitful; a fit of sickness will stain and sully it in a little time; a thousand accidents may blast this flower in its prime. However, old age will certainly wither it, and death and the grave consume it. But the fear of God reigning in the heart is the beauty of the soul, it recommends those that have it to the favour of God, is in his sight of great price; it will last for ever, and bid defiance to death itself, which consumes the beauty of the body, but consummates the beauty of the soul.

Thirdly. The happiness of this virtuous woman.

1. She has the comfort and satisfaction of her virtue in her own mind; ver. 25, "Strength and honour are her clothing," in which she wraps herself, that is, enjoys herself, and in which she appears to the world, and so recommends herself. She enjoys a firmness and constancy of mind, has spirit to bear up under the many crosses and disappointments which even the wise and virtuous must expect to meet with in this world, and this is her clothing for defence as well as decency. She deals honourably with all, and she has the pleasure of doing so, and shall rejoice in time to come; she shall reflect upon it with comfort when she comes to be old, that she was not idle or useless when she was young; in the day of death it will be a pleasure to her to think that she has lived to some good purpose; nay, she shall rejoice in an eternity to come, shall be recompensed for her goodness with fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore.

2. She is a great blessing to her relations, ver. 28. 1st. "Her children" grow up in her place, and they "call her blessed. They give her their good word, they are themselves a commendation to her, and they are ready to give great commendations of her; they pray for her, and bless God that they had such a good mother. It is a debt which they owe her, a part of that honour which the fifth commandment requires to be paid to father and mother; and it is a double honour that is due to a good father and a good mother. 2nd. Her husband thinks himself so happy in her, that he takes all occasions to speak well of her, as one of the best of women. It is no indecency at all, but a laudable instance of conjugal love, for husbands and wives to give one another their due praises.

3. She gets the good word of all her neighbours, as Ruth did, whom all the city of her people knew to be a virtuous woman, Ru. iii. 11. Virtue will have its praise, Phil. iv. 8. A woman that fears the Lord shall have praise of God, Rom ii. 29, and of men too. It is here shewed, 1st. That she shall be highly praised; ver. 28, "Many have done virtuously." Virtuous women it seems are precious jewels, but not such rare jewels as was represented, ver. 10. There have been many, but such a one as this cannot be paralleled; who can find her equal? She excelleth them all. Note, Those that are good should aim and covet to excel in virtue. "Many daughters" in their father's house, and in the single state "have done virtuously;" but a good wife, if she be virtuous, excels them all, and doth more good in her place than they can do in theirs. Or, as some explain it, a man cannot have his house so well kept by good daughters as by a good wife. 2nd. That she shall be incontestably praised without contradiction, ver. 31. Some are praised above what is their due; but those that praise her do but "give her of the fruit of her hands;" that is, they give her that which she has dearly earned, and which is justly owing to her; she is wronged if she have it not. Note, Those ought to be praised, the fruit of whose hands is praiseworthy. The tree is known by its fruits, and therefore, if the fruit be good, the tree must have our good word. If her children be dutiful and respectful to her, and carry themselves as they ought, they then give her of the fruit of her hands; she reaps the benefit of all the care she has taken of them, and thinks herself well paid. Children must thus study to requite their parents, and this is shewing piety at home, 1 Tim. v. 4. But if men be unjust, the thing will speak itself; "her own works will praise her in the gates," openly before all the people. First. She leaves it to her own works to praise her, and doth not court the applause of men. Those are none of the truly virtuous women that love to hear themselves commended. Secondly. "Her own Syriac has, "Muel, the prophet-king." The Greek, which has the passage, along with part of chap. xxx., after chap. xxiv., renders it, "My words which were spoken by God: an admonition of a king, which his mother taught," or "whom his mother taught." It is best to take Lemuel as a proper name, and Solomon may be intended.

xxxi. 10. "A virtuous woman" is here literally a woman of ability, or an excellent woman.

xxxi. 19. Among many ancient nations, as in some modern ones, the spinning of flax into threads was chiefly the work of women.

xxxi. 21. For "scarlet" the margin has "double garments," and some think "splendid garments" should be understood.

xxxi. 22. It is not at all certain that silk was known to the Hebrews. More probably a fine white linen is meant, or a texture of cotton. The word for "tapestry" seems to include all kinds of ornamental coverings. "Purple" fabrics were chiefly from Tyre.

works will praise her." If her relations and neighbours altogether hold their peace, her good works will proclaim her praise. The widows gave the best encomium of Dorcas, when they "shewed the coats and garments she had made for the poor," Acts ix. 39. Thirdly. The least that can be expected from her neighbours is that they should let her own works praise her, and do nothing to hinder them. They that do that which is good, let them have praise of the same, Rom. xiii. 3; and let not us enviously say or do any thing to the diminishing of it, but be provoked by it to a holy emulation. Let none have an ill report from us that have a good report, even of the truth itself. Thus is shut up this looking-glass for ladies, which they are desired to open, and dress themselves by it; and if they do so, their adorning will be found to praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

Twenty chapters of the book of Proverbs, (beginning with ch. x. and ending with ch. xxix.,) consisting mostly of entire sentences in each verse, could not well be reduced to proper heads, and the contents of them gathered; I have, therefore, here put the contents of all these chapters together, which perhaps may be of some use to those who desire to see at once all that is said of any one head in these chapters. I take the heads in no method, but as they occurred in reading the chapters. Some of the verses, perhaps, I have not put under the same heads that another would have put them under, but the most of them fall, I hope, naturally enough to the places I have assigned them.

1. Of the comfort or grief parents have in their children, according as they are wise or foolish, godly or ungodly, ch. x. 1; xv. 20; xvii. 21, 25; xix. 13, 26; xxiii. 15, 16, 24, 25; xxvii. 11; xxix. 3.
2. Of the world's insufficiency, and religion's sufficiency, to make us happy, ch. x. 2, 3; xi. 4; and the preference to be therefore given to the gains of virtue above those of this world, ch. xv. 16, 17; xvi. 8, 16; xvii. 1; xix. 1; xxviii. 6, 11.
3. Of slothfulness and diligence, ch. x. 4, 26; xii. 11, 24, 27; xiii. 4, 23; xv. 19; xvi. 26; xviii. 9; xix. 15, 24; xx. 4, 13; xxi. 5, 25, 26; xxii. 13, 29; xxiv. 30—34; xxvi. 13—16; xxvii. 18, 23—27; xxviii. 19. Particularly the improving or neglecting opportunities, ch. vi. 6; x. 5.
4. The happiness of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked, ch. x. 6, 9, 16, 24, 25, 27—30; xi. 3, 5—8, 18—21, 31; xii. 2, 3, 7, 13, 14, 21, 26, 28; xiii. 6, 9, 14, 15, 21, 22, 25; xiv. 11, 14, 19, 32; xv. 6, 8, 9, 24, 26, 29; xx. 7; xxi. 12, 15, 16, 18, 21; xxii. 12; xxviii. 10, 18; xxix. 6.
5. Of honour and dishonour, ch. x. 7 xii. 8, 9; xviii. 3; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 21; and of vainglory, ch. xxv. 14, 27; xxvii. 2.
6. The wisdom of obedience, and folly of disobedience, ch. x. 8, 17; xii. 1, 15; xiii. 1, 13, 18; xv. 5, 10, 12, 31, 32; xix. 16; xxviii. 4, 7, 9.
7. Of mischievousness and unfulness, ch. x. 10, 23; xi. 9—11, 23, 27; xii. 5, 6, 12, 18, 20; xiii. 2; xiv. 22; xvi. 29, 30; xvii. 11; xxi. 10; xxiv. 8; xxvi. 23, 27.
8. The praise of wise and good discourse, and the hurt and shame of an ungoverned tongue, ch. x. 11, 13, 14, 20, 21, 31, 32; xi. 30; xiv. 3; xv. 2, 4, 7, 23, 28; xvi. 20, 23, 24; xvii. 7; xviii. 4, 7, 20, 21; xx. 15; xxi. 23; xxiii. 9; xxiv. 26; xxv. 11.
9. Of love and hatred, peaceableness and contention, ch. x. 12; xv. 17; xvii. 1, 9, 14, 19; xviii. 6, 17—19; xx. 3; xxv. 8; xxvi. 17, 21; xxix. 9.
10. Of the rich and poor, ch. x. 15, 22; xi. 28; xiii. 7, 8; xiv. 20, 24; xviii. 11, 23; xix. 1, 4, 7, 22; xxii. 2, 7; xxviii. 6, 11; xxix. 13.
11. Of lying, fraud, and dissimulation, and of truth and sincerity, ch. x. 18; xii. 17, 19, 22; xiii. 5; xvii. 4; xx. 14, 17; xxi. 8; xxvi. 18, 19, 24—26, 28.
12. Of slandering, ch. x. 18; xvi. 27; xxv. 23.
13. Of talkativeness and silence, ch. x. 19; xi. 12; xii. 23; xiii. 3; xvii. 27, 28; xxix. 11, 20.
14. Of justice and injustice, ch. xi. 1; xiii. 11; xvi. 8, 11; xvii. 15, 26; xviii. 5; xx. 10, 23; xxii. 28; xxiii. 10, 11; xxix. 24.
15. Of pride and humility, ch. xi. 2; xiii. 10; xv. 25, 33; xvi. 5, 18, 19; xviii. 12; xxi. 4; xxv. 6, 7; xxviii. 25; xxix. 23.
16. Of despising and respecting others, ch. xi. 12; xiv. 21.
17. Of tale-bearing, ch. xi. 13; xvi. 28; xviii. 8; xx. 19; xxvi. 20, 22.
18. Of rashness and deliberation, ch. xi. 14; xv. 22; xviii. 13; xix. 2; xx. 5, 18; xxi. 29; xxii. 3; xxv. 8—10.
19. Of suretiship, ch. xi. 15; xvii. 18; xx. 16; xxii. 26, 27; xxvii. 13.
20. Of good and bad women, or wives, ch. xi. 16, 22; xii. 4; xiv. 1; xviii. 22; xix. 13, 14; xxi. 9, 19; xxv. 24; xxvii. 15, 16.
21. Of mercifulness and unmercifulness, ch. xi. 17; xii. 10; xiv. 21; xix. 17; xxi. 13.
22. Of charity to the poor, and uncharitableness, ch. xi. 24—26; xiv. 31; xvii. 5; xxii. 9, 16, 22, 23; xxviii. 27; xxix. 7.
23. Of covetousness and contentment, ch. xi. 29; xv. 16, 17, 27; xxiii. 4, 5.
24. Of anger and meekness, ch. xii. 16; xiv. 17, 29; xv. 1, 18; xvi. 32; xvii. 12, 26; xix. 11, 19; xxii. 24, 25; xxv. 15, 28; xxvi. 21; xxix. 22.
25. Of melancholy and cheerfulness, ch. xii. 25; xiv. 10, 13; xv. 13, 15; xvii. 22; xviii. 14; xxv. 20, 25.
26. Of hope and expectation, ch. xiii. 12, 19.
27. Of prudence and foolishness, ch. xiii. 16; xiv. 8, 18, 33; xv. 14, 21; xvi. 21, 22; xvii. 24; xviii. 2, 15; xxiv. 3—7, 27; xxvi. 6—11; xxviii. 5.
28. Of treachery and fidelity, ch. xiii. 17; xxv. 13, 19.
29. Of good and bad company, ch. xiii. 20; xiv. 7; xxviii. 7; xxix. 3.
30. Of the education of children, ch. xiii. 24; xix. 18; xx. 11; xxii. 6, 15; xxiii. 12—14; xxix. 15, 17.
31. Of the fear of the Lord, ch. xiv. 2, 26, 27; xv. 16, 33; xvi. 6; xix. 23; xxii. 4; xxiii. 17, 18.
32. Of true and false witness-bearing, ch. xiv. 5, 25; xix. 5, 19, 28; xxi. 28; xxiv. 28; xxv. 18.
33. Of scorners, ch. xiv. 6, 9; xxi. 24; xxii. 10; xxiv. 9; xxix. 8.
34. Of credulity and caution, ch. xiv. 15, 16; xxvii. 12.
35. Of kings and their subjects, ch. xiv. 28, 34, 35; xvi. 10, 12—15; xix. 6, 12; xx. 2, 8, 26, 28; xxii. 11; xxiv. 23—25; xxv. 2—5; xxviii. 2, 3, 15, 16; xxix. 4, 12, 14, 26.
36. Of envy, especially envying sinners, ch. xiv. 30; xxiii. 17, 18; xxiv. 1, 2, 19, 20; xxvii. 4.
37. Of God's omniscience, and his universal providence, ch. xv. 3, 11; xvi. 1, 4, 9, 33; xvii. 3; xix. 21; xx. 12, 24; xxi. 1, 30, 31; xxix. 26.
38. Of a good and ill name, ch. xv. 30; xxii. 1.
39. Of men's good opinion of themselves, ch. xiv. 12; xvi. 2, 25; xx. 6; xxi. 2; xxvi. 12; xxviii. 26.
40. Of devotion towards God, and dependence on him, ch. xvi. 3; xviii. 10; xxiii. 26; xxvii. 1; xxviii. 25; xxix. 25.
41. Of the happiness of God's favour, ch. xvi. 7; xxix. 26.
42. Excitements to get wisdom, ch. xvi. 16; xviii. 1; xix. 8, 20; xxii. 17—21; xxiii. 15, 16, 22—25; xxiv. 13, 14; xxvii. 11.
43. Cautions against temptation, ch. xvi. 17; xix. 27.
44. Of old age and youth, ch. xvi. 31; xvii. 6; xx. 29.
45. Of servants, ch. xvii. 2; xix. 10; xxix. 19, 21.
46. Of bribery, ch. xvii. 8, 23; xviii. 16; xxi. 14; xxviii. 21.
47. Of reproof and correction, ch. xvii. 10; xix. 25, 29; xx. 30; xxi. 11; xxv. 12; xxvi. 3; xxvii. 5, 6, 22; xxviii. 23; xxix. 1.
48. Of ingratitude, ch. xvii. 13.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

CHAP. I.—20. Wisdom (Wisdoms Marg.) crieth without, &c. The cry, the chief place of concourse, the outpouring fountain of the Spirit are identified, Jno vii. 37, 38. This very remonstance, accompanied, as here, with a stirring invitation, is also given in prophecy from the Saviour's own mouth Isa lv. 1—3. The terms of the promise forbid any other than a personal application. We can easily conceive a spirit to have wisdom; but that an attribute of wisdom may dispense his Spirit or influence to others, is beyond conception. Moreover the Messiah assumed this personal title, (Mat. xxiii. 34, with Lu. xi. 49: and his apostle expressly gives it to him, (1 Cor. i. 24.) The plural noun, joined with a singular verb, (Marg. compare ch. ix. 1,) seems to point him out as the author and whole substance of all wisdom; 'the very wisdom of the most wise God, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and by whom rivers of wisdom are poured into man by the word,' (Glass. lib. iii. tract i. can. 24.) The future tense in the original may possibly give a prophetic character to the proclamation. Altogether, 'this interpretation gives to the exhortation of wisdom a peculiar majesty and emphasis; setting forth the eternal uncreated wisdom of the Father, using all means to draw men to God; both by his works and by his word, inviting all men to know the truth.'—Scott, Bishop Hall.—Exposition of the Book of Proverbs, by Rev. C. Bridges, M.A., from which work the remaining Notes on this book have, with the author's kind permission, been extracted.

CHAP. III.—5. Lean not to thine own understanding. It is, indeed, our plain duty, not to neglect our understanding, but to cultivate it diligently in all its Supplementary Notes.—Chap. xxiv. 23. The first part of this verse reads like a new heading to a section of the book. Grotius thought it meant that what followed was extracted from books later than the time of Solomon, who might still be the author of the maxims, &c.

xxiv. 26. It is not easy to explain this verse. The words are, "Lips shall he kiss who answereth right words." De Dieu says the verse signifies that "a good answer is as much as a kiss," or equivalent to a kiss.

xxiv. 27. This verse is regarded as somewhat obscure. It refers to three stages in a man's progress—the providing of the raw materials, the proper selection and getting ready of them, and their orderly construction. Men must begin and go on if they would end well. Lord Bacon understood it of farming as the way to wealth: "The improvement of the ground is the most natural obtaining of riches, for it is our great mother's blessing, the earth's; but it is slow; and yet, where men of great wealth do stoop to husbandry, faculties. In a world of such extended knowledge, ignorance is the fruit of sloth, dissipation, or misguided delusion; but lean not to thine understanding. Lean—trust in the Lord. Self-dependence is folly, ch. xxviii. 26; rebellion, Jer. ii. 13; ix. 23; ruin, Gen. iii. 5, 6; Isa. xlvii. 10, 11. 'The great folly of man in trials,' as Dr. Owen justly remarks, 'is leaning to or upon his own understanding and counsels. What is the issue of it? Whenever in our trials we consult our own understandings, hearken to self-reasonings, though they seem to be good, and tending to our preservation, yet the principle of living by faith is stifled, and we shall in the issue be cast down by our own counsels.'—Treatise on Temptation, ch. viii.; compare Job xviii. 7; Hos. x. 8.

CHAP. IV.—18. Shining light. Isa. lx. 20. The LXX. version is very beautiful—'The ways of the righteous shine like the light; they go on shining, until the day be perfected.' Dr. Watts' Hymn on the Summer Evening—written for the infant mind, but glowing to the finest taste—furnishes a most exquisite exposition of this verse,—

'How fine has the day been; how bright was the sun,' &c.

CHAP. VI.—20-35. And shall not this fearful picture of sin and its consequence (which Solomon, alas! was too well fitted to draw) teach us to avoid every thing that may be temptation; to be sensitive to the first intimations of its becoming so; to close every avenue of sense to the entrance of this seductive poison; to shun all communications that taint the purity of taste, that familiarize the mind with impurity, that give a vivid interest to associations from which a chaste imagination recoils with disgust? Let us learn to seek Divine strength to "watch and pray" continually; and, while we "think we stand, to take heed lest we fall," 1 Cor. x. 12.

CHAP. VIII.—1. Doth not wisdom cry? We assume the speaker to be personal, essential Wisdom. Apart from the general reasons before given, this description could not without unnatural force apply to an attribute. It sets out, I. Personal existence—brought forth—brought up—in conjunction with Deity—by him, ver. 24, 30. II. Personal properties, 1. Set up (anointed, Heb.) from everlasting, for distinct office, ver. 23. 2. The efficient cause in the work of creation, ver. 27—30. 3. Having wisdom, ver. 14; which, as an attribute itself, could not be the property of an attribute; and strength, ver. 14, an independent quality, not a property of wisdom. 4. Personal authority, ver. 15, 16. 5. Leading into the ways of truth ver. 19, 20. 6. Causing to inherit, ver. 21. III. Personal affections—hatred, ver. 13; love, ver. 17; joy, ver. 30, 31. IV. Giving personal promises, ver. 21. V. Commanding obedience as a matter of life and death, ver. 32—36. Whether Solomon fully understood his own words, may be a question, 1 Pet. i. 10; but receiving the words as from God, weighing their natural force, comparing them with Scripture parallels, we doubt not that they describe—not an attribute, but a person—Eternal—Omnipotent—in the most endearing relation to man—his Creator—Mediator—Saviour. 22. The Lord possessed me. It must be a perverted imagination that can suppose an attribute here. So glorious are the rays of eternal supreme Deity, distinct personality, and essential unity, that the mysterious, ever-blessed Being—"the Word, who was in the beginning with God, and was God," Jno. i. 1, 2, now undoubtedly stands before us. Curiously to pry into the mode of his subsistence, would be "intruding into those things which we have not seen," Col. ii. 18; compare 1 Tim. vi. 16. To receive his own revelation of himself is our reverential privilege.

CHAP. X.—12. But love covereth all sins. The first clause of the verse, compared with the apostle's application of the second, clearly proves that the subject is the covering of our brother's sin before men. Este—one of the most evangelical of the Romish interpreters—thus limits the application. The gloss therefore of man's covering sins before God is utterly groundless, compare ch. xvii. 9. Calvin and Geier conceive Jas. v. 20 to be only an allusion to the proverb. The latter adds—'It is one thing to cover sin before men; another thing to cover it before the Lord. The first is an act of love, (1 Cor. xiii. 4; Gal. vi. 2.) The last requires an infinite price, equal to the turning away of the eternal wrath of God,' Rom. iii. 25; 1 Jno. i. 7; Ps. xxxii. 1, &c.

CHAP. XI.—1. A just weight, (a perfect stone, marg.) In many shops in Palestine now the only weights in the balance are smooth stones. Narrative of Scottish Mission to the Jews.—Saphet, p. 274. Compare ch. xvi. 11, marg.

CHAP. XIII.—10. Only by pride cometh contention. This mischievous principle spreads in families, or among friends. 'Some point of honour must be maintained; some affront must be resented; some rival must be crushed or eclipsed; some renowned character emulated; or some superior equalled and surpassed.'—Scott, in loco. Even in trifling disputes between relatives or neighbours—perhaps between Christians—each party contends vehemently for his rights, instead of satisfying himself with the testimony of his conscience, and submitting rather to be misunderstood and misjudged than to break the bond of the Divine brotherhood, 1 Cor. vi. 7. In the wide field of the world we may well ask, "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not from this lust?" Jas. iv. 1; often has wounded pride, Jud. xii. 1—6, even without any proved injury, 2 Kin. xiv. 10, brought destructive contention upon a land.

CHAP. XIV.—26. In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence. The fear of the Lord—such is the Christian paradox—emboldens. Its childlike spirit shuts out all terrors of conscience, all forebodings of eternity. Confidence—strong confidence—issues out of it. Abraham sacrificed his son in the fear of God; yet fully confident, "that God was able to raise him up from the dead," Gen. xxii. 12, with Heb. xi. 17, 18. The fear of God led the Babylonish captives with unshaken confidence into the fiery furnace, Dan. iii. 16—19; and thus does the child of God, while walking in godly fear, rejoice in confidence, even in the most frowning dispensation, Job i. 1, with xiii. 15; Mic. vii. 7—9; Hab. iii. 16—19. His covenant privilege covers him, Jer. xxxii. 40; "and that wicked one toucheth him not," 1 Jno. v. 18: compare ch. iii. 21—26; xix. 23.

CHAP. XV.—7. Disperse knowledge. The "right use of knowledge" is, first to "lay it up" in a storehouse, ch. x. 14, with ver. 2; then out of the storehouse to disperse it. The sower scatters the seed in the furrow, and calculates it, on a proportionate harvest, 2 Cor. ix. 6. Thus the lips of the wise disperse the precious seed, "giving a portion to seven, and also to eight;" not discouraged by trifling difficulties, but "sowing morning and evening," and committing the result to God, Eccl. xi. 2, 4, 6. Our Lord thus dispersed the heavenly knowledge of his Gospel, Mat. iv. 23; ix. 35; Ps. xl. 9, 10. He commanded his apostles to scatter the seed through the vast field of the world, Mat. xxviii. 19, 20. The persecution of the church was overruled for this great end, Acts xiii. 1—4. The reformers widely dispersed their treasures both by preaching and writing, and rich indeed was the fruit. Do we remember, that our gifts and talents are the riches of the church, 1 Cor. xii. 7; 1 Pet. iv. 10; that, like our father Abraham, we are blessed, not for our own sakes, but to "be a blessing?" Gen. xii. 2; and does not conscience speak of the waste of many, even important opportunities of intercourse with our fellow-sinners or fellow-Christians, when not an atom of knowledge has been dispersed? 13. The spirit is broken. Did we realize, as we ought, our present privilege, and grasp our eternal prospects, no sorrow of the heart would break our spirit. 'I wonder many times,' says Samuel Rutherford, 'that ever a child of God should have a sad heart, considering what his Lord is preparing for him.' The gleam of the present sunshine is the earnest of what it will be, when, as he again beautifully observes, 'we shall be on the sunny side of the brae.' 23. A word spoken in due season. Thus Luther, after the pattern of the great apostle, gladly acknowledged his obligation: 'The word of a brother, pronounced from Holy Scripture in a time of need, carries an inconceivable weight with it. The Holy Spirit accompanies it, and by it moves and animates the hearts of his people, as their circumstances require. Thus Timothy, and Titus, and Epaphroditus, and the brethren who met St. Paul from Rome, cheered his spirit; however much they might be inferior to him in learning and skill in the word of God. The greatest saints have their times of faintness, when others are stronger than they.'—Scott's Contin. of Milner, i. 332.

CHAP. XVI.—22. Understanding is a well-spring of life. A religion of notions—what is it? A dreaming theory! All is death. There is no pulse in the affection, no motion in the heart; but when the understanding is enlightened, to apprehend spiritual things in their spiritual glory, notions become principles. Feelings flow from light, and are filled with life. The Book of God shines forth with new glory. Every verse is a sunbeam—every promise is irradiated with Divine love. What before was unmeaning sound becomes now "spirit and life," Jno. vi. 63. This spiritual understanding is indeed a well-spring of life, Jno. iv. 14; vii. 38; not a work on the surface; not a mere forced impulse; not the summer stream, but a deep-flowing fountain, ch. xviii. 4. If it be not always bubbling, ch. xvii. 27, 28, there is always a supply at the bottom-spring. 32. He that ruleth his spirit. 'So old and no older,' wrote Philip Henry in his Diary, when he had completed his thirtieth year, 'Alexander was, when he conquered the great world; but I have not yet subdued the little world—myself.' Often does the Christian soldier win the day, even when he has been wounded in the fight. Yet think not the war is ended, because a battle is won. No quarter can be given, no truce allowed on either side. The enemy may have been stabbed at the heart; yet will he get up, and renew the fight. Thou must walk, yea, sleep, in thine armour. It must be worn, not laid up. There is "no discharge from this war," till thy body of sin and death is laid in the grave. Meanwhile victory is declared, before the conflict begins. Let every day then be a day of triumph. The promises are to present victory. With such stirring, stimulating hopes, thou shalt surely have rule, if thou wilt but dare to have it; and if thou hast not courage enough to be a Christian, thou must be a slave for life to the hardest of taskmasters. This bloodless victory, so contrary to the turmoil of war, is the crown of Christian grace. No other grace of the Gospel can be exercised without its influence. Yet the daily conquest anticipates the final victory, the spoils of which will be reaped throughout eternity.

CHAP. XVII.—8. A gift—it prospereth. 'A gift is so tempting, that it can no more be refused than a lovely jewel, by him to whom it is presented; and such is its power, it commonly prevails over all men, despatches all business, carries all causes, and—in a word—effects whatever a man desires.'—Bishop Patrick. 'What a description,' adds Mr. Scott, 'of the mercenary selfishness of mankind!' compare also ver. 23; xviii. 16. Even the heathen conscience seems to have had a just perception of this evil. The saying of Philip of Macedon is well known, 'there was no fortress so strong, but it might be stormed, if an ass laden with gold was brought to the gate.' The poet finely illustrates this remark, referring also to the current report, that—'not Philip, but Philip's gold, conquered Greece.'—Hor. Ode. lib. iii. 16. 17. A friend—a brother. To see the Son of God in our nature, that he might be our friend and brother; to hear him "not ashamed to call us brethren;"—this is a mystery of friendship—unsearchable. Truly is this friend,—he alone, worthy of our unlimited confidence. Such is the constancy of his love—"at all times,"—even unto death.

'Mine is an unchanging love;
Higher than the heights above;
Deeper than the depths beneath;
Firm and faithful, strong as death.'—Cowper.

CHAP. XVIII.—8. Talebearer. 'The word properly signifies a pedlar, who buys goods (stolen ones it may be) at one place, and sells them at another, taking care to make his own market of them. So a talebearer makes his own visits, to pick up at one place, and utter at another, that which he thinks will lessen his neighbour's reputation, that he may build his own upon it.'—M. Henry's Sermon on Friendly Visits. Compare ch. xi. 13; xx. 19. 14. Who can bear? Yet is not this wounded spirit the Christian's first seal of mercy, the preparation for all future and eternal mercy? Acts ii. 37; xvi. 27—30. Bitter indeed is the anguish, when the mass of sin is raised from the grave of oblivion, and "set in order before our eyes," Ps. l. 21; but is not this the sight that makes Jesus and his free salvation inexpressibly precious? Acts ii. 41—47; xvi. 31—34: compare Mat. ix. 12; and does not this spirit place us within the sphere of his healing commission? Isa. lxi. 1, 2. We ask now—not who can bear, but who can heal? Well did Luther say, (and there is no better judge on such matters,) 'It is as easy to make a world as to ease a troubled conscience.' Both are creation-work, requiring the almightiness of God, Gen. i. 1; Isa. lvii. 19; to him that "wounded must we return for healing," Hos. vi. 1; his remedy is the sight of himself wounded for us, Isa. liii. 5; and that sight—so healing—so reviving—how does it quicken the soul to a cordial and animated faith, issuing in the song of everlasting praise!

CHAP. XIX.—27. The instruction that causeth to err. Hear the same caution from the lips of our Divine Master—"Beware of false prophets. Take heed what ye hear," Mat. vii. 15; Mar. iv. 24; all instruction is not to life. Teachers of evil, "ministers of Satan," 2 Cor. xi. 13—15, abound; and their instruction, causing to err from the words of knowledge, is more palatable to the perverseness of the heart, more alluring to the inexperience of the young, than solid Scripture teaching, Isa. xxx. 10; Jer. v. 31. The apostle reproved the Galatian church for listening to teachers, causing them to err fatally from the words of knowledge, Gal. i. 6, 7; iii. 1—4; v. 7, 8; and would he not have warned us against the same teaching, so fearfully prevalent: placing ordinances in the stead of Christ, or conjoined with him; man's proud work of "voluntary humility," and external service, in the room of pure simplicity of reliance on the Redeemer's works? When the soul has thus "fallen from grace," Gal. v. 4; what ground of confidence can we bring before God? What is his service but the bondage of outward ceremonies, leading to cheerless despondency?

CHAP. XXI.—1. As the rivers of water. The allusion evidently is to channels made for the distribution of waters according to will, for gardens or irrigation of fields.—See Paxton's Illustrations, i. 173.—Bp. Lowth's Note on Isaiah i. 30. 8. The robbery of the wicked. The marginal reading seems to imply aggravated destruction—probably with shame: compare 2 Sam. xii. 31; Heb. xi. 37; also, it multiplieth riches exceedingly." Several of the older critics took a similar view of the passage, as Mercer, Piscator, &c.

xxiv. 28. The sense given to this disputed verse in our translation is favoured by De Dieu, but he prefers to render it, "Be not a false witness against thy neighbour; for wilt thou deceive with thy lips?" Others understand it to signify, "Do not without cause bear witness against thy neighbour, and publish (i.e., betray secrets) with thy lips." This verse, and the five which precede it and the five which follow it, are, as often occurs, misplaced in the Greek version, where verse 23 is preceded by the end of chapter xxix. and part of chapter xxx. The Arabic, of course, is similarly disarranged, but the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Latin follow the order observed in the English version. At the close of the chapter, however, the Syriac adds, "The Proverbs of Solomon end." This, like the Hebrew addition to Psa. lxxii., probably represents an early division of the book, or its original conclusion.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE PROVERBS.

Lu. xii. 46. 'Search your chests; search your hearts, all ye that hear me this day; and if any of you find any of this adulterated gold among your heaps, away with it. Else know that, as Chrysostom wittily says, 'You have locked up a thief in your counting-house, which shall carry away all: and, if ye look not to it sooner, your soul with it.'—Bp. Hall's Sermon on the Righteous Mammon: Works, v. 109, 110.

CHAP. XXII.—1. A good name. This ornament is too often indiscreetly underrated. 'So long as my conscience is clear, I care not what the world think or say of me. Other consciences are not my judges.' Now, in resisting the efforts of the world to turn us aside from the path of duty, 'we may seasonably comfort ourselves in our own innocency, fly for refuge against the injuries of tongues into our own consciences, as into a castle, there repose ourselves in security, disregarding the reproaches of evil men.'—Bp. Sanderson's Sermon on Ecclesiastes, vii. l, § 30: see also Sir M. Hale's Great Audit. But it should be our great care to stop the mouths of gainsayers; and, while we count it "a very small matter to be judged of man's judgment," most anxiously to "provide things honest, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men," 1 Cor. iv. 3, with 2 Cor. viii. 21: compare 1 Cor. ix. 15; 2 Cor. xi. 12; 1 Pet. ii. 12. 6. Train up. All commentators by their different versions admit the significance of the original terms. Imbue—Schultens, Geier—'Give it the first dip, dye, seasoning.' Initia—Begin the first instruction—Lay the groundwork—the first stone. Instrue. This is substantially the margin, catechize—like Abraham's servants—instructed (catechized, margin) alike in the art of warsand in the fear of God, Gen. xiv. 14; xviii. 19. The word elsewhere conveys the idea of dedication to the service of God. (Compare Deu. xx. 5; 1 Kin. viii. 6; 2 Chr. vii. 5; title to Ps. xxx.) In this view a judicious expositor illustrates it, 'As a house, altar, or temple newly built, and not yet profaned, is fitted by certain rites and sacrifices for its future use, so a child, as a newly-formed edifice, is fitted by a certain course for the service and the church, and his heart is made meet as an habitation of God, and the temple of the Holy Ghost.'—Geier. We cannot indeed anticipate an universal fulfilment of the promise; yet, as believers in the inspiration of Scripture, we are bound implicitly to receive it. The cases that appear to contravene the educational promise may be fairly explained. The promise is not falsified, but the Lord's time of fulfilment is not yet come. Or, has not some important element of education been omitted? Has not some disproportion of one or other part of the system hindered the efficiency of the whole? Has instruction and discipline been always accompanied with prayer and faith? Or has prayer been always confirmed by consistent practice? Does not man's indolence, self-indulgence, unbelief, unfaithfulness to the conditions implied, wither the blessing? While Abraham, training up his family for God, shall find him "faithful that hath promised," (Gen. xviii. 19, with Heb. x. 23,) the Elis and the Davids—good men, but bad parents, (1 Sam. iii. 13; 1 Kin. i. 6,) shall know "God's breach of promise." (Num. xiv. 34.) It is too deep for man to reconcile the absolute election of God with weak, imperfect, unfaithful fulfilment of duty. Nevertheless, in all cases, "Let God be true, and every man a liar." (Rom. iii. 4.) 5. Foolishness. Observe—it is foolishness, not childishness. That might belong to an unfallen child. No moral guilt attaches to the recollection, "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I thought as a child," 1 Cor. xiii. 11. 'A child is to be punished,' as Mr. Scott wisely observed, 'not for being a child, but for being a wicked child.'—Life, p. 622. 20, 21. Know the certainty, &c. Let us not forget the great end of this revelation, that we may know the certainty of the things; that we may give an answer concerning our confidence. The Gospel itself was written with a special reference to this important end, Lu. i. 1—4; 2 Pet. i. 15, 16. Yet this confidence is a Divine attainment. "The word must come with power, and with the Holy Ghost," in order to come "with much asurance," 1 Thes. i. 5.

CHAP. XXIII.—13. Withhold not correction. Christian parents do not always recognise the spiritual standard of discipline. "Foolishness is bound in the heart" of the parent, no less than "of the child." The wild ass's colt, Job xi. 12, must always need its measure of correction. The rule therefore is,-notwithstanding all the pleas of pity and fondness, withhold it not. Do the work wisely, firmly, lovingly. Persevere, notwithstanding apparently unsuccessful results. Connect it with prayer, faith, careful instruction.—'If parents' (Matthew Henry's Life, ch. xiii.) 'would not correct their children except in a praying frame, when they can "lift up their hands without wrath," it would neither provoke God nor them.' 16. Yea, my reins shall rejoice. The reins, as deeply seated in the body, are a frequent Scriptural illustration of the inner thoughts and affections, Ps. xvi. 7; xxvi. 2; Jer. xii. 2; Lam. iii. 13. None but a Christian parent knows the yearning anxiety, the many tears, prayers, and "travailing in birth again" for the soul of a beloved child, or the fervour of joy and praise, when the first budding of heavenly wisdom bursts to view, ver. 24, 25; x. 1; xv. 20; xxix. 3. The sight brings joy into the innermost depths of the bosom. Parents, who sympathise not with these sensations, and with whom Solomon's language is unfelt and uninteresting, realize neither their responsibilities nor their privileges.

CHAP. XXIV.—16. A just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again. The just man rising from his fall is most unwarrantably applied to the perseverance of the saints. The word fall frequently occurs in this book; but always in reference to trouble, not sin. (Ch. xi. 5, 14; xiii. 17; xvii. 20; xxvi. 27; xxviii. 10, 14, 18.) The antithesis obviously fixes this meaning. 'There are plain texts enough to prove every Scriptural doctrine; but pressing texts into any particular service, contrary to their plain meaning, not only serves to deceive the inconsiderate, but to rivet the prejudices, and confirm the suspicions, of opposers; just as bringing forward a few witnesses of suspicious character would cause all those, however deserving of credit, who should be examined in the same cause, to be suspected also, and create a prejudice against it in the minds of the court and of all present.'—Scott.

CHAP. XXV.—20. As vinegar upon nitre. The nitre of Scripture is not that salt that commonly goes by the name, but a soda or mineral alkali, (the Roman natrum,) which strongly ferments with all acids. Dr. Blayney remarks on Jer. ii. 22, (the only other example of the word,) 'In many parts of Asia it is called soap-earth, because it is dissolved in water, and used like soap in washing.' 24. Brawling woman. This proverb has been given before, ch. xxi. 9: compare ch. v. 19; xix. 13; xxvii. 15. Scriptural repetitions shew not want of matter, but the deep importance of the matter laid out. Such is the vexation connected with this evil, that the most uncomfortable dwelling, where the soul might retire for communion with God, would be a grateful alternative. Christian women! think not these proverbs unworthy your attention. Be it so, that you answer not to the revolting picture; but surely the repeated exhibition strongly inculcates the cultivation of the opposite graces, the absence of which clouds the female character in painful deformity.

CHAP. XXVII.—5. Faithful are the wounds of a friend. Philip Henry beautifully describes the proper offices and uses of Christian reproof. 'To reprove a brother is like as, when he is fallen to help him up again; when he is wounded, to help to cure him; when he hath broken a bone, to help to set it; when he is out of the way, to put him in it: when he is fallen into the fire, to pluck him out; when he hath contracted defilement, to help to cleanse him.' —Life, ch. x.

CHAP. XXIX.—15. A child left to himself. 'We pity orphans,' remarked a wise Christian parent, 'who have neither father nor mother to care for them. A child indulged is more to be pitied—it has no parent. It is its own master, peevish, froward, headstrong, blind, born to a double portion of trouble and sorrow above what fallen man is heir to; not only miserable itself, but wort' ess, and a plague to all who in future will be connected with it. What bad sons, husbands, fathers, daughters, wives, and mothers, are the offspring of fond indulgence, shewn to little masters and misses almost from the cradle! Wise discipline gives thought and firmness to the mind; and makes us useful here, and fit for the world of perfect subordination above.'—Venn's Life, p. 257. 25. The fear of man bringeth a snare. A snare brings a man into straits. He is not master of himself. Here Satan spreads the snare, and the fear of man drives into it; and a fearful snare it is, and ever hath been to thousands. Many, once entangled, have never escaped. It besets every step of the pathway to heaven, every sphere of obligation. The king turns aside from strict integrity, 1 Sam. xv. 24; Mat. xiv. 9; the judge wilfully pronounces an unrighteous sentence, Jno. xix. 8, 13, 16.——The same deadly influence operates in families. Sometimes even parents shrink from the open protection of their child, Jno. ix. 22. They dare not avow a supreme regard to his primary interests, or profess, in opposition to many around them, the patriarch's godly determination, "As for me and my house," however evil it may seem to others, "we will serve the Lord," Jos. xxiv. 15.——Every class of society exhibits this corrupt principle. Perhaps the highest are bound in the most abject and hopeless chains; and to their tyrant they seem to acknowledge a sort of conscience, or religious obedience. They will set at nought all religion without fear; but such submissive slaves are they to the omnipotency of fashion, that they would "tremble very exceedingly" (Gen. xxvii. 33, the same word in the original,) at the suspicion of godliness attaching to them, thus "honouring" a vain idol before the Lord of heaven and earth.——What, again, makes so many, especially among the young, ashamed to be found upon their knees; to be known as readers of their Bibles; to cast in their lot decidedly among the saints of God? They know the Christian to be on the right side; and oft is there a whisper of conscience—'Would that my soul were in his place!' Jno. vii. 13; xii. 42, 43; Acts xxvi. 11; 2 Tim. i. 15; iv. 16; but they have only half a mind to religion. The fear of man bringeth a snare; but how painful to see the children of God entangled in the snare! Humbling indeed is the contrast between the boldness of the servants of Satan and the timidity of the soldiers of Christ! Who of us has not cause of painful self-condemnation?——Thank God, there is a way of deliverance. Faith unbinds the soul from fear. If fear makes the giant tremble before the worm, trust in the Lord makes the worm stronger than the giant. ——Fear brings us into the snare. Faith brings liberty, safety, exaltation. Oh! thou God of power and grace, may my soul praise thee for this mighty deliverance, this joyous freedom! May I never be ashamed of my Master. May I be bound to his people, and glory in his cross!

CHAP. XXX.—15. The horseleach hath two daughters. 'But we have,' says Bishop Sanderson, 'I know not how many lusts, no less importunately clamorous than they; till they be served, incessantly crying, Give, give; but much more unsatisfied than they. For they will be filled in time, and when they are filled, they tumble off, and there is an end; but our lusts will never be satisfied. Like Pharaoh's kine, when they have eaten up all the fat ones, they are still as hungry and as whining as they were before.'—Sermon on Phil. iv. 11.

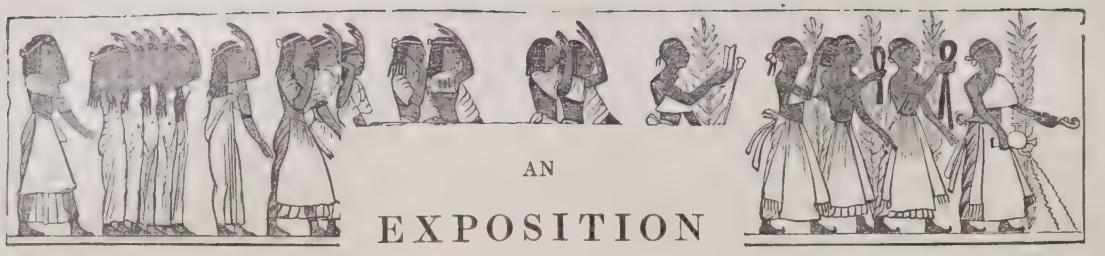
CHAP. XXXI.—13. She seeketh wool. This lovely character is drawn according to the usage of ancient times; though the general principles are of universal application. It describes not only the wife of a man of rank, but a wise, useful, and godly matron in her domestic reponsibilities. It is "a woman professing godliness," adorned "with good works," 1 Tim. ii. 10; a Mary no less than a Martha. 'It may be necessary to retouch the lines of the picture, that have been obscured by length of years; in plain terms—to explain some parts of the description which relate to ancient manners and customs, and to shew how they may be usefully applied to those of our own age and country.'—Bp. Horne. One thing however is most remarkable. The standard of godliness here exhibited is not that of a religious recluse, shut up from active obligations, under the pretence of greater sanctity and consecration to God. Here are none of those habits of monastic asceticism, that are now extolled as the highest point of Christian perfection. One half at least of the picture of the virtuous woman is occupied with her personal and domestic industry. What a rebuke also does this convey to a self-indulgent inactivity! Her several employments admirably illustrate genuine simplicity of manners, and practical, yet liberal economy. This is indeed a difficult and rare attainment, economy without a niggardly spirit; seen and felt as little as possible, and conducted with all care and consideration of the comfort of the family.



We would conclude with a brief summary of a few prominent points involved in the study of this most instructive book. Let us observe the connection between inward principle and outward conduct: Never let it be forgotten, that the exercises here described or inculcated, suppose an internal source. It is the light within, that shines without. The hidden life is thus manifested. ——Let us mark also the flow of true happiness throughout the whole sphere of godliness: Often has the wise man painted this connection with the most glowing interest, ch. iii. 13—18; iv. 4—13; viii. 17—21, 32—36. Most important is it to leave this impression upon the minds of all, specially of our young readers, that religion is a joyous thing. It is not indeed the mirth of the fool, or the giddy gaiety of the thoughtless; but it is the only thing that deserves the name of happiness; the only solid, permanent principle of enjoyment.—— It is of great moment to remark the wise man's estimate of real good. Every particle of the chief good he centres in God.——Let us study Christian completeness and consistency: The elements of this character will be brought out by a diligent and prayerful study of this important book. Let them be put together in their due connection and proportion; and "the man of God will be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," 2 Tim iii. 17.——But, "Who is sufficient?" Child of God, let the trembling of insufficiency in thyself be stayed by the recollection of all-sufficiency in thy God: compare 2 Cor. ii. 16, with iii. 5; also, xii. 9. What he demands of thee, that he works in thee. His covenant secures thy holiness, no less than thine acceptance—thine holiness, not, as some would have it, as the ground, but as the fruit, of thine acceptance. Let the one then be primarily sought; and the other will assuredly follow. "I WILL PUT MY LAW IN THEIR INWARD PARTS, AND WRITE IT IN THEIR HEARTS . . . . . FOR I WILL FORGIVE THEIR INIQUITY, AND I WILL REMEMBER THEIR SINS NO MORE," Jer. xxxi. 33, 34: compare Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27.

xxv. 4. We must understand a silversmith rather than a refiner in the second clause. The word rendered "vessel" is of very wide signification, including almost as much as we mean when we speak of "an article." If a "vessel" is intended here, it must be one that is cast, and not hammered. That the Hebrews in Solomon's age were well acquainted with the refining and casting of the precious metals is an undoubted fact.

xxv. 11. What are "apples of gold in pictures of silver?" Some say gold-coloured fruit in silver baskets; others understand the words of the figures of apples in real gold, mounted on silver, chased and decorated. Fürst and other recent writers incline to the opinion that the golden apples are citrons or apricots. Good words rightly uttered are as beautiful as golden fruit on silver dishes. Hence, although some say "speech is silvern, and silence is golden," there is a speaking which is golden.

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

WE are still among Solomon's happy men, his happy servants, that stood continually before him to hear his wisdom; and they are the choicest of all the dictates of his wisdom, such as were more immediately given by Divine inspiration, that are here transmitted to us, not to be heard as by them but once, and then liable to be mistaken and forgotten, and by repetition to lose their beauty, but to be read, reviewed, revolved, and had in everlasting remembrance. The account we have of Solomon's apostacy from God in the latter end of his reign, 1 Kin. xi. 1, is the tragical part of his story. We may suppose he spake his Proverbs in the prime of his time, while he kept his integrity, but delivered his Ecclesiastes when he was grown old, (for of the burthens and decays of age he speaks feelingly, ch. xii.,) and was by the grace of God recovered from his backslidings. There he dictated his observations, here he wrote his own experiences. This is what days speak, and wisdom which the multitude of years teacheth. The title of the book and the penman we shall meet with in the first verse, and therefore shall here only observe,

I. That it is a sermon, a sermon in print. The text is, ch. i. 2, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." That is the doctrine too. It is proved at large by many arguments and an induction of particulars, and divers objections are answered; and in the close we have the use and application of all, by way of exhortation to remember our Creator, to fear him, and to keep his commandments. There are indeed many things in this book which are dark and hard to be understood, and some things which men of corrupt minds wrest to their own destruction, for want of distinguishing between Solomon's arguments and the objections of the atheists and epicures; but there is enough easy and plain to convince us (if we will admit the conviction) of the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make us happy,—the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make us miserable,—and of the wisdom of being religious, and the solid comfort and satisfaction that is to be had in doing our duty both to God and man. This should be intended in every sermon, and that is a good sermon by which these points are in any measure gained.

II. That it is a penitential sermon, as some of David's psalms are penitential psalms. It is a recantation sermon, in which the preacher sadly laments his own folly and mistake, in promising himself satisfaction in the things of this world, and even in the forbidden pleasures of sense, which now he finds more bitter than death. His fall is a proof of the weakness of man's nature. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor say, I shall never be such a fool as to do so and so, when Solomon himself, the wisest of men, played the fool so egregiously; nor let the rich man glory in his riches, since Solomon's wealth was so great a snare to him, and did him a great deal more hurt than Job's poverty did him. His recovery is a proof of the power of God's grace in bringing one back to God that had gone so far from him, and the riches of God's mercy in accepting him, notwithstanding the many aggravations of his sin, pursuant to the promise made to David, that if his children should commit iniquity they should be corrected, but not abandoned and disinherited, 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15. Let him, therefore, that thinks he stands take heed lest he fall, and let him that is fallen make haste to get up again, and not despair either of assistance or of acceptance therein.

III. That it is a practical, profitable sermon. Solomon, being brought to repentance, resolves, like his father, to teach transgressors God's way, Ps. li. 13, and to give warning to all to take heed of splitting upon those rocks which had been fatal to him; and these were fruits meet for repentance. The fundamental error of the children of men, and that which is at the bottom of all their departures from God, is the same with that of our first parents, hoping to be as gods, by entertaining themselves with that which seems good for food, pleasant to the eyes, and desirable to make one wise. Now the scope of this book is to shew that this is a great mistake, that our happiness consists not in being as gods to ourselves, to have what we will and do what we will, but in having him that made us to be a God to us. The moral philosophers disputed much about man's felicity or chief good; various opinions they had about it; but Solomon in this book determines the question, and assures us, that to fear God and keep his commandments is the whole of man. He tried what satisfaction might be found in the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense, and at last pronounced all vanity and vexation; yet multitudes will not take his word, but will make the same dangerous experiment, and it proves fatal to them. He, 1. Shews the vanity of those things in which men commonly look for a happiness, as human learning and policy, sensual delights, honour and power, riches and great possessions. And then, 2. He prescribes remedies against the vexation of spirit that attends them. Though we cannot cure them of their vanity, we may prevent the trouble they give us by sitting loose to them; enjoying them comfortably, but laying our expectations low from them, and acquiescing in the will of God concerning us in every event, especially by remembering God in the days of our youth, and continuing in his fear and service all our days, with an eye to the judgment to come.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The inscription or title of the book, ver. 1. II. The general doctrine of the vanity of the creature laid down, ver. 2, and explained, ver. 3. III. The proof of this doctrine, taken, 1. From the shortness of human life, and the multitude of births and burials in this life, ver. 4; 2. From the inconstant nature, and constant revolutions of all the creatures, and the perpetual flux and reflux they are in, the sun, wind, and water, ver. 5—7; 3. From the abundant toil man has about them, and the little satisfaction he has in them, ver. 8; 4. From the return of the same things again, which shews the end of all perfection, and that the stock is exhausted, ver. 9, 10; 5. From the oblivion to which all things are condemned, ver. 11. IV. The first instance of the vanity of men's knowledge, and all the parts of learning, especially natural philosophy and politics. Observe, 1. The trial Solomon made of these, ver. 12, 13, 16, 17; 2. His judgment of them, that all is vanity, ver. 14. For, 1st. There is labour in getting knowledge, ver. 13; 2nd. There is little good to be done with it, ver. 15; 3rd. There is no satisfaction in it, ver. 18. And if this is vanity and vexation, all other things in this world, being much inferior to it in dignity and worth, must needs be so too. A great scholar cannot be happy unless he be a true saint.

THE words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem.

2 Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher,
Vanity of vanities; all is vanity.

3 What profit hath a man of all his labour
Which he taketh under the sun?

Here is, First. An account of the penman of this book. It was Solomon, for no other son of David but he was king

Title. In the Hebrew the title is "Koheleth," which is generally understood to be a designation of Solomon, but the exact sense of which is much disputed, though most agree that it signifies one who collects persons or things together—hence, a collector. The word is usually regarded as of the feminine gender, because Coheleth is a personification adopted by the author of the book. Some of the Jewish writers have questioned the canonical authority of the book, but the mass of authorities have accepted it. In the Hebrew Bible Ecclesiastes is one of five books which form a special group, viz., Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. It stands fourth because it is read at the fourth of the five festivals for which these books are appointed. Dr. Ginsburg divides the book into six parts, as follows:—1. Prologue, ch. i. 2—11; 2. Sec. 1, ch. i. 12—ii. 26; 3. Sec. 2, ch. iii. 1—v. 19; 4. Sec. 3, ch. vi. 1—viii. 15; 5. Sec. 4, ch. viii. 16—xii. 7; 6. Epilogue, ch. xii. 8—12. The same author, in common with many modern critics, does not think that Solomon of Jerusalem. But he conceals his name,—Solomon, 'peaceable,'—because by his sin he had brought trouble upon himself and his kingdom, had broken his peace with God, and lost the peace of his conscience, and therefore was no more worthy of that name. Call me not Solomon; call me Marah, for behold, for peace I had great bitterness. But he calls himself,

1. The preacher; which speaks his present character. He is Koheleth, which comes from a word that signifies 'to gather;' but it is of a feminine termination, by which perhaps Solomon intends to upbraid himself with his effeminacy, which contributed more than any thing to his apostacy; for it was to please his wives that he set up idols, Neh. xiii. 26. Or, the word soul must be understood, and so Koheleth is,

1st. A penitent soul, or one gathered, that had rambled and gone astray like a lost sheep, but was now reduced, gathered in from his wanderings, gathered home to his duty, and come at length to himself. The spirit that was dissipated after a thousand vanities is now collected and made to centre in God. Divine grace can make great sinners great converts, and renew even those to repentance that after they had known the way of righteousness turned aside from it, and heal their backslidings, though it is a difficult case. It is only the penitent soul that God will accept, the heart that is broken, not the head that is bowed down, like a bulrush, only for a day; David's repentance, not Ahab's. And it is only the gathered soul that is the penitent soul, that comes back from its bypaths, that no longer scatters its ways to the strangers, Jer. iii. 13, but is united to fear God's name. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak," and therefore we have here the words of the penitent, and those published. If eminent professors of religion fall into gross sin, they are concerned, for the honour of God, and the repairing of the damage they have done to his kingdom, openly to testify their repentance, that the plaister may be as wide as the wound.

2nd. A preaching soul, or one gathering. Being himself gathered to the congregation of saints, out of which he had by sin thrown himself, and reconciled to the church, he endeavours to gather others to it, that had gone astray like him, and perhaps were led astray by his example. He that has done any thing to seduce his brother ought to do all he can to reduce him. Perhaps Solomon called together a congregation of his people, as he had done at the dedication of the temple, 1 Kin. viii. 2, so now at the re-dedicating of himself. In that assembly he presided as the people's mouth to God in prayer, ver. 12; in this as God's mouth to them in preaching. God by his Spirit made him a preacher, in token of his being reconciled to him. A commission is an implicit pardon. Christ sufficiently signified his forgiving Peter by committing his lambs and sheep to his trust. Observe, Penitents should be preachers; they that have taken warning themselves to turn and live should give warning to others not to go on and die. "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." Preachers must be preaching souls, for that only is likely to reach to the heart that comes from the heart. Paul served God with his spirit in the Gospel of his Son, Rom. i. 9.

2. The son of David. His taking this title intimates, 1st. That he looked upon it as a great honour to be the son of so good a man, and valued himself very much upon it. 2nd. That he also looked upon it as a great aggravation of his sin that he had such a father, who had given him a good education, and put up many a good prayer for him. It cuts him to the heart to think that he should be a blemish and disgrace to the name and family of such a one as David. It aggravated the sin of Jehoiakim that he was the son of Josiah, Jer. xxii. 15—17. 3rd. That his being the son of David encouraged him to repent and hope for mercy; for David had fallen into sin, by which he should have been warned not to sin, but was not; but David repented, and therein he took example from him, and found mercy as he did. Yet this was not all; he was that son of David concerning whom God had said that, though he would chasten his transgression with the rod, yet he would not break his covenant with him, Ps. lxxxix. 34. Christ, the great preacher, was the Son of David.

3. King of Jerusalem. This he mentions, 1st. As that which was a very great aggravation of his sin, that he was a king. God had done much for him in raising him to the throne, and yet he had so ill requited him. His dignity made the ill example and influence of his sin the more dangerous, and many would follow his pernicious ways. That he was king of Jerusalem, the holy city, where God's temple was, and of his own building too, where the priests, the Lord's ministers, were, and his prophets, who had taught him better things. 2nd. As that which might give some advantage to what he wrote, for "where the word of a king is there is power." He thought it no disparagement to him as a king to be a preacher; but the people would regard him the more as a preacher because he was a king. If men of honour would lay out themselves to do good, what a great deal of good might they do! Solomon looked as great in the pulpit, preaching the vanity of the world, as in his throne of ivory, judging.

The Chaldee paraphrase (which in this book makes very large additions to the text, or comments upon it, all along) gives this account of Solomon's writing this book: That by the spirit of prophecy he foresaw the revolt of the ten tribes from his son, and in process of time the destruction of Jerusalem, and the house of the sanctuary, and the captivity of the people, and in the foresight of that he said, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity;" and to that he applies many passages in this book.

Secondly. The general scope and design of the book. What is it that this royal preacher has to say? That which he aims at is for the making of us truly religious, to take down our esteem of, and expectation from, the things of this world. In order to this he shews,

1. That they are all vanity, ver. 2. This is the proposition he lays down and undertakes to prove, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." It was no new text; his father David had more than once spoken to the same purpose. The truth itself here asserted is that all is vanity; all besides God, and considered as abstract from him. The all of this world; all worldly employments and enjoyments; the all that is in the world, 1 Jno. ii. 16. All that which is agreeable to our senses, and to our fancies in this present state, which gains pleasure to ourselves, or reputation with others. It is all vanity, not only in the abuse of it, when it is perverted by the sin of man, but even in the use of it. Man, considered with reference to these things, is vanity, Ps. xxxix. 5, 6; and if there were not another life after this, were made in vain, Ps. lxxxix. 47. And those things considered in reference to man, whatever they are in themselves, are vanity. They are impertinent to the soul, foreign, and add nothing to it, they do not answer the end, nor yield any true satisfaction. They are uncertain in their continuance, are fading and perishing, and passing away, and will certainly deceive and disappoint those that put a confidence in them. Let us not therefore love vanity, Ps. iv. 2; nor lift up our souls to it, Ps. xxiv. 4; for we shall but weary ourselves for it, Hab. ii. 13. It is expressed here very emphatically; not only all is vain, but in the abstract, "all is vanity," as if vanity were the proprium quarto modo,—'property in the fourth mode,' of the things of this world, that which enters into the nature of them. They are not only vanity, but "vanity of vanities," the vainest vanity, vanity in the highest degree; nothing but vanity; such a vanity as is the cause of a great deal of vanity. And this is redoubled, because the thing is certain, and past dispute; it is "vanity of vanities." This intimates that the wise man had his own heart fully convinced of, and much affected with, this truth; and that he was very desirous that others should be convinced of it, and affected with it, as he was, but that he found the generality of men very loath to believe and consider it, Job xxxiii. 14. It intimates likewise that we cannot comprehend and express the vanity of this world. But who is it that speaks thus slightly of the world? Is it one that will stand to what he saith? Yes; he puts his name to it: "Saith the preacher." Is it one that was a competent judge? Yes, as much as ever any man was. Many speak contemptibly of the world, because they are hermits, and know it not, or beggars, and have it not; but Solomon knew it. He had dived into nature's depths, 1 Kin. iv. 33; and he had it, more of it perhaps than ever any man had, his head filled with its notions, and his belly with its hid treasures, Ps. xvii. 14, and he passeth this judgment on it. But did he speak as one having authority? Yes, not only that of a king, but that of a prophet, a preacher. He spake in God's name, and was divinely inspired to say it. But did he not say it in his haste, or in a passion, upon occasion of some particular disappointment? No; he said it deliberately, said it and proved it; laid it down as a fundamental principle on which he grounded the necessity of being religious. And, as some think, one main thing he designed was, to shew that the everlasting throne and kingdom, which God had by Nathan promised to David and his seed, must be of another world, for all things in this world are subject to vanity, and therefore have not in them sufficient to answer the extent of that promise. If Solomon find all to be vanity, then the kingdom of the Messiah must come, in which we shall inherit substance.

2. That they are insufficient to make us happy. And for this he appeals to men's consciences. "What profit has a man of all the pains he takes?" ver. 3. Observe here,

1st. The business of this world described. It is labour; the word signifies both care and toil. It is work that wearies men; there is a constant fatigue in worldly business. It is labour under the sun, that is a phrase peculiar to this book, where we meet with it twenty-eight times. There is a world above the sun, a world which needs not the sun, for the glory of God is its light, where there is work without labour, and with great profit, the work of angels; but he speaks of the work under the sun, the pains of which are great, and the gains little. It is under the sun, under the influence of the sun, by its light, and in its heat. As we have the benefit of the light of the day, so we have sometimes the burthen of the heat of the day, Mat. xx. 12, and therefore "in the sweat of our face we eat bread." In the dark and cold grave the weary are at rest.

2nd. The benefit of that business inquired into: "What profit has a man of all that labour?" Solomon saith, Pr. xiv. 23, "In all labour there is profit," and yet here he denies there is any profit. As to our present condition in the world it is true that by labour we get that which we call profit; we eat the labour of our hands. But as the wealth of the world is commonly called substance, and yet it is that which is not, Pr. xxiii. 5, so it is called profit, but the question is whether it be really so or no. And here he determines that it is not; that it is not a real benefit, that it is not a remaining benefit. In short, the wealth and pleasure of this world, if we had never so much of it, is not sufficient to make us happy, nor will it be a portion for us. First. As to the body, and the life that now is, "What profit has a man of all his labour?" A man's life consisteth not in an abundance, Lu. xii. 15. "As goods are increased," care about them is increased, and "they are increased that eat of them," and a little thing will embitter all the comfort of them, and then "what profit has a man of all his labour?" Early up, and never the nearer. Secondly. As to the soul, and the life that is to come, we may much more truly say, "What profit has a man of all his labour?" All he gets by it will not supply the wants of the soul, nor satisfy its desires, will not atone for the sin of the soul, nor cure its diseases, nor countervail the loss of it; what profit will they be of to the soul in death, in judgment, or in the everlasting state? The fruit of our labour in heavenly things is meat that endures to eternal life, but the fruit of our labour for the world is only meat that perisheth.

4 One generation passeth away, and another generation
But the earth abideth for ever. [cometh:
5 The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down,
And hasteth to his place where he arose.
6 The wind goeth toward the south,
And turneth about unto the north;
It whirleth about continually,
And the wind returneth again according to his circuits
7 All the rivers run into the sea;
Yet the sea is not full;
Unto the place from whence the rivers come,
Thither they return again.
8 All things are full of labour;
Man cannot utter it:
The eye is not satisfied with seeing,
Nor the ear filled with hearing.

To prove the vanity of all things under the sun, and their insufficiency to make us happy, Solomon here shews,

First. That the time of our enjoyment of these things is very short, and only while we accomplish as a hireling his day. We continue in the world but for one generation, which is continually passing away to make room for another, and we are passing with it. Our worldly possessions we very lately had from others, and must very shortly leave to others, and therefore to us they are vanity; they can be no more substantial than that life which is the substratum of them, and that is but "a vapour, which appears for a little while, and then vanisheth away." While the stream of mankind is continually flowing, what little enjoyment has one drop of that stream of the pleasant banks between which it glides! We may give God the glory of that constant succession of generations in which the world has hitherto had its existence, and will have, to the end of time; admiring his patience in continuing that sinful species, and his power in continuing that dying species. We may be also quickened to do the work of our generation diligently, and serve it faithfully, because it will be over shortly; and in concern for mankind in general we should consult the welfare of succeeding generations. But as to our own happiness, let us not expect it within such narrow limits, but in an eternal rest and consistency.

Secondly. That when we leave this world we leave the earth behind us. That abideth for ever where it is, and therefore the things of the earth can stand us in no stead in the future state. It is well for mankind in general that the himself wrote Ecclesiastes, but that it was written after the captivity by some one in his name. On the whole subject the reader should consult the article "Ecclesiastes," in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary," where it is suggested that the book was written not long after the time of Solomon. The first verse is really the title of the book.

i. 2. "Vanity of vanities" means the greatest vanity, or utter vanity.

i. 4—7. The mutability of man and the transitoriness of his lot are contrasted with the permanence of the world and the course of Nature. Even in those respects in which natural processes, like the motions of the sun, of the wind, and of the water, are marked by constant change, there is a substantial regularity which is most impressive. A generation of men dies and is not renewed, but is succeeded by another, which is very different from what happens in the material world, where the same sun rises which has set, the same wind returns which has passed away, &c.

earth endures till the end of time, when it and all the works in it shall be burned up; but what is that to particular persons when they remove to the world of spirits?

Thirdly. That the condition of man is in this respect worse than that even of the inferior creatures. The earth abides for ever, but man abides upon the earth but a little while. The sun sets indeed every night, yet it riseth again in the morning as bright and fresh as ever; the winds, though they shift their point, yet in some point or other, still they are; the waters that go to the sea above ground, come from it again under ground; "but man lies down and rises not," Job xiv. 7—12.

Fourthly. That all things in this world are movable and mutable, and subject to a continual toil, and toss, constant in nothing but inconstancy, still going, never resting. It was but once that the sun stood still, otherwise when it is risen it is hastening to set, and when it is set, hastening to rise again, ver. 5; the winds ever and anon shifting, ver. 6; and the waters in a continual circulation, ver. 7; it would be of as ill consequence for them to stagnate as for the blood in the body to do so. And can we expect rest in a world where all things are thus full of labour, ver. 8; on a sea that is always ebbing and flowing, and her waves continually working and rolling?

Fifthly. That, though all things are still in motion, yet they are still where they were. The sun parts, as it is in the margin, but it is to the same place. The wind turns till it comes to the same place; and so the waters return to the place whence they came. Thus man, after all the pains he takes to find satisfaction and happiness in the creature, is but where he was, still as far to seek as ever. Man's mind is as restless in its pursuits as the sun, and wind, and rivers, but never satisfied, never contented; the more it has of the world, the more it would have; and it will be no sooner filled with the streams of outward prosperity, the brooks of honey and butter, Job xx. 17, than the sea is with all the rivers that run into it; it is still as it was, a troubled sea that cannot rest.

Sixthly. That "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation," 2 Pet. iii. 4. The earth is where it was. The sun, and winds, and rivers, keep the same course that ever they did, and therefore, if they have never yet been sufficient to make a happiness for man, they are never likely to be so, for they can but yield the same comfort they have yielded; we must therefore look above the sun for satisfaction, and for a new world.

Seventhly. That this world is at the best a weary land. "All is vanity," for all is "full of labour," the whole creation is made subject to this vanity, ever since man was sentenced to "eat bread in the sweat of his brow." If we survey the whole creation we shall see all busy, all have enough to do to mind their own business, none will be a portion or happiness for man; all labour to serve him, but none a help meet for him. Man cannot express how full of labour all things are; can neither number the laborious nor measure the labours.

Eighthly. That our senses are unsatisfied, and the objects of them unsatisfying. He instances in those senses that perform their office with least toil, and are most capable of being pleased: "The eye is not satisfied with seeing," but is weary of seeing always the same sight, and covets novelty and variety. The ear is fond at first of a pleasant song or tune, but soon nauseates it, and must have another. Both are surfeited, but neither satiated; and what was most grateful becomes ungrateful. Curiosity is still inquisitive, because still unsatisfied; and the more it is humoured the more nice and peevish it grows, crying, Give, give.

9 The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be;
And that which is done is that which shall be done:
And there is no new thing under the sun. [new?
10 Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is
It hath been already of old time, which was before us.
11 There is no remembrance of former things;
Neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come
With those that shall come after.

Two things we are apt to take a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction in, and value ourselves upon, with reference to our business and enjoyments in the world, as if they helped to save them from vanity; and Solomon here shews us our mistake in both.

First. The novelty of the invention; that it is such as was never known before. How grateful is the fancy of this; to think that none ever made such advances in knowledge, and such discoveries by it as we, such improvements of an estate or trade, and had the art of enjoying the gains of it as we have. Their contrivances and composures are all despised and run down, and we boast of new fashions, new hypotheses, new methods, new expressions, which jostle out the old, and put them down. But this is all a mistake; the thing that is and shall be is the same with that which hath been, and that which shall be done will be but the same with that which is done, for there is no new thing under the sun, ver. 8. It is repeated, ver. 10, by way of question, "Is there any thing of which it may be said" with wonder, "See, this is new?" "There never was the like. It is an appeal to observing men, and a challenge to those that cry up the modern learning above that of the ancients. Let them name any thing which they take to be new, and though, perhaps, we cannot make it to appear for want of the records of former times, yet we have reason to conclude "it has been already of old time which was before us." What is there in the kingdom of nature of which we may say, "This is new?" "The works were finished from the foundation of the world," Heb. iv. 3. Things which appear new to us, as they do to children, are not so in themselves. The heavens were of old; the earth abideth for ever; the powers of nature, and the links of natural causes are still the same that ever they were. In the kingdom of providence, though the course and method of it has not such known and certain rules as that of nature, nor doth it go always in the same track, yet, in the general, it is still the same thing over and over again. Men's hearts and the corruptions of them are still the same, their desires, and pursuits, and complaints, still the same; and what God doth in his dealings with men is according to the Scripture, according to the manner, so that it is all repetition. What is surprising to us needs not be so, for there has been the like; the like strange advancements and disappointments; the like strange revolutions and sudden turns, sudden turns of affairs. The miseries of human life have always been much the same, and mankind treads a perpetual round, and, as the sun and wind, are but where they were. Now the design of this is,

1. To shew the folly of the children of men, both in affecting things that are new and in imagining that they have lighted on such things, and pleasing and priding themselves in them. We are apt to nauseate old things, and to grow weary of what we have been long used to, as Israel of the manna, and covet, with the Athenians, still to tell and hear of some new thing, and admire this and the other as new, whereas it is all what has been. Tatianus the Assyrian, shewing the Grecians how all the arts which they valued themselves by owed their original to those nations which they counted barbarous, thus reasons with them: 'For shame, do not call those things εὑρήσεις,—'inventions,' which are but μιμήσεις,—'imitations.'

2. To take us off from expecting happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Why should we look for it there where never any yet have found it? What reason have we to think that the world should be any kinder to us than it has been to those that have gone before us? since there is nothing in it that is new, and our predecessors have made as much of it as could be made. "Your fathers did eat manna, and" yet they "are dead:" see Jno. viii. 8, 9.

3. To quicken us to secure spiritual and eternal blessings. If we would be entertained with things new we must acquaint ourselves with the things of God, get a new nature; then old things pass away, and all things become new, 2 Cor. v. 17. The Gospel puts a new song into our mouths. In heaven all is new, Rev. xxi. 5. All new at first, wholly unlike the present state of things, a new world indeed, Lu. xx. 35; and all new to eternity, always fresh, always flourishing. This consideration should make us willing to die,—that in this world there is nothing but the same over and over again, and we can expect nothing from it more or better than we have had.

Secondly. The memorableness of the achievement; that it is such as will be known and talked of hereafter. Many think they have found satisfaction enough in this, that their names shall be perpetuated, that posterity will celebrate the actions they have done, the honours they have won, and the estates they have raised; that "their houses shall continue for ever," Ps. xlix. 11. But herein they deceive themselves. How many former things and persons were there which in their day looked very great, and made a mighty figure, and yet "there is no remembrance of them," they are buried in oblivion. Here and there one person or action that was remarkable met with a kind historian, and had the good hap to be recorded, when at the same time there were others no less remarkable that were dropped; and therefore we may conclude, that "neither shall there be any remembrance of things to come," but that which we hope to be remembered by will either be lost or slighted.

12 I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem.
13 And I gave my heart to seek and search out
By wisdom concerning all things
That are done under heaven:
This sore travail hath God given to the sons of man
To be exercised therewith.
14 I have seen all the works
That are done under the sun;
And, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.
15 That which is crooked cannot be made straight:
And that which is wanting cannot be numbered.
16 I communed with mine own heart, saying,
Lo, I am come to great estate,
And have gotten more wisdom than all they
That have been before me in Jerusalem: [ledge.
Yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and know-17 And I gave my heart to know wisdom,
And to know madness and folly:
I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit.
18 For in much wisdom is much grief:
And he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

Solomon, having asserted in general that all is vanity, and having given some general proofs of it, now takes the most effectual method to evince the truth of it, 1. By his own experience. He tried them all, and found them vanity. 2. By an induction of particulars; and here he begins with that which bids fairest of all other to be the happiness of a reasonable creature, and that is knowledge and learning. If this be vanity, every thing else must needs be so. Now as to this,

First. Solomon tells us here what trial he had made of it, and that with such advantages, that, if true satisfaction could have been found in it, he had found it.

1. His high station gave him an opportunity of improving himself in all parts of learning, and particularly in politics, and the conduct of human affairs, ver. 12. He that is the preacher of this doctrine was king over Israel, whom all their neighbours admired as a wise and understanding people, Deu. iv. 6. He had his royal seat in Jerusalem, which then deserved, better than Athens ever did, to be called the eye of the world. The heart of a king is unsearchable, he has reaches of his own; and many a time a Divine sentence is in his lips. It is his honour, it is his business, to search out every matter. Solomon's great wealth and honour put him into a capacity of making his court the centre of learning and the rendezvous of learned men, of furnishing himself with the best of books, and either conversing or corresponding with all the wise and knowing part of mankind then in being, who made application to him to learn of him, by which he could not but improve himself; for it is in knowledge as it is in trade,—all the profit is by barter and exchange; if we have that to say which will instruct others, they will have that to say which will instruct us. Some observe how slightly Solomon speaks of his dignity and honour. He doth not say, 'I the preacher am king,' but 'I was king, no matter what I am.' He speaks of it as a thing past, because worldly honours are transitory.

2. He applied himself to the improvement of these advantages, and the opportunities he had of getting wisdom; which, though never so great, will not make a man wise unless he give his mind to it. Solomon gave his heart to seek and search out all things to be known by wisdom, ver. 13. He made it his business to acquaint himself with "all the things that are done under the sun," that are done by the providence of God, or by the art and prudence of man; he set himself to get all the insight he could into philosophy and mathematics, into husbandry and trade, merchandise and mechanics, into the history of former ages, and the present state of other kingdoms, their laws, customs, and policies, into men's different tempers, capacities, and projects, and the

i. 8. For "all things are full of labour" we may translate more literally "all words are weak." In Hebrew, as in Greek, the same term signifies "words" and "things." Here it means words, and the idea of the verse is that the tongue, eye, and ear of man would be unequal to the perception and description of the facts which illustrate the principles laid down.

i. 10. This alludes to alleged novelties, not in human experience or invention, but in Nature, the permanence of which alone is affirmed.

i. 12. In this verse the emphatic word "was" is especially noticeable. The Jews have endeavoured in various ways to reconcile it with the authorship of Solomon, one being by a fable that Asmodeus, the demon king, dethroned Solomon, who wrote this book in his repentance. This fiction is referred to by the Chaldee Targum, which very often enlarges upon the original. If Solomon wrote Ecclesiastes, it is impossible to say with any certainty why he said, "I was king," and not "I am king."

methods of managing them; he set himself not only to seek, but to search, to pry into that which is most intricate, and which requires the closest application of mind, and the most vigorous and constant prosecution. Though he was a prince, he made himself a drudge to learning, boggled not at its knots, nor took up short of its depths. And this he did, not merely to gratify his own genius, but to qualify himself for the service of God and his generation; and to make an experiment how far the enlargement of the knowledge would go towards the settlement and repose of the mind.

3. He made a very great progress in his studies, wonderfully improved all the parts of learning, and carried his discoveries much farther than any that had been before him. He did not condemn learning, as many do, because they cannot conquer it, and will not be at the pains to make themselves masters of it. No; what he aimed at he compassed: he "saw all the works that were done under the sun," ver. 14, works of nature in the upper and lower world, all within this vortex (to use the modern gibberish) which has the sun for its centre, works of art, the product of men's wit, in a personal or social capacity. He had as much satisfaction in the success of his searches as ever any man had; he communed with his own heart concerning his attainments in knowledge, with as much pleasure as ever any rich merchant had in taking account of his stock. He could say, "Lo, I have magnified and increased wisdom," have not only gotten more of it myself, but have done more to propagate it, and bring it into reputation, than any, "than all that have been before me in Jerusalem." Note, It becomes great men to be studious, and delight themselves most in intellectual pleasures. Where God gives great advantages of getting knowledge he expects improvements accordingly. It is happy with a people when their princes and noblemen study to excel others as much in wisdom and useful knowledge as they do in honour and estate; and they may do that service to the commonwealth of learning, by applying themselves to the studies that are proper for them, which meaner persons cannot do. Solomon must be acknowledged a competent judge of this matter, for he had not only got his head full of notions, but his "heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge," of the power and benefit of it, as well as the amusement and entertainment of it. What he knew he had digested, and knew how to make use of. Wisdom entered into his heart, and so became pleasant to his soul, Pr. ii. 10, 11; xxii. 18.

4. He applied his studies especially to that part of learning which is most serviceable to the conduct of human life, and consequently is the most valuable; ver. 17, "I gave my heart to know" the rules and dictates of "wisdom," and how I might obtain it; "and to know madness and folly," how I might prevent and cure it, to know the snares and insinuations of it, that I might avoid them and guard against them, and discover its fallacies. So industrious was Solomon to improve himself in knowledge, that he gained instruction both by the wisdom of prudent men and by the madness of foolish men; by the field of the slothful as well as of the diligent.

Secondly. He tells us what was the result of this trial; to confirm what he had said, that "All is vanity."

1. He found that his searches after knowledge were very toilsome, and a weariness, not only to the flesh, but to the mind; ver. 13, "This sore travail," this difficulty that there is in searching after truth and finding it, "God has given to the sons of men to be afflicted therewith," as a punishment for our first parents' coveting forbidden knowledge. As bread for the body, so that for the soul, must be got and eaten in the sweat of our face, whereas both had been had without labour if Adam had not sinned.

3. He found that when he had got some knowledge he could neither gain that satisfaction to himself nor do that good to others with it which he expected, ver. 15. It would not avail. 1st. To redress the many grievances of human life: After all, I find that "that which is crooked" will be crooked still, and "cannot be made straight." Our knowledge is itself intricate and perplexed, we must go far about, and fetch a great compass to come at it. Solomon thought to have found out a nearer way to it, but he could not; the paths of learning are as much a labyrinth as ever they were. The minds and manners of men are crooked and perverse. Solomon thought, with his wisdom and power together, to have thoroughly reformed his kingdom, and made that straight which he found crooked. But he was disappointed. All the philosophy and politics in the world will not restore the corrupt nature of man to its primitive rectitude; we find the insufficiency of them both in others and in ourselves. Learning will not alter men's natural tempers, nor cure them of their sinful distempers; nor will it change the constitution of things in this world. A vale of tears it is, and so it will be, when all is done. 2nd. To make up the many deficiencies in the comfort of human life: "That which is wanting" there "cannot be numbered," or counted out to us from the treasures of human learning; but what is wanting will still be so. All our enjoyments here, when we have done our utmost to bring them to perfection, are still lame and defective, and it cannot be helped. As they are, so they are like to be. "That which is wanting" in our knowledge is so much that it "cannot be numbered." The more we know the more we see of our own ignorance. "Who can understand his errors," his defects?

4. Upon the whole, therefore, he concluded that great scholars do but make themselves great mourners; for "in much wisdom is much grief," ver. 18. There must be a great deal of pains taken to get it, and a great deal of care not to forget it. The more we know the more we see there is to be known, and consequently see our work never at an end, and the more we see of our former mistakes and blunders, which occasions much grief. The more we see of men's different sentiments and opinions (and that is it which a great deal of our learning is conversant about) the more at a loss we are, it may be, which is in the right. Those that increase knowledge have so much the more quick and sensible perception of the calamities of this world, and for one discovery they make that is pleasing, perhaps they make ten that are unpleasing, and so they increase sorrow. Let us not, therefore, be driven off from the pursuit of any useful knowledge, but put on patience to break through the sorrow of it. But let us despair of finding true happiness in this knowledge, and expect it only in the knowledge of God, and the careful discharge of our duty to him. He that increaseth in heavenly wisdom, and in an experimental acquaintance with the principles, powers, and pleasures of the spiritual and Divine life, increaseth joy, such as will shortly consummate in everlasting joy.

CHAPTER II.

Solomon having pronounced all vanity, and particularly knowledge and learning, which he was so far from giving himself joy of, that he found the increase of it did but increase his sorrow, in this chapter he goes on to shew what reason he had to be sick of this world, and with what little reason the most of men are fond of it. I. He shews that there is no true happiness and satisfaction to be had in mirth and pleasure, and the delights of sense, ver. 1—11. II. He reconsiders the pretensions of wisdom, and allows it to be an excellent, useful thing, and yet sees it clogged with such diminutions of its worth, that it proves insufficient to make a man happy, ver. 12—16. III. He inquires how far the business and wealth of this world will go towards making men happy, and concludes, from his own experience, that to those who set their hearts upon it, it is vanity and vexation of spirit, ver. 17—23; and if there be any good in it, it is only to those that sit loose to it, ver. 24—26.

I SAID in mine heart, Go to now,
I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure:
And, behold, this also is vanity.
2 I said of laughter, It is mad:
And of mirth, What doeth it?
3 I sought in mine heart
To give myself unto wine,
Yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom;
And to lay hold on folly,
Till I might see what was that good for the sons of men,
Which they should do under the heaven
All the days of their life.
4 I made me great works;
I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards:
5 I made me gardens and orchards,
And I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits:
6 I made me pools of water,
To water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees:

SOLOMON'S POOLS.

7 I got me servants and maidens, and had servants born in my house;
Also I had great possessions of great and small cattle
Above all that were in Jerusalem before me:
8 I gathered me also silver and gold,
And the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces:
I gat me men singers and women singers,
And the delights of the sons of men,
As musical instruments, and that of all sorts
9 So I was great, and increased more Than all that were before me in Jerusalem:
Also my wisdom remained with me.
10 And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them,
I withheld not my heart from any joy;
For my heart rejoiced in all my labour:
And this was my portion of all my labour
11 Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought,

i. 14, 15. Ginsburg renders these two verses, "I considered all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, they are all vanity, and striving after the wind: for the depressed cannot be set right, since he that is gone cannot be numbered again." There are ailings and failings beyond human resources.

i. 16. Some render, with Piscator, "Behold, I have acquired great and ample wisdom beyond all," &c.

i. 17. This verse may be rendered literally, "And I gave my heart to know wisdom and knowledge, folly and imprudence." The endeavours to get rid of the two last nouns, or to weaken their force, have been at once uncalled for and unsuccessful.

ii. 1. "I said in my heart, Come now, I will try thee with mirth, therefore see pleasure." We are here introduced to another experiment, the details of which in its various applications terminate with verse 11.

ii. 3. No two translators agree in their rendering of the Hebrew

And on the labour that I had laboured to do:
And, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit,
And there was no profit under the sun.

Solomon here, in pursuit of the summum bonum,—'the greatest good,' the felicity of man, adjourns out of his study, his library, his elaboratory, his council chamber, where he had in vain sought for it, into the park, and the playhouse, his garden, and his summer house, exchangeth the company of the philosophers and grave senators, for that of the wits, and gallants, and the beaux esprits of his court, to try if he could find true satisfaction and happiness among them. Here he takes a great step downward, from the noble pleasures of the intellect to the brutal ones of sense; yet, if he resolve to make a thorough trial, he must knock at this door, because here a great part of mankind imagine they have found that which he was in quest of.

First. He resolved to try what mirth would do, and the pleasures of wit, whether he should be happy if he constantly entertained himself and others with merry stories and jests, banter and drollery; if he should furnish himself with all the pretty ingenious turns and repartees he could invent or pick up, fit to be laughed over, and all the bulls, and blunders, and foolish things he could hear of, fit to be ridiculed and laughed at; so that he might be always upon the merry pin. Here is,

1. This experiment made, ver. 1. Finding that "in much wisdom is much grief," and that those that are serious are apt to be melancholy, "I said in my heart," that is, to my heart, "Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth," I will try if that will give thee satisfaction. Neither the temper of his mind nor his outward condition had any thing in them to keep him from being merry, but both agreed, as did all other advantages, to further it; therefore he resolved to take a release this way, and said, "Enjoy pleasure," and take thy fill of it; cast away care, and resolve to be merry. So a man may be, and yet have none of these fine things which he here got to entertain himself with. Many that are poor are very merry; beggars in a barn are so to a proverb. Mirth is the entertainment of the fancy, and though it comes short of the solid delights of the rational powers, yet it is to be preferred before those that are merely carnal and sensual. Some distinguish man from the brutes, not only as animal rationale,—'a rational animal,' but as animal risibile,—'a laughing animal;' therefore he that said to his soul, "Take thine ease, eat and drink," added, "and be merry," for it was in order to that he would eat and drink. Try therefore, saith Solomon, to laugh and be fat; laugh and be happy.

2. The judgment he passed upon this experiment; "Behold, this also is vanity," like all the rest; it yields no true satisfaction; ver. 2. "I said," presently "of laughter, It is mad," or 'thou art mad,' and therefore I will have nothing to do with thee; "and of mirth," (of all sports and recreations, and whatever pretends to be diverting,) "What doeth it?" or, 'what doest thou?' Innocent mirth, soberly, and seasonably, and moderately used, is a good thing, fits for business, and helps to soften the toils and chagrins of human life; but, when it is excessive and immoderate, it is foolish and fruitless. 1st. It doth no good; "what doth it?" Cui bono?—'Of what use is it?' It will not avail to quiet a guilty conscience; no, nor to ease a sorrowful spirit; nothing more ungrateful than singing songs to a heavy heart; it will not satisfy the soul, nor ever yield it true content. It is but a palliative cure to the grievances of this present time. Great laughters commonly end in a sigh. 2nd. It doth a great deal of hurt; "it is mad," that is, it makes men mad, it transports men into many indecencies, which are a reproach to their reason and religion. They are mad that indulge themselves in it, for it estrangeth the heart from God and Divine things, and insensibly eats out the power of religion. Those that love to be merry forget to be serious, and while they take the timbrel and harp, they "say to the Almighty, Depart from us," Job xxi. 12, 14. We may, as Solomon, prove ourselves with mirth, and judge of the state of our souls by this, how do we stand affected to it? Can we be merry and wise? Can we use it as sauce, and not as food? But we need not try, as Solomon did, whether it will make a happiness for us, for we may take his word for it, it is mad, and what doth it? Laughter and pleasure, saith Sir William Temple, come from very different affections of the mind, for as men have no disposition to laugh at those things they are most pleased with, so they are very little pleased with many things they laugh at.

Secondly. Finding himself not happy in that which pleased his fancy, he resolved next to try that which would please the palate, ver. 3. Since the knowledge of the creature would not satisfy, he would see what the liberal use of it would do. "I sought in my heart to give myself unto wine," that is, to good meat and good drink. Many give themselves to these without consulting their hearts at all, nor looking any farther than merely the gratification of the sensual appetite, but Solomon applied himself to it rationally, and as a man; critically, and only to make an experiment. Observe,

1. He did not allow himself any liberty in the use of the delights of sense till he had tired himself with his severe studies. Till his increase of wisdom proved an increase of sorrow, he never thought of giving himself to wine. When we have spent ourselves in doing good, we may then most comfortably refresh ourselves with the gifts of God's bounty. Then the delights of sense are rightly used, when they are used as we use cordials, only when we need them; as Timothy drank wine for his health's sake, 1 Tim. v. 23. I thought 'to draw my flesh with wine,' so the margin reads it; or, to wine. Those that have addicted themselves to drinking, did at first put a force upon themselves, they drew their flesh to it, and with it; but they should remember to what miseries they hereby draw themselves.

2. He then looked upon it as folly, and it was with reluctancy that he gave himself to it; as St. Paul, when he commended himself, called it a weakness, and desired to be borne with in his foolishness, 2 Cor. xi. 1. He sought to lay hold on folly, that is, to see the utmost that that folly would do towards making men happy; but he had like to have carried the jest, as we say, too far. He resolved the folly should not take hold of him, nor get the mastery of him, but he would lay hold on it, and keep it at a distance, yet he found it too hard for him.

3. He took care at the same time to acquaint himself with wisdom, that is, to manage himself wisely in the use of his pleasures, so as that they should not do him any prejudice, nor disfit him to be a competent judge of them. When he drew his flesh with wine, he led his heart with wisdom, (so the word is,) kept up his pursuits after knowledge, did not make a sot of himself, nor become a slave to his pleasures; but his studies and his feasts were foils to each other, and he tried whether both mixed together would give him that satisfaction which he could not find in either separately. This Solomon proposed to himself, but he found it vanity; for they that think to give themselves to wine, and yet to acquaint their hearts with wisdom, will perhaps deceive themselves as much as they do that think to serve both God and mammon. Wine is a mocker, it is a great cheat, and it will be impossible for any man to say, thus far he will give himself to it, and no farther.

4. That which he aimed at was not to gratify his appetite, but to find out man's happiness, and this, because it pretended to be so, must be tried among the rest. Observe the description he gives of man's happiness; it is that "good for the sons of men which they should do under the heaven all their days." 1st. That which we are to inquire after, is not so much the good we must have, we may leave that to God, but the good we must do; that ought to be our care. "Good master, what good thing shall I do?" Our happiness consists not in being idle, but in doing aright, in being well employed. If we do that which is good, no doubt we shall have comfort and praise of the same. 2nd. It is good to be done under the heaven, while we are here in this world, while it is day, while our doing-time lasts. This is our state of work and service, it is in the other world that we must expect the retribution; thither our works will follow us. 3rd. It is to be done "all the days of our life." The good we are to do we must persevere in the doing of to the end, while our doing-time lasts. 'The number of the days of our life,' so it is in the margin; 'the number of the days of our life' are numbered to us by him, in whose hand our times are, and they are all to be spent as he directs. But that any man should give himself to wine, in hopes to find out in that the best way of living in this world, was an absurdity which Solomon here in the reflection condemns himself for. Is it possible that this should be the good that men should do? No, it is plainly very ill.

Thirdly. Perceiving quickly that it was folly to give himself to wine, he next tried the most costly entertainments and amusements of princes and great men. He had a vast income, the revenue of his crown was very great, and he laid it out so as might most please his own humour, and make him look great.

1. He gave himself much to building, both in the city and in the country; and having been at such a vast expense in the beginning of his reign to build a house for God, he was the more excusable if afterwards he pleased his own fancy in building for himself. He began his work at the right end, Mat. vi. 33; not as the people, Hag. i. 4, that ceiled their own houses while God's lay waste; and it prospered accordingly. In building he had the pleasure of employing the poor, and doing good to posterity. We read of Solomon's buildings, 1 Kin. xi. 15, 17—19; and they were all great works, such as became his purse, and spirit, and great dignity. See his mistake: he inquired after the good works he should do, ver. 3; and in pursuit of the inquiry applied himself to great works. Good works indeed are truly great; but there are many that are reputed great works which are far from being good; wondrous works which are not gracious, Mat. vii. 22.

2. He took to love a garden, which is to some as bewitching as building. He planted him vineyards, which the soil and climate of the land of Canaan favoured; he made him fine gardens and orchards, ver. 5; and perhaps the art of gardening was no way inferior then to what it is now. He had not only forests of timber trees, but trees of all kind of fruit, which he himself had planted; and if any worldly business would yield a man happiness, sure it must be that which Adam was employed in while he was in innocency.

3. He laid out a great deal of money in waterworks, ponds, and canals, not for sport and for diversion, but for use, to water the wood that brings forth trees, ver. 6. He not only planted, but watered, and then left it to God to give the increase. Springs of water are great blessings, Jos. xv. 19; but where nature has provided them art must direct them, to make them serviceable, ch. xxi. 1.

4. He increased his family. When he proposed to himself to do great works, he must employ many hands; and therefore procured servants and maidens, which were bought with his money, and of those he had servants born in his house, ver. 7. Thus his retinue was enlarged, and his court appeared more magnificent: see Ezr. ii. 58.

5. He did not neglect country business, but both entertained and enriched himself with that, and was not diverted from it either by his studies or by his pleasures. He "had large possessions of great and small cattle," herds and flocks, as his father had before him, 1 Chr. xxvii. 29, 31; not forgetting that his father in the beginning was a keeper of sheep. Let those that deal in cattle neither despise their employment, nor be weary of it, remembering that Solomon puts his having possessions of cattle among his great works and his pleasures.

6. He grew very rich, and was not at all impoverished by his building and gardening as many are, who for that reason only repent it, and call it vanity and vexation. Solomon scattered, and yet increased; he filled his exchequer with silver and gold, which yet did not stagnate there, but was made to circulate through his kingdom, so that he made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones, 1 Kin. x. 27. Nay, he had the Segullah, "the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces," which was, for richness and rarity, more accounted of than silver and gold. The neighbouring kings, and the distant provinces of his own empire, sent him the richest presents they had, to obtain his favour and the instructions of his wisdom.

7. He had every thing that was charming and diverting. All sorts of melody, and music, vocal and instrumental; "men singers, and women singers," the best voices he could pick up, and all the wind and hand instruments that were then in use. His father had a genius for music, but it should seem he employed it more to serve his devotion than the son, who made it more his diversion. These are called "the delights of the sons of men," for the gratifications of sense are the things that the generality of people set their affections upon, and take the greatest complacency in. The delights of the children of God are of another nature, pure, and spiritual, and heavenly, and the delights of angels.

8. He enjoyed more than ever any man did a composition of rational and sensitive pleasures at the same time. He was in this respect "great, and increased more than all that were before him;" thus he was both a wise man and a sportsman. It was strange, and the like was never met with.

1st. That his pleasures did not debauch his judgment and conscience. In the midst of all these entertainments his wisdom remained with him, ver. 9; in the midst of all these childish delights he preserved his spirit manly, kept the possession of his own soul, and maintained the dominion of reason over the appetites of sense. Such a vast stock of wisdom had he that it was not wasted and impaired, as any other man's would have been, by this course of life. But let none be emboldened hereby to lay the reins in the neck of their appetites, presuming that they may do that and yet retain their wisdom, because they have not such a strength of wisdom as Solomon had. Nay, and Solomon was deceived; for how did his wisdom remain with him, when he lost his religion so far as to build altars to strange gods, for the humouring of his strange wives? But thus far his wisdom remained with him, that he was master of his pleasures, and not a slave to them; and kept himself capable of making a judgment of them. He went over into the enemies' country, not as a deserter, but as a spy, to discover the nakedness of their land.

2nd. Yet his judgment and conscience gave no check to his pleasures, nor hindered him from extracting the very quintessence of the delights of sense, ver. 10. It might be objected against his judgment in this matter, that if his wisdom remained with him he could not take the liberty that was necessary to a full experimental acquaintance with it. Yea, saith he, I took as great a liberty as any man could take, for "whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them," if it could be compassed by lawful means, though never so difficult or costly; and as "I withheld not any joy from my heart" that I had a mind to, so "I withheld not my heart from any joy," but with a non obstante,—'a defiance of obstacles,' to my wisdom, I had as high a gust of my pleasures, relished and of this verse, but there is little doubt that our version is a very correct one. In the first part the endeavour to combine wine and wisdom is described; and in the second the ultimate object of the trial.

ii. 5. The orchards here referred to were rather pleasure-grounds or parks, spaces planted with trees, decorated with fountains, &c. The Hebrew name corresponds to our word "paradise," which was used also in Greek, and in the Zend, Armenian, and Sanscrit, for certain enclosed spaces.

ii. 6. The Hebrew for "the wood that bringeth forth trees" denotes, of course, a wood wherein trees grow, or a plantation of trees.

ii. 7. "Great and small cattle" are, in the original, oxen and sheep.

ii. 8. There is no need for the word "peculiar" here. He gathered silver and gold, and the wealth of kings and provinces. The words "the sons of men" simply signify "men." For "musical instruments, and that of all sorts," other renderings have been proposed, as "a wife and wives," i.e., wives in abundance, which may be enjoyed them as much as ever any epicure did; nor was there anything, either in the circumstances of his condition or in the temper of his spirit, to sour or embitter them, or give them any alloy. In short, First. He had as much pleasure in his business as ever any man had. "My heart rejoiced in all my labour," so that the toil and fatigue of that was no damp to his pleasures. Secondly. He had no less profit by his business. He met with no disappointment in it to give him any disturbance; "This was my portion of all my labour." He had this added to all the rest of his pleasures, that in them he did not only see but eat the labour of his hands; and this was all he had, for indeed it was all he could expect from his labour. It sweetened his business that he enjoyed the success of it, and it sweetened his enjoyments that they were the product of his business. So that, upon the whole matter, he was certainly as happy as the world could make him.

Lastly. We have at length the judgment he deliberately gave of all this, ver. 11. When the Creator had made his great works he reviewed them, and "behold all was very good," every thing pleased him; but when Solomon reviewed "all the works that his hands had wrought" with the utmost cost and care, and "the labour that he had laboured to do" in order to make himself easy and happy, nothing answered his expectation; "behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit." He had no satisfaction in it, no advantage by it; "there was no profit under the sun," neither by the employments nor by the enjoyments of this world.

12 And I turned myself to behold
Wisdom, and madness, and folly:
For what can the man do that cometh after the king?
Even that which hath been already done.
13 Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly,
As far as light excelleth darkness.
14 The wise man's eyes are in his head;
But the fool walketh in darkness:
And I myself perceived also
That one event happeneth to them all.
15 Then said I in my heart,
As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me;
And why was I then more wise?
Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity.
16 For there is no remembrance
Of the wise more than of the fool for ever; [forgotten.
Seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be
And how dieth the wise man? as the fool.

Solomon, having tried what satisfaction was to be had in learning first, and then in the pleasures of sense, and having also put both together, he here compares them one with another, and passeth a judgment upon them.

First. He sets himself to consider both wisdom and folly. He had considered these before, ch. i. 17, but, lest it should be thought that he was then too quick in passing a judgment upon them, he here turns himself again to behold them, to see if, upon a second view and second thoughts, he could gain more satisfaction in the search than he had done upon the first. He was sick of his pleasures, and, as nauseating them, he turned from them, that he might again apply himself to speculation; and if, upon this rehearing of the cause, the verdict be still the same, the judgment will surely be decisive; "for what can the man do that comes after the king?" especially such a king, that had so much of this world to make the experiment upon, and so much wisdom to make it with. The baffled trial needs not be repeated; no man can expect to find more satisfaction in the world than Solomon did, nor to gain a greater insight into the principles of morality. When a man has done what he can, still it is that which hath been already done. Let us learn, 1. Not to indulge ourselves in a fond conceit that we can mend that which has been well done before us; let us esteem others better than ourselves, and think how unfit we are to attempt the improvement of the performances of better heads and hands than ours, and rather own how much we are beholden to them, Jno. iv. 37, 38. 2. To acquiesce in Solomon's judgment of the things of this world, and not to think of repeating the trial; for we can never think of having such advantages as he had to make the experiment, nor of being able to make it with an equal application of mind, and so little danger to ourselves.

Secondly. He gives wisdom the preference far before folly. Let none mistake him, as if, when he speaks of the vanity of human literature, he designed only to amuse men with a paradox, or were about to write, (as a great wit once did,) Encomium moriæ,—'a panegyric in praise of folly.' No, he is maintaining sacred truths, and therefore is careful to guard against being misunderstood. I soon saw, saith he, that "there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly, as much as there is in light above darkness." The pleasures of wisdom, though they suffice not to make men happy, yet they vastly transcend the pleasures of wine. Wisdom enlightens the soul with surprising discoveries, and necessary directions for the right government of itself; but sensuality, (for that seems to be especially the folly here meant,) clouds and eclipses the mind, and is as darkness to it; it puts out men's eyes, and makes them to stumble in the way, and wander out of it. Or, though wisdom and knowledge will not make a man happy, St. Paul shews a more excellent way than gifts, and that is grace; yet it is much better have it than be without it, in respect of our present safety, comfort, and usefulness; for "the wise man's eyes are in his head," ver. 14, where they should be ready to discover both the dangers that are to be avoided, and the advantages that are to be improved. A wise man has not his reason to seek when he should use it, but looks about him, and is quicksighted, knows both where to step and where to stop; whereas the fool walks in darkness, and is ever and anon either at a loss or at a plunge, either bewildered that he knows not which way to go, or embarrassed that he cannot go forward. A man that is discreet and considerate has the command of his business, and acts decently and safely, as those that walk in the day; but he that is rash, and ignorant, and sottish, is continually making blunders, running upon one precipice or other; his projects, his bargains, are all foolish, and ruin his affairs. Therefore get wisdom, get understanding.

Thirdly. Yet he maintains that in respect of lasting happiness and satisfaction, the wisdom of this world gives a man very little advantage; for,

1. Wise men and fools fare alike. It is true the wise man has very much the advantage of the fool in respect of foresight and insight, and yet the greatest probabilities do so often come short of success that "I myself perceived," by my own experience, "that one event happeneth to them all," ver. 14. Those that are most cautious of their health are as soon sick as those that are most careless of it, and the most suspicious are imposed upon. David had observed that wise men die, and are involved in the same common calamity with the fool and the brutish person, Ps. xlix. 12: see ch. ix. 11. Nay, it has of old been observed that fortune favours fools, and that half-witted men often thrive most, while the great projectors forecast worst for themselves. The same sickness, the same sword, devours wise men and fools.

Solomon applies this mortifying observation to himself, ver. 15, that, though he were a wise man, he might not glory in his wisdom. I said to my heart, when it began to be proud or secure, "As it happens to the fool, so it happens to me, even to me;" for thus emphatically it is expressed in the original; so as for me, it happens to me. Am I rich? so is many a Nabal, that fares as sumptuously as I do. Is a foolish man sick? doth he get a fall? so do I, even I; and neither my wealth nor my wisdom will be my security. "And why was I then more wise?" why should I take so much pains to get wisdom, when as to this life it will stand me in so little stead. "Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity." Some make this a correction of what he had said before, like that, Ps. lxxvii. 10, "I said, This is my infirmity;" it is my folly to think that wise men and fools are upon a level; but really they seem to be so in respect of the event, and therefore it is rather a confirmation of what he had before said, that a man may be a profound philosopher and politician, and yet not be a happy man.

2. Wise men and fools are forgotten alike; ver. 16, "There is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool." It is promised to the righteous that they shall be had in everlasting remembrance, and their memory shall be blessed, and they shall shortly shine as the stars; but there is no such promise made concerning the wisdom of this world, that that shall perpetuate men's names, for those names only are perpetuated that are written in heaven; and otherwise the names of this world's wise men are written with those of its fools in the dust. "That which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten." What was much talked of in one generation is in the next as if it had never been. New persons and new things jostle out the very remembrance of the old, which in a little time are looked upon with contempt, and at length quite buried in oblivion. "Where is the wise? where is the disputer of this world?" 1 Cor. i. 20. And it is upon this account that he asks, "How dies the wise man? as the fool." Between the death of a godly and a wicked man there is great difference, but not between the death of a wise man and a fool. The fool is buried and forgotten, ch. viii. 10; and no one remembered the poor man that by his wisdom delivered the city, ch. ix. 15; so that to both the grave is a land of forgetfulness; and wise and learned men, when they have been a while there out of sight, presently grow out of mind; a new generation ariseth that knew them not.

17 Therefore I hated life;
Because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me:
For all is vanity and vexation of spirit.
18 Yea, I hated all my labour
Which I had taken under the sun: [after me Because I should leave it unto the man that shall be 19 And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a
Yet shall he have rule over all my labour [fool?
Wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun.
This is also vanity.
20 Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair
Of all the labour which I took under the sun.
21 For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity;
Yet to a man that hath not laboured therein
Shall he leave it for his portion.
This also is vanity and a great evil.
22 For what hath man of all his labour,
And of the vexation of his heart,
Wherein he hath laboured under the sun?
23 For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief;
Yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night.
This is also vanity.
24 There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, [labour.
And that he should make his soul enjoy good in his
This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God.
25 For who can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?
26 For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight
Wisdom, and knowledge, and joy.
But to the sinner he giveth travail,
To gather and to heap up,
That he may give to him that is good before God.
This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Business is a thing that wise men have pleasure in; they are in their element when they are in their business, and complain if they be out of business. They correct, and is supported by Gesenius and other critics, including Fürst and Ginsburg. The ancient versions are mostly unreliable.

ii. 12. "Having shown that both wisdom and pleasure are alike valueless, so far as removing mental depression and securing permanent happiness are concerned, and being desirous that this relative estimate should not be taken for an absolute one, Coheleth now proceeds to show their respective merits, independently of the use he had tried to make of them." So Ginsburg

ii. 14. The simple sense of the former part of this verse is that the wise man has eyes, or can see, and that the fool is without eyes, or cannot see; the meaning being that wisdom is before both, though one is blind to it. There are, however, experiences common to man as man, and not to be avoided by the wise any more than by the foolish. The observation of this fact gave rise to a succession of sceptical thoughts, distrustful and unbelieving inward utterances, which occupy the remainder of the chapter. Because the wise man may sometimes be tired with their business, but they are not weary of it, nor willing to leave it off. Here, therefore, one would expect to have found the good that men should do; but Solomon tried this too. After a contemplative life and a voluptuous life, he betook himself to an active life, and found no more satisfaction in that than in the other; still it is all "vanity and vexation of spirit," of which he gives an account in these verses. Where observe,

First. What the business was which he made trial of. It was business under the sun, ver. 17—20; about the things of this world, sublunary things, the riches, honours, and pleasures of this present time; it was the business of a king. There is business above the sun, perpetual business, which is perpetual blessedness. What we do in conformity to that business, doing God's will as it is done in heaven, and in pursuance of that blessedness, will turn to a good account; we shall have no reason to hate that labour, nor to despair of it; but it is labour under the sun, labour for the meat that perisheth, Jno. vi. 27, Isa. lv. 2, that Solomon here speaks of with so little satisfaction. It was the better sort of business, not that of the hewers of wood and drawers of water, (it is not so strange, if men hate all that labour,) but it was "in wisdom, and knowledge, and equity," ver. 21; it was rational business, which related to the government of his kingdom, and the advancement of its interests; it was labour managed by the dictates of wisdom, of natural and acquired knowledge, and the directions of justice; it was labour at the council-board, and in the courts of justice; it was labour wherein he shewed himself wise, ver. 19, which as much excels the labour wherein men only shew themselves strong, as the endowments of the mind, by which we are allied to angels, do those of the body which we have in common with the brutes. That which many people have in their eye more than any thing else, in the prosecution of their worldly business, is to shew themselves wise, to get the reputation of ingenious men, and men of sense and application.

Secondly. His falling out with his business; he presently grew sick of it. 1. He hated all his labour, because he did not meet with that satisfaction in it which he expected. After he had had his fine houses, and gardens, and waterworks a while, he began to nauseate them, and look upon them with contempt, as children that are eager for a toy, and fond of it at first, but when they have played with it a while are weary of it, and throw it away, and must have another. This speaks, not a gracious hatred of these things, which is our duty, to love them less than God and religion, Lu. xiv. 26; nor a sinful hatred of them, which is our folly, to be weary of the place God has assigned to us, and the work of it; but a natural hatred of them, arising from a surfeit upon them, and a sense of disappointment in them. 2. He caused his heart to despair of all his labour, ver. 20; that is, he took pains to possess himself with a deep sense of the vanity of worldly business, that it would not bring in the advantage and satisfaction he had formerly flattered himself with the hopes of. Our hearts are very loath to quit their expectations of great things from the creature; we must go about, must fetch a compass in arguing with them, to convince them that there is not that in the things of this world which we are apt to promise ourselves from them. Have we so often bored and sunk into this earth for some rich mine of satisfaction, and found not the least sign or token of it, but been always frustrated in the search; and shall we not at length set our hearts at rest, and despair of ever finding it? 3. He came to that at length that he hated life itself, ver. 17; because it is subject to so many toils and tosses, and a constant series of disappointments. God had given Solomon such largeness of heart, and such vast capacities of mind, that he experienced more than other men of the unsatisfying nature of all the things of this life, and their insufficiency to make him happy. Life itself, that is so precious to a man, and such a blessing to a good man, may become a burthen to a man of business.

Thirdly. The reasons of this quarrel with his life and labours. Two things made him weary of them:

1. That his business was so great a toil to himself. The work that he wrought under the sun was grievous to him, ver. 17; his thoughts and cares about it, and that close and constant application of mind which was requisite to it, was a burthen and fatigue to him, especially when he grew old. It is the effect of a curse on that we are to work upon. Our business is said to be "the work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed," Gen. v. 19; and of the weakening of the faculties we are to work with, and of the sentence pronounced on us, that in the sweat of our face we must eat bread. Our labour is called the vexation of our heart, ver. 22. It is to most a force upon themselves, so natural is it to us to love our ease. A man of business is described to be uneasy both in his going out and his coming in, ver. 23. 1st. He is deprived of his pleasure by day, "for all his days are sorrow;" not only sorrowful, but sorrow itself, nay, many sorrows, and various. His travail or labour all day is grief; men of business ever and anon meet with that which vexeth them, and is an occasion of anger or sorrow to them. They that are apt to fret, the more dealings they have in the world the oftener they are made to fret. The world is a vale of tears even to those that have much of it. They that labour are said to be heavy laden, and are therefore called to come to Christ for rest, Mat. xi. 28. 2nd. He is disturbed in his repose by night. When he is overcome with the hurries of the day, and hopes to find relief when he lays his head on his pillow, he is disappointed there; cares hold his eyes waking, or if he sleep yet his heart wakes, and that taketh no rest in the night. See what fools they are that make themselves drudges to the world, and do not make God their rest; night and day they cannot but be uneasy. So that upon the whole matter it is all vanity, ver. 17; "this is vanity" in particular, ver. 19, 23; nay, it is "vanity and a great evil," ver. 21. It is a great affront to God, and a great injury to themselves, therefore a great evil, and a vain thing, to rise up early, and sit up late, in pursuit of this world's goods, which were never designed to be our chief good.

2. That the gains of his business must all be left to others. Prospect of advantage is the spring of action, and the spur of industry; therefore men labour, because they hope to get by it. If the hope fail, the labour flags And therefore Solomon quarrelled with all the works, the great works he had made, because they would not be of any lasting advantage to himself.

1st. He must leave them. He could not at death take them away with him, nor any share of them, nor should he return any more to them, Job vii. 10; nor would the remembrance of them do him any good, Lu. xvi. 25. But "I must leave all to the man that shall be after me," to the generation that comes up in the room of that which is passing away. As there were many before us who built the houses that we live in, and into whose purchases and labours we have entered, so there shall be many after us who shall live in the houses that we build, and enjoy the fruit of our purchases and labours. Never was land lost for want of an heir. To a gracious soul this is no uneasiness at all. Why should we grudge others their turn in the enjoyments of this world, and not rather be pleased that, when we are gone, those that come after us shall fare the better for our wisdom and industry? But to a worldly mind, that seeks for its own happiness in the creature, it is a great vexation to think of leaving the beloved self behind to I know not who.

2nd. He must leave them to those that would never have taken so much pains for them, and will thereby excuse himself from taking any pains. He that raised the estate did it by labouring in wisdom, in knowledge, and equity, but he that enjoys it and spends it, it may be, hath not laboured therein, ver. 21, and more than that, never will; the bee toils to maintain the drone Nay, it proves a snare to him; it is left him for his portion, which he rests in and takes up with, and miserable he is in being put off with it for a portion; whereas, if an estate had not come to him thus easily, who knows but he might have been both industrious and religious? Yet we ought not to perplex ourselves about this, since it may prove otherwise, that what is well got may come to one that will use it well and do good with it.

3rd. He knows not who he must leave it to, for God makes heirs, or at least what he will prove to whom he leaves it, whether a wise man or a fool; a wise man, that will make it more, or a fool, that will bring it to nothing. "Yet he shall have rule over all my labour," and foolishly undo that which his father wisely did. It is likely Solomon wrote this very feelingly, being afraid what Rehoboam would prove. St. Jerome, in his commentary on this passage, applies this to the good books which Solomon wrote, in which he had shewed himself wise, but he knew not into whose hands they would fall; perhaps into the hand of a fool, who, according to the perverseness of his heart, makes an ill use of what was well written. So that upon the whole matter he asks, ver. 22, "What has man of all his labour?" what has he to himself and to his own use? what has he that will go with him into another world?

Fourthly. The best use which is therefore to be made of the wealth of this world, and that is, to use it cheerfully, to take the comfort of it, and do good with it. With this he concludes the chapter, ver. 24—26. There is no true happiness to be found in these things; as to that they are vanity, and if happiness be expected from them the disappointment will be vexation of spirit. But he will put us in a way to make the best of them, and to avoid the inconveniences he had observed, 1st. We must not overtoil ourselves, so as in pursuit of more to rob ourselves of the comfort of what we have. 2nd. We must not overhoard for hereafter, nor lose our own enjoyment of what we have to lay it up for those that shall come after us, but serve ourselves out of it first. Observe,

1. What that good is which is here recommended to us, and which is the utmost pleasure and profit we can expect or extract from the business and profit of this world, and the farthest we can go to rescue it from its vanity and the vexation that is in it.

1st. We must do our duty with them, and be more in care how to use an estate well, for the ends for which we were intrusted with it, than how to raise or increase an estate. This is intimated, ver. 26, where those only are said to have the comfort of this life that are good in God's sight, and again, good before God, truly good, as Noah, whom God saw righteous before him. We must set God always before us, and give diligence in every thing to approve ourselves to him. The Chaldee paraphrase saith, 'That a man should make his soul to enjoy good, by keeping the commandments of God, and walking in the ways that are right before him;' and ver. 25, 'by studying the words of the law, and being in care about the day of the great judgment that is to come.'

2nd. We must take the comfort of them. These things will not make a happiness for the soul; all the good we can have out of them is for the body, and if we make use of them for the comfortable support of that, so as it may be fit to serve the soul, and able to keep pace with it in the service of God, then they turn to a good account. "There is," therefore, "nothing better for a man" as to these things, than to allow himself a sober, cheerful use of them, according as his rank and condition is, have meat and drink out of them for himself, his family, and friends, and so delight his senses, "and make his soul enjoy good," all the good that is to be had out of them. Do not lose that in pursuit of that good which is not to be had out of them. But observe, he would not have us to give up business, and take our ease, that we may "eat and drink;" no, we must "enjoy good in our labour;" we must use these things, not to excuse us from, but to make us diligent and cheerful in, our worldly business.

3rd. We must herein acknowledge God; we must see "that it is from the hand of God," that is, First. The good things themselves that we enjoy are so, not only the products of his creating power, but the gifts of his providential bounty to us. And then they are truly pleasant to us, when we take them from the hand of God as a Father, when we eye his wisdom giving us that which is fittest for us, and acquiesce in it, and taste his love and goodness, relish that, and are thankful for it. Secondly. A heart to enjoy them is so. This is the gift of God's grace. Unless he give us wisdom to make a right use of what he has in his providence bestowed upon us, and, withal, peace of conscience, that we may discern God's favour in the world's smiles, we cannot make ourselves enjoy any good in them.

2. Why we should have this in our eye in the management of ourselves as to this world, and look up to God for it.

1st. Because Solomon himself, with all his possessions, could aim at no more, and desire no better; ver. 25, "Who can hasten to this more than I?" This is that which I was ambitious of; I wished for no more, and those that have but little in comparison with what I have may attain to this, to be content with what they have, and enjoy the good of it. Yet Solomon could not obtain it by his own wisdom, without the special grace of God, and therefore directs us to expect it from the hand of God, and pray to him for it.

2nd. Because riches are a blessing or curse to a man, according as he has or has not a heart to make good use of them. First. God makes them a reward to a good man, if with them he give him wisdom, and knowledge, and joy, to enjoy them cheerfully himself, and to communicate them charitably to others. To those who are good in God's sight, that are of a good spirit, honest and sincere, pay a deference to their God, and have a tender concern for all mankind, 'God will give wisdom and knowledge in this world, and joy with the righteous in the world to come,' so the Chaldee. Or, he will give that wisdom and knowledge in things natural, moral, political, and Divine, which will be a constant joy and pleasure to them. Secondly. He makes them a punishment to an ill man, if he denies him a heart to take the comfort of them, for they do but tantalize him and tyrannize over him. "To the sinner God gives travail," by leaving him to himself and his own foolish counsels, "to gather and to heap up" that which as to himself will not only burthen him like thick clay, Hab. ii. 6, but be a witness against him, and eat his flesh as it were fire, Jas. v. 3; while God designs, by an overruling providence, "to give it to him that is good before him," for "the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, and gathered for him that will pity the poor." Note, 1*st.* That godliness with contentment is great gain; and those only have true joy that are good in God's sight, and that have it from him and in him. 2*nd.* Ungodliness is commonly punished with discontent and an insatiable covetousness, which are sins that are their own punishment. 3*rd.* That when God gives abundance to wicked men, it is with design to force them to a resignation to his own children when they are of age and ready for it, as the Canaanites kept possession of the good land till the time appointed for Israel's entering upon it. Lastly. The burthen of the song is still the same, "This is also vanity and vexation of spirit." It is vanity at the best, even to the good man; when he has all that the sinner has scraped together it will not make him happy without something else; but it is vexation of spirit to the sinner to see what he has laid up enjoyed by him that is good in God's sight, and therefore evil in his. So that, take it which way you will, the conclusion is firm, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

was not exempt from all the evils incident to humanity, he strangely argued that all effort to be wise and good was useless, and that the wise had no advantage by his wisdom. David's inward conflict may be compared with this in Psa. lxxiii., where the same trial, in another form, is exhibited. Observe, moreover, how the writer here (verse 15) tells us that he said in his heart these utterances of unbelief.

ii. 17, 18. In the Hebrew the "therefore" is merely "and," indicating the disposition which resulted from his illogical doubts. He "hated" his life and his labour; was tired and sick of them, and felt to dislike them. His unreasonable dislike of labour should have been checked by the thought that in God's providence we all enjoy the labours of those who came before us, and, to maintain the balance, must leave something to those who follow us. In these verses we have selfishness added to other ill dispositions. Why should it be so hard to do for his inexperienced son what his own father had done for him?

CHAPTER III.

Solomon, having shewed the vanity of studies, pleasures, and business, and made it to appear that happiness is not to be found either in the schools of the learned or in the gardens of Epicurus, or upon the exchange, he proceeds in this chapter farther to prove his doctrine, and the inference he had drawn from it, that therefore we should cheerfully content ourselves with, and make use of, what God has given us, by shewing, I. The mutability of all human affairs, ver. 1—10. II. The immutability of the Divine counsels concerning them, and the unsearchableness of those counsels, ver. 11—15. III. The vanity of worldly honour and power, which is abused for the support of oppression and persecution, if men be not governed by the fear of God in the use of it, ver. 16. And for a check to proud oppressors, and to shew them their vanity, he minds them, 1. That they will be called to account for it in the other world, ver. 17; 2. That their condition in reference to this world, (for of that he speaks,) is no better than that of the brutes, ver. 18—21; and therefore he concludes that it is our wisdom to make use of what power we have for our own comfort, and not to oppress others with it.

1 TO every thing there is a season,
And a time to every purpose under the heaven:
2 A time to be born, and a time to die; [planted;
A time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is 3 A time to kill, and a time to heal;
A time to break down, and a time to build up;
4 A time to weep, and a time to laugh;
A time to mourn, and a time to dance; [together;
5 A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones
A time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing;
6 A time to get, and a time to lose;
A time to keep, and a time to cast away;
7 A time to rend, and a time to sew;
A time to keep silence, and a time to speak;
8 A time to love, and a time to hate;
A time of war, and a time of peace. [laboureth?
9 What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he 10 I have seen the travail, which God hath given To the sons of men to be exercised in it.

The scope of these verses is to shew, 1. That we live in a world of changes; that the several events of time and conditions of human life are vastly different from one another, and yet occur promiscuously; and we are continually passing and repassing between them, as in the revolutions of every day and every year. It is the wheel of nature, Jas. iii. 6; sometimes one spoke is uppermost, and by and by the contrary, ebbing and flowing, waxing and waning; from one extreme to the other doth the fashion of this world change, ever did, and ever will. 2. That every change concerning us, and the time and season of it, is unalterably fixed and determined by a supreme power; and we must take things as they come, for it is not in our power to change what is appointed for us. And this comes in here as a reason why, when we are in prosperity, we should be easy, and yet not secure; not secure, because we live in a world of changes, and therefore have no reason to say, that "to-morrow shall be as this day;" the lowest valleys join to the highest mountains; and yet to be easy, and as he had advised, ch. ii. 24, "to enjoy the good of our labour," in an humble dependence upon God and his providence, neither lifted up with hopes nor cast down with fears, but with evenness of mind expecting every event. Here is,

First. A general proposition laid down, that "to every thing there is a season," ver. 1; that is, 1. Those things which seem most contrary the one to the other, yet in the revolution of affairs will each take their turn, and come in play. The day will give place to the night, and the night again to the day. Is it summer? it will be winter: Is it winter? stay awhile, and it will be summer. Every purpose has its time. The clearest sky will be clouded, post gaudia luctus,—'joy succeeds sorrow;" and the most clouded sky will clear up, post nubila Phœbus,—'the sun will burst from behind the cloud.' 2. Those things which to us seem most casual and contingent, yet in the counsel and foreknowledge of God are punctually determined, and the very hour of them fixed, which can neither be anticipated nor adjourned a moment.

Secondly. The proof and illustration of it by the induction of particulars, twenty-eight in number, according to the days of the moon's revolution, which is always increasing or decreasing, between its full and change. Some of these changes are purely the act of God, others depend more upon the will of man, but all are determined by the Divine counsel. Every thing under heaven is thus changeable, but in heaven there is an unchangeable state and an unchangeable counsel concerning these things.

1. There is "a time to be born, and a time to die." These are determined by the Divine counsel, and as we were born, so we must die, at the time appointed, Acts xvii. 26. Some observe that here is "a time to be born and a time to die," but no time to live, that is so short that it is not worth mentioning; as soon as we are born we begin to die. But as there is a time to be born, and a time to die, so there will be a time to rise again, a set time when they that lie in the grave shall be remembered, Job xiv. 13.

2. "A time" for God "to plant" a nation, as that of Israel in Canaan, and in order to that "to pluck up" the seven nations that were planted there, to make room for them. And at length there was a time when God spoke concerning Israel too, to pluck up and to destroy, when the measure of their iniquity was full, Jer. xviii. 7, 9. There is a time for men to plant, a time of the year, a time of their lives; but when that which was planted is grown fruitless and useless it is time to pluck it up.

3. "A time to kill," when the judgments of God are abroad in a land, and lay all waste; but when he returns in ways of mercy, then is "a time to heal" what he has torn, Hos. vi. 1, 2, to comfort a people after the time that he has afflicted them, Ps. xc. 15. There is a time when, it is the wisdom of rulers to use severe methods; but there is a time when it is as much their wisdom to take a more gentle course, and to apply themselves to lenitives, not corrosives.

4. "A time to break down" a family, an estate, a kingdom, when it has ripened itself for destruction; but God will find a time, if they return and repent, to rebuild what he has broken down; there is a time, a set time, for the Lord to build up Zion, Ps. cii. 13, 16. There is a time for men to break up house and break off trade, and so to break down, which they that are busy building up both must expect and prepare for.

5. "A time" when God's providence calls "to weep and mourn," and when man's wisdom and grace will comply with the call, and will weep and mourn, as in times of common calamity and danger, and then it is very absurd to laugh, and dance, and make merry, Isa. xxii. 12, 13; Eze. xxi. 10. But then, on the other hand, there is a time when God calls to cheerfulness, "a time to laugh and dance," and then he expects we should serve him with joyfulness and gladness of heart. Observe, The time of mourning and weeping is put first, before that of laughter and dancing, for we must first sow in tears and then reap in joy.

6. "A time to cast away stones," by breaking down and demolishing fortifications, when God gives peace in the borders, and there is no more occasion for them; but there is "a time to gather stones together" for the making of strongholds, ver. 5. A time for old towers to fall, as that in Siloam, Lu. xiii. 4, and for the temple itself to be so ruined as that not one stone should be left upon another; but also a time for towers and trophies too to be erected, when national affairs prosper.

7. "A time to embrace" a friend, when we find him faithful, but "a time to refrain from embracing," when we find he is unfair or unfaithful, and that we have cause to suspect him; it is then our prudence to be shy, and keep at a distance. It is commonly applied to conjugal embraces, and explained by 1 Cor. vii. 3—5; Joel ii. 16.

8. "A time to get," get money, get preferment, get good bargains, and a good interest, when opportunity smiles; a time when a wise man will seek, so the word is. When he is setting out in the world, and has a growing family, when he is in his prime, when he has good hits, and has a run of business, then it is time for him to be busy, and make hay when the sun shines. There is a time to get wisdom, and knowledge, and grace, when a man has a price put into his hand. But then let him expect there will come a time to spend; when all he has will be little enough to serve his turn; nay, there will come "a time to lose," when what has been got fast will be scattered as fast, and cannot be held fast.

9. "A time to keep;" when we have use for what we have got, and can keep it without running the hazard of a good conscience. But there may come "a time to cast away," when love to God may oblige us to cast away what we have, because we must deny Christ and wrong our consciences if we keep it, Mat. x. 37, 38, and rather to make shipwreck of all than of the faith; nay, when love to ourselves may oblige us to cast it away; when it is for the saving of our lives, as it was when Jonah's mariners heaved their cargo into the sea.

10. "A time to rend the garments," as upon occasion of some great grief, "and a time to sew" them again, in token that the grief is over; a time to undo what we have done, and a time to do again what we have undone. Jerome applies it to the rending of the Jewish church, and the sewing and making up of the gospel church thereupon.

11. "A time" when it becomes us, and is our wisdom and duty, "to keep silence," when it is an evil time, Am. v. 13, when our speaking would be the casting of pearls before swine, or when we are in danger of speaking amiss, Ps. xxxix. 2. But there is also "a time to speak" for the glory of God and the edification of others, when silence would be the betraying of a righteous cause, and when with the mouth confession is to be made to salvation. And it is a great part of Christian prudence to know when to speak and when to hold our peace.

12. "A time to love" and to shew ourselves friendly, to be free and cheerful, and it is a pleasant time; but there may come "a time to hate," when we shall see cause to break off all familiarity with some that we have been fond of, and to be upon the reserve, as having found reason for a suspicion which love is loath to admit.

13. "A time of war;" when God draws the sword for judgment, and gives it commission to devour; when men draw the sword for justice and the maintaining of their rights; when there is in the nations a disposition to war. But we may hope for "a time of peace," when the sword of the Lord shall be sheathed, and he shall make wars to cease, Ps. xlvi. 9; when the end of the war is obtained, and when there is on all sides a disposition to peace. War shall not last always, nor is there any peace to be called lasting on this side the everlasting peace. Thus in all these changes God hath set the one over against the other, that we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

Thirdly. The inferences drawn from this observation. If our present state be subject to such vicissitude,

1. Then we must not expect our portion in it, for the good things of it are of no certainty, no continuance; ver. 9, "What profit hath he that worketh?" What can a man promise himself from planting and building, when that which he thinks brought to perfection may so soon and will so surely be plucked up and broken down? All our pains and care will not alter either the mutable nature of the things themselves or the immutable counsel of God concerning them.

2. Then we must look upon ourselves as upon our probation in it. There is indeed no profit in that wherein we labour; the thing itself, when we have it, will do us little good. But if we make a right use of the disposals of providence about it there will be profit in that; ver. 10, "I have seen the travail which God hath given to the sons of men," not to make up a happiness by it, but to be exercised in it, to have various graces exercised by the variety of events, to have their dependence upon God tried by every change, and to be trained up to it, and taught both how to want and how to abound, Phil. iv. 12. Note, 1st. There is a great deal of toil and trouble to be seen among the children of men; labour and sorrow fill the world. 2nd. This toil and trouble is what God hath allotted us; he never intended this world for our rest, and therefore never appointed us to take our ease in it. 3rd. To many it proves a gift; God gives it men as the physician gives a medicine to his patient, to do him good. This travail is given us to make us weary of the world, and desirous of the remaining rest. 4th. It is given us that we may be kept in action, and may always have something to do, for we were none of us sent into the world to be idle. Every change cuts us out some new work, which we should be more solicitous about than about the event.

11 He hath made every thing beautiful in his time:
Also he hath set the world in their heart,
So that no man can find out the work that God maketh
From the beginning to the end.
12 I know that there is no good in them,
But for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life
13 And also that every man should eat and drink,

ii. 24—26. In these verses we have a continuance of the sceptical reasonings commenced in verse 15. Yet nothing is more common than for infidels to quote these words as contradicting other texts. They do contradict other texts, but it is error contradicting truth, and unbelief contradicting faith. The thought in verse 25 is, "Who has such a right to enjoy the good things of life as the man that has worked for them?" The whole concludes with a declaration, indicative of a return to right reasoning, that, after all, the good man is under the special favour of God, and is really in a more desirable condition. Thus the previous sceptical thoughts are cast aside, and faith returns.

iii. 1—8. It is not meant that it is a duty to do all the things here enumerated, because they are not looked on from the standpoint of duty. The meaning is that at one time or another all of them happen, that room is found for each of them in the course of affairs.

And enjoy the good of all his labour. it is the gift of God.
14 I know that, whatsoever God doeth,
It shall be for ever:
Nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it:
And God doeth it, that men should fear before him.
15 That which hath been is now;
And that which is to be hath already been;
And God requireth that which is past.

We have seen what changes there are in the world, and must not expect to find the world more sure to us than it has been to others. Now here he shews the hand of God in all those changes; it is he that has made every creature to be that to us that it is, and therefore we must have our eye always up unto him.

First. We must make the best of that which is, and must believe it best for the present, and accommodate ourselves to it. "He has made every thing beautiful in his time," ver. 11; and, therefore, while its time lasts we must be reconciled to it, nay, we must please ourselves with the beauty of it. Note, 1. Every thing is as God has made it; it is really as he has appointed it to be, not as it appear to us. 2. That which to us seems most unpleasant, yet in its proper time is decent enough. Cold is as becoming in winter as heat in summer; and the night in its turn is a black beauty, as the day in its turn is a bright one. 3. There is a wonderful harmony in the Divine providence, and all its disposals; so that the events of it, when they come to be considered in their relations and tendencies, together with the seasons of them, will appear very beautiful to the glory of God, and the comfort of those that trust in him. Though we see not the complete beauty of providence, yet we shall see it; and a glorious sight it will be, when the mystery of God shall be finished. Then every thing shall appear to have been done in the most proper time, and it will be the wonder of eternity, Deu. xxxii. 4; Eze. i. 18.

Secondly. We must wait with patience for the full discovery of that which to us seems intricate and perplexed, acknowledging that we cannot "find out the work that God makes from the beginning to the end," and therefore must judge nothing before the time. We are to believe that God hath made all beautiful, every thing is done well, as in creation so in providence, and we shall see it when the end comes, but till then we are incompetent judges of it. While the picture is in drawing, and the house in building, we see not the beauty of either; but when the artist has put his last hand to them, and given them their finishing strokes, then all appears very good. We see but the middle of God's works, not from the beginning of them, (then we should see how admirably the plan was laid in the Divine counsels;) nor to the end of them, which crowns the action; (then we should see the product to be glorious;) but we must wait till the vail be rent, and not arraign God's proceedings, nor pretend to pass a judgment on them. Secret things belong not to us.

Those words, "He hath set the world in their hearts," are differently understood. 1. Some make them to be a reason why we may know more of God's works than we do. So Mr. Pemble, 'God hath not left himself without witness of his righteous, equal, and beautiful ordering of things, but hath set it forth to be observed in the book of the world, and this he hath set in men's hearts; that is, given man a large desire, and a power in good measure to comprehend and understand the history of nature with the course of human affairs, so that, if men did but give themselves to the exact observation of things, they might in most of them perceive an admirable order and contrivance.' 2. Others make them to be a reason why we do not know so much of God's works as we might. So Bishop Reynolds: we have the world so much in our hearts, 'are so taken up with thoughts and cares of worldly things, and are so exercised in our travail concerning them, that we have neither time nor spirit to eye God's hand in them.' The world has not only gained possession of the heart, but has formed prejudices there against the beauty of God's works.

Thirdly. We must be pleased with our lot in this world, and cheerfully acquiesce in the will of God concerning us, and accommodate ourselves to it. There is no certain lasting good in these things; what good there is in them we are here told, ver. 12, 13. We must make a good use of them. 1. For the benefit of others. All the good there is in them is to do good with them; to our families, to our neighbours, to the poor, to the public, to its civil and religious interests. What have we our beings, capacities, and estates for, but to be some way serviceable to our generation? We mistake if we think we were born for ourselves. No, it is our business to do good; it is in that that there is the truest pleasure, and what is so laid out is best laid up, and will turn to the best account. Observe, It is to do good in this life, which is short and uncertain; we have but a little time to be doing good in, and therefore have need to redeem time. It is in this life, where we are in a state of trial and probation for another life. Every man's life is his opportunity of doing that which will make for him in eternity. 2. For our own comfort. Let us make ourselves easy, rejoice, and enjoy the good of our labour, as it is the gift of God, and so enjoy God in it, and taste his love; return him thanks, and make him the centre of our joy; eat and drink to his glory, and serve him with joyfulness of heart in the abundance of all things. If all things in this world be so uncertain, it is a foolish thing for men sordidly to spare for the present that they may hoard up all for hereafter; it is better to live cheerfully and usefully upon what we have, and let to-morrow take thought for the things of itself. Grace and wisdom to do this is the gift of God; and it is a good gift, which crowns the gifts of his providential bounty.

Fourthly. We must be entirely satisfied in all the disposals of the Divine providence, both as to personal and public concerns, and bring our minds to them, because God in all "performeth the thing that is appointed for us," acts according to the counsel of his will; and we are here told, 1. That that counsel cannot be altered, and therefore it is our wisdom to make a virtue of necessity, by submitting to it. It must be as God will; "I know" (and every one knows it that knows any thing of God) "that whatsoever God doth, it shall be for ever," ver. 14. He is in one mind, and who can turn him? His measures are never broken, nor is he ever put upon new counsels, but what he hath purposed shall be effected, and all the world cannot defeat or disannul it. It behoves us therefore to say, Let it be as God will; for, how cross soever it may be to our designs and interests, God's will is his wisdom. 2. That that counsel needs not be altered; for there is nothing amiss in it, nothing that can be amended. If we could see it all together at one view, we should see it so perfect, that "nothing can be put to it;" for there is no deficiency in it," "nor any thing taken from it," for there is nothing in it unnecessary, or that can be spared. As the word of God, so the works of God, are each perfect in their kind, and it is presumption for us either to add to them or to diminish from them, Deu. iv. 2. It is therefore as much our interest as our duty to bring our wills to the will of God.

Fifthly. We must study to answer God's end in all his providences, which is in general to make us religious. God doth all that "men should fear before him;" to convince them that there is a God above them, that has a sovereign dominion over them, at whose dispose they are, and all their ways, and in whose hands their times are, and all events concerning them; and that, therefore, they ought to have their eyes ever towards him, to worship and adore him, to acknowledge him in all their ways, to be careful in every thing to please him, and afraid of offending him in any thing. God thus changeth his disposals, and yet is unchangeable in his counsels; not to perplex us, much less to drive us to despair, but to teach us our duty to him, and engage us to do it. That which God designs in the government of the world is the support and advancement of religion among men.

Sixthly. Whatever changes we see or feel in this world, we must acknowledge the inviolable steadiness of God's government. The sun riseth and setteth, the moon increaseth and decreaseth; and yet both are where they were, and their revolutions are in the same method from the beginning, according to the ordinances of heaven. So it is with the events of providence; ver. 15, "That which has been is now." God has not of late begun to use this method; no, things were always as mutable and uncertain as they are now; and so they will be: "that which is to be hath already been;" and therefore we speak inconsiderately when we say, Surely the world was never so bad as it is now; or, None ever met with such disappointments as we meet with; or, The times will mend. They may mend with us, and after a time to mourn there may come a time to rejoice, but that will still be liable to the common character, to the common fate. The world, as it has been, is and will be constant in inconstancy; for "God requireth that which is past," that is, repeats what he has formerly done, and deals with us no otherwise than as he has used to deal with good men; and "shall the earth be forsaken for us, or the rock removed out of its place?" There has no change befallen us, nor any temptation by it taken us, but such as is common to men. Let us not be proud and secure in prosperity, for God may recall a past trouble, and order that to seize us, and spoil our mirth, Ps. xxx. 7; nor let us despond in adversity, for God may call back the comforts that are past, as he did to Job. We may apply this to our past actions, and our behaviour under the changes that have been concerning us; God will call us to account for that which is past, and therefore, when we enter into a new condition, we should judge ourselves for our sins in our former condition, prosperous or afflicted.

16 And moreover I saw under the sun
The place of judgment, that wickedness was there;
And the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there.
17 I said in mine heart,
God shall judge the righteous and the wicked:
For there is a time there for every purpose and for every 18 I said in mine heart [work.
Concerning the estate of the sons of men,
That God might manifest them,
And that they might see that they themselves are beasts.
19 For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts;
Even one thing befalleth them:
As the one dieth, so dieth the other;
Yea, they have all one breath;
So that a man hath no preeminence above a beast:
For all is vanity.
20 All go unto one place;
All are of the dust, and all turn to dust again.
21 Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward,
And the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?
22 Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, Than that a man should rejoice in his own works;
For that is his portion:
For who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?

Solomon is still shewing that every thing in this world, without piety and the fear of God, is vanity. Take away religion, and there is nothing valuable among men; nothing for the sake of which a wise man would think it worth while to live in this world. In these verses he shews that power, than which there is nothing men are more ambitious of, and life itself, than which there is nothing men are more fond, more jealous of, are nothing without the fear of God.

First. Here is the vanity of man as mighty; man in his best estate, man upon the throne, where his authority is submitted to. Man upon the judgment-seat, where his wisdom and justice is appealed to; and where, if he be governed by the laws of religion, he is God's vicegerent, nay, he is of those to whom it is said, Ye are gods; but without the fear of God it is vanity, for set that aside, and,

1. The judge will not judge aright, will not use his power well, but will abuse it, instead of doing good with it, will do hurt with it; and then it is not only vanity, but a lie, a cheat to himself, and to all about him, ver. 16. Solomon perceived by what he had read of former times, what he heard of other countries, and what he had seen in some corrupt judges, even in the land of Israel, notwithstanding all his care to prefer good men, that there was wickedness in the place of judgment. It is not so above the sun,—far be it from God that he should do iniquity, or pervert justice,—but under the sun it is often found that that which should be the refuge proves the prison of oppressed innocency. "Man being in honour, and not understanding" what he ought to do, "becomes like the beasts that perish;" like the beasts of prey, even the most ravenous, Ps. xlix. 20. Not only from the persons that sat in judgment, but even in the places where judgment was in pretence administered, and righteousness was expected, there was iniquity. Men met with the greatest wrongs in those courts to which they fled for right. This is vanity and vexation, for, 1st. It had been better for the people to have had no judges than to have had such. 2nd. It will prove better for the judges they had had no power, than to have had it and used it to such ill purposes; and so they will say another day.

iii. 11. The sense of the first clause is, "God hath made everything beautiful in its proper season," a sentiment which was not unknown to the wiser heathens. Thus Sophocles, in "Œdipus Tyrannus," says, "For everything is beautiful in its season." The remainder of the verse is exceedingly obscure in sense, although involving no difficulties of grammar. The Hebrew words, the sense of which it is so hard to fix, are those rendered, "He hath set the world in their heart." The verb rendered "set" primarily signifies to give, and hence to constitute, allow, set, &c. The word for "world" often means continued duration, ever, or eternity, and some say it here means wisdom, while others think it means the world or that which is of a worldly character, and others again take it literally for the world in a material sense. Dr. Adam Clarke and many others would understand the term to mean eternity. If wisdom is meant, we must translate, "Also he hath put wisdom in their hearts, apart from which men would not find out the work which

2. The judge will himself be judged for not judging right. When Solomon saw how judgment was perverted among men, he looked up to God, the judge, and looked forward to the day of his judgment; ver. 17, "I said in my heart," that this unrighteous judgment is not so conclusive as both sides take it to be, for there will be a review of the judgment. "God shall judge" between "the righteous and the wicked," shall judge for the righteous, and plead their cause, though now it is run down, and judge against the wicked, and reckon with them for all their unrighteous decrees, and the grievousness which they have prescribed, Isa. x. 1. With an eye of faith we may see, not only the period, but the punishment, of the pride and cruelty of oppressors, Ps. xcii. 7; and it is an unspeakable comfort to the oppressed that their cause will be heard over again; let them therefore wait with patience, for there is another judge that standeth before the door. And though the day of affliction may last long, yet there is a time, a set time, for the examination of every purpose, and every work done under the sun. Men have their day now, but God's day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. With God there is a time for the rehearing of causes, redressing of grievances, and reversing of unjust decrees, though as yet we see it not here, Job xxiv. 1.

Secondly. Here is the vanity of man as mortal. He now comes to speak more generally concerning the estate of the sons of men in this world, their life and being on earth; and shews that their reason, without religion and the fear of God, doth advance them but little above the beasts. Now observe,

1. What he aims at in this account of man's estate. 1st. That God may be honoured, may be justified, may be glorified; 'that they might clear God,' so the margin reads it; that if men have an uneasy life in this world, full of vanity and vexation, they may thank themselves, and lay no blame on God. Let them clear him, and not say he made this world to be man's prison, and life to be his penance; no, God made man in respect both of honour and comfort little lower than the angels; if he be mean and miserable, it is his own fault. Or, that God, that is, the word of God, might manifest them, and discover them to themselves, and so appear to be quick and powerful, and a judge of men's characters; and we may be made sensible how open we lie to God's knowledge and judgment. 2nd. That man may be humbled, may be vilified, may be mortified, "that they might see that they themselves are beasts." It is something to do to convince proud men that they are but men, Ps. ix. 20, much more to convince ill men that they are beasts, that being destitute of religion they are as "the beasts that perish," "as the horse and the mule that have no understanding." Proud oppressors are as beasts, as roaring lions and raging bears. Nay, every man that minds his body only, and not his soul, makes himself no better than a brute, and must wish at least to die like one.

2. The proof he gives of it. That which he undertakes to prove is, that a worldly, carnal, earthly-minded "man has no preeminence above the beast; for all" that which he sets his heart upon, placeth his confidence and expects a happiness in, "is vanity," ver. 19. Some make this to be the language of an atheist, who justifies himself in his iniquity, ver. 16, and evades the argument taken from the judgment to come, ver. 17, by pleading that there is not another life after this, but that when man dies there is an end of him, and therefore while he lives he may live as he list; but others rather think Solomon here speaks as he himself thinks, but is to be understood in the same sense with that of his father, Ps. xlix. 14, "Like sheep they are laid in the grave;" and that he intends to shew the vanity of this world's wealth and honours, 'by the equal condition in mere outward respects' (as Bishop Reynolds expounds it) 'between men and beasts.'

1st. The events concerning both seem much alike; ver. 19, "That which befalls the sons of men" is no other than that which "befalleth beasts." A great deal of knowledge of human bodies is gained by the anatomy of the bodies of brutes. When the deluge swept away the old world the beasts perished with mankind; horses and men are killed in battle with the same weapons of war.

2nd. The end of both to an eye of sense seems alike too. "They have all one breath," and breathe in the same air, and it is the general description of both, that "in their nostrils is the breath of life," Gen. vii. 22; and therefore "as the one dies, so dies the other;" in their expiring there is no visible difference, but death makes much the same change with a beast that it doth with a man.

First. As to their bodies, the change is altogether the same, bating the different respects that are paid to them by the survivors. Let a man be buried with the burial of an ass, Jer. xxii. 19; and what preeminence then has he above a beast? The touch of the dead body of a man, by the law of Moses, contracted a greater ceremonial pollution than the touch of the carcass even of an unclean beast or fowl. And Solomon here observes, that all go unto one place, the dead bodies of men and beasts putrefy alike, all are of the dust in their original; for we see all turn to dust again in their corruption. What little reason then have we to be proud of our bodies, or any bodily accomplishments, when they must not only be reduced to the earth very shortly, but must be so in common with the beasts, and we must mingle our dust with theirs.

Secondly. As to their spirits, there is indeed a vast difference, but not a visible one, ver. 21. It is certain that the spirit of the sons of men at death is ascending; it goes upward to the Father of spirits who made it, to the world of spirits, to which it is allied; it dies not with the body, but is "redeemed from the power of the grave," Ps. xlix. 15. It goes upward to be judged and determined to an unchangeable state. It is as certain that "the spirit of the beast goes downward to the earth;" it dies with the body,—it perisheth, and is gone at death. The soul of a beast is at death like a candle blown out, there is an end of it; whereas the soul of a man is then like a candle taken out of a dark lantern, which leaves the lantern useless indeed, but doth itself shine brighter. This great difference there is between the spirits of men and beasts. And a good reason it is why men should set their affections on things above, and lift up their souls to those things, not suffering them, as if they were the souls of brutes, to cleave to this earth; but who knows this difference? We cannot see the ascent of the one and the descent of the other with our bodily eyes; and therefore those that live by sense, as all carnal sensualists do that walk in the sight of their eyes, and will not admit any other discoveries, by their own rule of judgment, have no preeminence above the beasts. "Who knows?" that is, who considers this? Isa. liii. 1. Very few; were it better considered, the world would be every way better; but the most of men live as if they were to be here always, or as if when they die there were an end of them. And it is not strange those live like beasts who think they shall die like beasts. But on such the noble faculties of reason are perfectly lost and thrown away.

3. An inference drawn from it; ver. 22, "There is nothing better," as to this world, nothing better to be had out of our wealth and honour, "than that a man should rejoice in his own works," that is, 1st. Keep a clear conscience, and never admit iniquity into the place of righteousness. "Let every man prove his own work," and approve himself to God in it, "so shall he have rejoicing in himself alone," Gal. vi. 4. Let him not get or keep any thing but what he can rejoice in: see 2 Cor. i. 12. 2nd. Live a cheerful life. If God have prospered the work of our hands unto us, let us rejoice in it, and take the comfort of it, and not make it a burthen to ourselves, and leave others the joy of it; for that is our portion, not the portion of our souls. Miserable are they that have their portion in this life. Ps. xvii. 14, and fools are they that choose it, and take up with it, Lu. xii. 19. But it is the portion of the body; that only which we enjoy is ours out of this world; it is taking what is to had, and making the best of it. And the reason is, because none can give us a sight of what shall be after us, either who shall have our estates or what use they will make of them. When we are gone, it is likely we shall not see what is after us; there is no correspondence that we know of between the other world and this, Job xiv. 21. They in the other world will be wholly taken up with that world, so that they will not care for seeing what is done in this. And while we are here we cannot foresee what shall be after us, either as to our families or the public. "It is not for us to know the times and seasons" that shall be after us, which, as it should be a restraint to our cares about this world, so it should be a reason for our concern about another. Since death is a final farewell to this life, let us look before us to another life.

CHAPTER IV.

Solomon, having shewed the vanity of this world in the temptation which those in power are in to oppress and trample upon their subjects, here farther shews, I. The temptation which the oppressed are in to discontent and impatience, ver. 1—3. II. The temptation which those that love their ease are in to take their ease, and neglect business for fear of being envied, ver. 4—6. III. The folly of hoarding up abundance of worldly wealth, ver. 7, 8. IV. A remedy against that folly in being made sensible of the benefit of society and mutual assistance, ver. 9—12. V. The mutability even of royal dignity, not only through the folly of the prince himself, ver. 14, 15, but through the fickleness of the people, let the prince be never so discreet, ver. 15, 16. It is not the prerogative even of kings themselves to be exempted from the vanity and vexation that attends these things; let none else then expect it.

SO I returned, and considered all the oppressions
That are done under the sun:
And behold the tears of such as were oppressed,
And they had no comforter;
And on the side of their oppressors there was power;
But they had no comforter.
2 Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead
More than the living which are yet alive.
3 Yea, better is he than both they,
Which hath not yet been, who hath not seen
The evil work that is done under the sun.

Solomon had a large soul, 1 Kin. iv. 29, and it appeared by this, among other things, that he had a very tender conscience for the miserable part of mankind, and took cognizance of the afflictions of the afflicted. He had taken the oppressors to task, ch. iii. 16, 17, and put them in mind of the judgment to come, to be a curb to their insolence. Now here he observes the oppressed; this he did, no doubt, as a prince, to do them justice, and avenge them of their adversaries; for he both feared God and regarded men. But here he doth it as a preacher, and shews,

First. The troubles of their condition, ver. 1. And of those he speaks very feelingly, and with compassion. It grieved him,

1. To see might prevailing against right; to see so much oppression done under the sun; to see servants, and labourers, and poor workmen oppressed by their masters, who take advantage of their necessity to impose what terms they please upon them; debtors oppressed by cruel creditors, and creditors too by fraudulent debtors; tenants oppressed by hard landlords, and orphans by treacherous guardians; and, worst of all, subjects oppressed by arbitrary princes, and unjust judges. Such oppressions are done under the sun; above the sun righteousness reigns for ever. Wise men will consider these oppressions, and contrive to do something for the relief of those that are oppressed. "Blessed is he that considers the poor."

2. To see how those that were wronged laid to heart the wrongs that were done them. He beheld "the tears of such as were oppressed," and perhaps could not forbear weeping with them. The world is a place of weepers, look which way we will; and we have a melancholy scene presented to us,—"the tears of those that are oppressed" with one trouble or other. They find it is to no purpose to complain, and therefore mourn in secret, as Job, ch. xvi. 20; xxx. 28. But "blessed are they that mourn."

3. To see how unable they were to help themselves. "On the side of their oppressors there was power," when they had done wrong to stand to it, and make good what they had done, so that the poor were borne down with a strong hand, and had no way to do themselves right. It is sad to see power misplaced, and that which was given men to enable them to do good perverted to support them in doing wrong.

4. To see how they and their calamities were slighted by all about them. They wept, and needed comfort, but there was none to do that friendly office; "They had no comforter;" their oppressors were big and threatening; and "therefore they had no comforter;" they that should have comforted them durst not, for fear of displeasing the oppressors, and being made their companions for offering to be their comforters. It is sad to see so little humanity among men.

Secondly. The temptations of their condition. Being thus hardly used, they are tempted to hate and despise life, and to envy those that are dead and in their graves, and to wish they had never been born, ver. 2, 3. And Solomon is ready to agree with them; for it serves to prove that all is vanity and vexation, since life itself is often so. And if we undervalue it in comparison with the favour and fruition of God, as St. Paul, Acts xx. 24, Phil. i. 23, it is our praise; but if, as here, only for the sake of the miseries that attended it, it is our infirmity; and we judge therein after the flesh, as Job and Elijah did.

1. He here thinks them happy that have ended this miserable life,—have done their part, and quitted the stage. "I praised the dead that are already dead," slain outright, or that had a speedy passage through the world, made a short cut over the ocean of life, dead already before they had well begun to live; I was pleased with their lot, and had it been in their own choice should have praised their wisdom, for but peeping into the world and then retiring as not liking it. I concluded, it is better with them than with "the living that are yet alive," and that is all; dragging the long and heavy chain of life, and wearing out its tedious minutes. This may be compared, not with Job iii. 20, 21, but with Rev. xiv. 13; where, in times of persecution (and such Solomon is here describing,) it is not the passion of man but the Spirit of God that saith, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth." Note, The condition of the saints that are dead, and gone to rest with God, is upon many accounts better and more desirable than the condition of living saints that are yet continued in their work and warfare.

God doeth from the beginning even to the end." Ginsburg's version is, "He hath also put eternity into their heart, only that man understandeth not the work which God hath made from beginning to end." If, however, worldly-mindedness is signified, we may render it, "Yea, also he hath suffered the world to be in their heart, forasmuch as men do not find out the work which God doeth," &c. On the whole we prefer to view the world here as meaning duration more or less extended.

iii. 12. The words "I know that there is no good in them" seem to signify "I recognised that there was nothing better for them." The spirit of mistrust and unbelief is again becoming prominent, this time with the peculiar feature that it makes God a party to it. Quite like an Epicurean, he says, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die; because these things are the good things which we should make the most of while we may, God having given them to us with that end in view." In the following verse the fatalistic inference is turned

2. He thinks them happy that never began this miserable life; nay, they are happiest of all; he "that has not yet been is better than both they." Better never to have been born than be born to "see the evil work that is done under the sun," to see so much wickedness committed, so much wrong done, and not only to be in no capacity to mend the matter, but to suffer ill for doing well. A good man, how calamitous a condition soever he is in this world, cannot have cause to wish he had never been born, since he is glorifying the Lord even in the fires, and will be happy at last, for ever happy; nor ought any to wish so while they are alive, for while there is life there is hope; a man is never undone till he is in hell.

4 Again, I considered all travail, and every right work,
That for this a man is envied of his neighbour
This is also vanity and vexation of spirit
5 The fool foldeth his hands together,
And eateth his own flesh
6 Better is an handful with quietness,
Than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit

Here Solomon returns to the observation and consideration of the vanity and vexation of spirit that attends the business of this world, which he had spoken of before, ch. ii. 11.

First. If a man be acute, and dexterous, and successful in his business, he gets the ill-will of his neighbours, ver. 4. Suppose he takes a great deal of pains, and goes through all travail, doth not get his estate easily, but it costs him a great deal of hard labour; nor doth he get it dishonestly, wrongs no man, defrauds no man, but by all the rightness of work, by applying himself to his own proper business, and managing it by all the rules of equity and fair-dealing, yet "for this he is envied of his neighbour," and the more for the reputation he has got by his honesty. This shews, 1. What little conscience most men have, that they will bear a grudge to a neighbour, give him an ill word, and do him an ill turn, only because he is more ingenious and industrious than themselves, and has more of the blessing of heaven. Cain envied Abel, Esau Jacob, and Saul David, and all for their right works. This is downright diabolism. 2. What little comfort wise and useful men must expect to have in this world. Let them behave themselves never so cautiously, they cannot escape being envied; and "who can stand before envy?" Pr. xxvii. 4. They that excel in virtue will always be an eyesore to those that exceed in vice, which should not discourage us from any right work, but drive us to expect the praise of it, not from men, but from God; and not to count upon satisfaction and happiness in the creature, for if right works prove "vanity and vexation of spirit," no works under the sun can prove otherwise. But for every right work a man shall be accepted of his God, and then he needs not value it, though he be envied of his neighbour, only it may make him love the world the less.

Secondly. If a man be stupid and dull, and blundering in his business, he doth ill for himself, ver. 5. The fool, that goes about his work as if his hands were muffled and folded together, that doth every thing awkwardly; the sluggard, for he is a fool, that loves his ease, and folds his hands together to keep them warm, because they refuse to labour; he eats his own flesh; is a cannibal to himself; brings himself into such a poor condition, that he has nothing to eat but his own flesh, into such a desperate condition that he is ready to eat his own flesh for vexation; he has a dog's life, hunger and ease. Because he sees active men that thrive in the world envied, he runs into the other extreme; and, lest he should be envied for his right works, he doth every thing wrong, and doth not deserve to be pitied. Note, Idleness is a sin that is its own punishment.

The following words, ver. 6, "Better is a handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit," may be taken either, 1. As the sluggard's argument for the excuse of himself in his idleness; he folds his hands together, and abuseth and misapplieth a good truth for his justification; as if, because a little with quietness is better than abundance with strife, therefore a little with idleness is better than abundance with honest labour. Thus wise in his own conceit is he, Pr. xxvi. 16. But, 2. I rather take it as Solomon's advice to keep the mean between that travail which will make a man envied and that slothfulness which will make a man eat his own flesh. Let us by honest industry lay hold on the handful, that we may not want necessaries, but not grasp at both the hands full, which will but create us vexation of spirit. Moderate pains and moderate gains will do best. A man may have but a handful of the world, and yet may enjoy it and himself with a deal of quietness, with content of mind, peace of conscience, and the love and good-will of his neighbours, while many that have both their hands full have more than heart could wish; have a great deal of travail and vexation with it. Those that cannot live of a little it is to be feared would not live as they should if they had never so much.

7 Then I returned, and I saw vanity under the sun
8 There is one alone, and there is not a second;
Yea, he hath neither child nor brother:
Yet is there no end of all his labour;
Neither is his eye satisfied with riches;
Neither saith he, For whom do I labour,
And bereave my soul of good?
This is also vanity, yea, it is a sore travail 9 Two are better than one;
Because they have a good reward for their labour.
10 For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow:
But woe to him that is alone when he falleth;
For he hath not another to help him up.
11 Again, if two lie together, then they have heat:
But how can one be warm alone?
12 And if one prevail against him,
Two shall withstand him;
And a threefold cord is not quickly broken.

Here Solomon fastens upon another instance of the vanity of this world, that many times the more men have of it the more they would have; and on this they are so intent that they have no enjoyment of what they have. Now Solomon here shews,

First. That selfishness is the cause of this evil: ver. 7, 8, "There is one alone, that minds none but himself, cares for nobody, but would if he could be placed alone in the midst of the earth. "There is not a second," nor doth he desire there should be; one mouth he thinks enough in a house, and grudges every thing that goes beside him. See how this covetous muckworm is here described,

1. He makes himself a mere slave to his business. Though he has no charge, "neither child nor brother," none to take care of but himself, none to hang upon him or draw from him, no poor relations, nor dares he marry for fear of the expense of a family, "yet is there no end of his labour," he is at it night and day, early and late, and will scarce allow necessary rest to himself and those he employs. He doth not confine himself within the bounds of his own calling, but is for having a hand in any thing that he can get by: see Ps. cxxvii. 2.

2. He never thinks he has enough. "His eye is not satisfied with riches." Covetousness is called "the lust of the eye," 1 Jno. ii. 16, because "the beholding of it with his eyes" is all that the worldling seems to covet, ch. v. 11. He has enough for his back, (as Bishop Reynolds observes,) for his belly, for his calling, for his family, for his living decently in the world, but he has not enough for his eyes. Though he can but see it, can but count his money, and not find in his heart to use it, yet he is not easy that he has not more to regale his eyes with.

3. He denies himself the comfort of what he hath. He bereaves his soul of good. If our souls be bereaved of good, it is we ourselves that do bereave them; others may bereave us of outward good, but cannot rob us of our graces and comforts, our spiritual good things. It is our own fault if we do not enjoy ourselves; yet many are so set upon the world, that in pursuit of it they bereave their souls of good here and for ever; make shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience, bereave themselves not only of the favour of God and eternal life, but of the pleasure of this world too, and this present life. Worldly people, pretending to be wise for themselves, are really enemies to themselves.

4. He has no excuse for doing this. "He has neither child nor brother;" none that he is bound to, on whom he may lay out what he has to his satisfaction while he lives; none that he has a kindness for, for whom he may lay it up to his satisfaction, and to whom he may leave it when he dies; none that are poor, or dear to him.

5. He has not consideration enough to shew himself the folly of this; he never puts this question to himself, "For whom do I labour thus?" Do I labour as I should for the glory of God, and that I may have to give to those that need? Do I consider that it is but for the body that I am labouring, a dying body; it is for others, and I know not for whom; perhaps for a fool that will scatter it as fast as I have gathered it; perhaps for a foe, that will be ungrateful to my memory. Note, It is wisdom for those that take pains about the world to consider who they take all this pains for; and whether it be really worth while to bereave themselves of good, that they may bestow it on a stranger. If men do not consider this, it is vanity, and a sore travail, they shame themselves, and vex themselves to no purpose.

Secondly. That sociableness is the cure of this evil. Men are thus sordid because they are all for themselves. Now Solomon shews here, by divers instances, that "it is not good for man to be alone," Gen. ii. 18. He designs hereby to recommend to us both marriage and friendship, two things which covetous misers decline because of the charge of them, but such is the comfort and advantage of them both, if prudently contracted, that they will very well quit cost. Man in paradise itself could not be happy without a mate, and therefore is no sooner made but matched.

1. Solomon lays this down for a truth, that "two are better than one," and more happy jointly than either of them could be separately; more pleased in one another than they could be in themselves only; mutually serviceable to each other's welfare, and by a united strength more likely to do good to others. "They have a good reward of their labour," that is, whatever service they do, it is returned to them another way. He that serves himself only has himself only for his paymaster, and commonly proves more unjust and ungrateful to himself than his friend, if he should serve him, would be to him. Witness him that labours endlessly, and yet bereaves his soul of good; he has no reward of his labour, but he that is kind to another has a good reward. The pleasure and advantage of holy love will be an abundant recompence for all the work and labour of love.

2. Hence he infers the mischief of solitude. "Woe to him that is alone;" he lies exposed to many temptations which good company and friendship would prevent and help him to guard against. He wants that advantage which a man has by the countenance of his friend, as iron has of being sharpened by iron. A monastic life then surely was never intended for a state of perfection, nor that those should be reckoned the greatest lovers of God that cannot find in their hearts to love any one else.

3. He proves it by divers instances of the benefit of friendship and good conversation.

1st. Occasional succour in an exigence. It is good for two to travel together, for if one happen to fall, and perhaps so as not to be able to get up himself, the other will be ready to help him up,—a friend at need is a friend indeed,—whereas if one travel alone and get a fall, he may be lost for want of a little help. If a man fall into sin his friend will help to restore him with the spirit of meekness; if he fall into trouble his friend will help to comfort him, and assuage his grief.

2nd. Mutual warmth. As a fellow traveller is of use, (amicus pro vehiculo,—'a friend is a good substitute for a carriage,') so is a bedfellow. "If two lie together they have heat;" so virtuous and gracious affections are excited by good society, and Christians warm one another, by "provoking one another to love and to good works."

3rd. United strength. If an enemy find a man alone, he is likely to prevail against him; with his own single strength he cannot make his part good, but if he have a second he may do well enough, two shall withstand him: You shall help me against my enemy, and I will help you against yours,—according to the agreement between Joab and Abishai, 2 Sam. x. 11; and so both are conquerors, whereas, acting separately, both had been conquered, as was said of the ancient Britons, when the Romans invaded them, Dum singuli pugnant universi vincuntur,—'While they fight in detached parties they sacrifice the general cause.' In our spiritual warfare we may be helpful to one another, as well as in our spiritual work. Next to the comfort of communion with God, is that of the communion of saints. He concludes with this proverb, "A threefold cord is not easily broken," no more than a bundle of arrows, though each single thread, and each single arrow is. Two together he compares to a threefold cord; for where two are closely joined in holy love and fellowship, Christ will by his Spirit come to them, and make the third, as he joined himself to the two disciples going to Emmaus, and then there is a threefold cord that can never be broken. "They that dwell in love, dwell in God, and God in them."

to account: God's decisions and works are for ever, to make men afraid; why, then, should we not "seize the pleasures of the present day?"

iii. 15. Some render, "What was is now; and what is to be is now; for God recalls the past;" i.e., the same things recur again and again in the course of events over which God presides. This opinion, which was adopted by some older critics, is by no means to be overlooked. If our translators, by "God requireth what is past," meant that God calls to account for what is past, we think they were in error; that doctrine comes up in the next verse.

iii. 17. "There is a time there" has been variously explained, some understanding the phrase of time, "there will be a time then," and others of place, "there is (or will be) a time there." We have no doubt the latter is right, and that the doctrine of a future judgment at an unnamed tribunal before God is solemnly proclaimed in this verse.

13 Better is a poor and a wise child
Than an old and foolish king,
Who will no more be admonished.
14 For out of prison he cometh to reign; [poor.
Whereas also he that is born in his kingdom becometh
15 I considered all the living which walk under the sun,
With the second child that shall stand up in his stead.
16 There is no end of all the people,
Even of all that have been before them:
They also that come after shall not rejoice in him.
Surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Solomon was himself a king, and therefore may be allowed to speak more freely than another concerning the vanity of kingly state and dignity, which he shews here to be an uncertain thing; he had said so, Pr. xxvii. 24, "The crown doth not endure to every generation," and his son found it so. Nothing more slippery than the highest post of honour, without wisdom and the people's love.

First. A king is not happy unless he have wisdom, ver. 13, 14. He that is truly wise, prudent, and pious, though he be poor in the world, and very young, and upon both accounts despised and little taken notice of, yet he is better, more truly valuable and worthy of respect, is likely to do better for himself, and to be a greater blessing to his generation, than a king, than an old king, and upon both accounts venerable, both for his gravity and for his dignity, if he be foolish, and knows not how to manage public affairs himself, nor will be admonished and advised by others; who knows not to be admonished, that is, will not suffer any counsel or admonition to be given him, none about him dares contradict him; or will not hearken to the counsel and admonition that is given him. It is so far from being any part of the honour of kings, that it is the greatest dishonour to them that can be, not to be admonished. Folly and wilfulness commonly go together; and those that most need admonition can worst bear it. And neither men's age nor their titles will secure them respect, if they have not true wisdom and virtue to recommend them; but those will gain men honour, even under the disadvantages of youth and poverty.

To prove the wise child better than the foolish king, he shews what each of them come to, ver. 14. 1. A poor man by his wisdom comes to be preferred, as Joseph, who, when he was but young, was brought out of prison to be the second man in the kingdom; to which story Solomon seems here to refer. Providence sometimes raiseth the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes, Ps. cxiii. 7, 8. Wisdom has not only wrought men's liberty, but their dignity; raised them from the dunghill, from the dungeon to the throne. 2. A king, by his folly and wilfulness, comes to be impoverished. Though he was "born in his kingdom," came to it by inheritance, though he has lived to be old in it, and has had time to fill his treasures, yet if he take ill courses, and "will no more be admonished" as he hath been, thinking because he is old he is past it, he "becomes poor," his treasure is exhausted, and perhaps he is forced to resign his crown and retire into privacy.

Secondly. A king is not likely to continue if he have not a confirmed interest in the affections of the people. This is intimated, but somewhat obscurely, in the last two verses. 1. He that is king must have a successor; "a second, a child that shall stand up in his stead;" his own, suppose, or perhaps that poor and wise child spoken of ver. 13. Kings, when they grow old, must have the mortification of seeing those that are to jostle them out, and stand up in their stead. 2. It is incident to the people to adore the rising sun. 'All the living which walk under the sun are with the second child,' are in his interests, are conversant with him, and make their court to him more than to the father, whom they look upon as going off, and despise him because his best days are done. Solomon considered this; he saw this to be the disposition of his own people, which appeared immediately after his death, in their complaints of his government, and their affectation of a change. 3. People are never long easy and satisfied. "There is no end," no rest, "of all the people," they are continually fond of changes, and know not what they would have. 4. This is no new thing, but it has been the way "of all that have been before them;" there have been instances of this in every age, even Samuel and David could not always please. 5. As it has been, so it is like to be still; they that come after will be of the same spirit, and shall not long rejoice in him that at first they seemed extremely fond of; to-day, Hosanna, to-morrow, Crucify. 6. It cannot but be a great grief to princes to see themselves thus slighted by those they have studied to oblige, and have depended upon. There is no faith in man; no stedfastness. "This is vanity and vexation of spirit."

CHAPTER V.

Solomon, in this chapter, discourseth, I. Concerning the worship of God, prescribing that as a remedy against all those vanities which he had already observed to be in wisdom, learning, pleasure, honour, power, and business. That we may not be deceived by those things, nor have our spirits vexed with the disappointments we meet with in them, let us make conscience of our duty to God, and keep up our communion with him. But withal he gives a necessary caution against the vanities which are too often found in religious exercises, which lose them their excellency, and render them unable to help against other vanities. If our religion be a vain religion, how great is that vanity! Let us therefore take heed of vanity, 1. In hearing the word, and offering sacrifice, ver. 1; 2. In prayer, ver. 2, 3; 3. In making vows, ver. 4—6; 4. In pretending to Divine dreams, ver. 7. Now, 1st. For a remedy against those vanities, he prescribes the fear of God, ver. 7; 2nd. To prevent the offence that might arise from the present sufferings of good people, he directs us to look up to God, ver. 8. II. Concerning the wealth of this world, and the vanity and vexation that attends it. The fruits of the earth indeed are necessary to the support of life, ver. 9; but as for silver, and gold, and riches, 1. They are unsatisfying, ver. 10; 2. They are unprofitable, ver. 11; 3. They are disquieting, ver. 12; 4. They often prove hurtful and destroying, ver. 13; 5. They are perishing, ver. 14; 6. They must be left behind when we die, ver. 15, 16; 7. If we have not a heart to make use of them, they occasion a great deal of uneasiness, ver. 17; and therefore he recommends to us the comfortable use of that which God hath given us, with an eye to him that is the giver, as the best way both to answer the end of our having it and to obviate the mischiefs that commonly attend great estates, ver. 18—20. So that, if we can but learn out of this chapter how to manage the business of religion, and the business of the world, which two take up the most of our time, so as that both may turn to a good account, and neither our sabbath days nor our week days may be lost, we shall have reason to say, We have learned two good lessons.

KEEP thy foot when thou goest to the house of God,
And be more ready to hear,
Than to give the sacrifice of fools:
For they consider not that they do evil
2 Be not rash with thy mouth.
And let not thine heart be hasty
To utter any thing before God:
For God is in heaven, and thou upon earth:
Therefore let thy words be few.
3 For a dream cometh through the multitude of business;
And a fool's voice is known by multitude of words.

Solomon's design in driving us off from the world, by shewing us the vanity of that, is to drive us to God and to our duty; that we may not walk in the way of the world, but by religious rules; nor depend on the wealth of the world, but on religious advantages; and therefore,

First. He here sends us to the house of God, to the place of public worship, to the temple, which he himself had built at a vast expense. When he reflected with regret on all his other works, ch. ii. 4, he did not repent that, but reflected on it with pleasure, yet mentions it not, lest he should seem to reflect on it with pride; yet here sends those to it that would know more of the vanity of the world, and would find that happiness which is in vain sought for in the creature. David, when he was perplexed, went into the sanctuary of God, Ps. lxxiii. 17. Let our disappointments in the creature turn our eyes to the Creator, have recourse to the word of God's grace and consult that, to the throne of his grace and solicit that. In the word and prayer there is a salve for every sore.

Secondly. He chargeth us to behave ourselves well there, that we may not miss of our end in coming thither. Religious exercises are not vain things; but if we mismanage them they become vain to us. And therefore,

1. We must address ourselves to them with all possible seriousness and care. "Keep thy foot," not keep it back from the house of God, as Pr. xxv. 17, nor go slowly thither, as one unwilling to draw nigh to God, but look well to thy goings, ponder the path of thy feet, lest thou take a false step. Address thyself to the worship of God with a solemn pause, and take time to compose thyself for it, not going about it with precipitation, which is called hasting with the feet, Pr. xix. 2. Keep thy thoughts from roving and wandering from the work; keep thy affections from running out towards wrong objects, for in the business of God's house there is work enough for the whole man, and all too little to be employed. Some think it alludes to the charge given to Moses and Joshua, to put off their shoes, Ex. iii. 5; Jos. v. 15; in token of subjection and reverence. Keep thy feet clean, Ex. xxx. 19.

2. We must take heed that the sacrifice we bring be not "the sacrifice of fools," that is, of wicked men, for they are fools, and their sacrifice is an abomination to the Lord, Pr. xv. 8; that we bring not the torn, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice, for we are plainly told that it will not be accepted, and therefore it is folly to bring it; that we rest not in the sign and ceremony, and the outside of the performance, without regarding the sense and meaning of it, for that is the sacrifice of fools. Bodily exercise, if that be all, is a jest; none but fools will think thus to please him who is a Spirit, and requires the heart; and they will see their folly when they find what a great deal of pains they have taken to no purpose, for want of sincerity. They are fools, "for they consider not that they do evil;" they think they are doing God and themselves good service, when really they are putting a great affront upon God, and a great cheat upon their own souls, by their hypocritical devotions. It is possible men may be doing evil, even then when they profess to be doing good, and even then when they do not know it, when they do not consider it. 'They know not but to do evil,' so some read it. Wicked minds cannot choose but sin, even in the acts of devotion. Or, "they consider not that they do evil;" that is, they act at a venture; right or wrong, pleasing to God or not, is all one to them.

3. That we may not bring the sacrifice of fools, we must come to God's house with hearts disposed to know and do our duty. We must "be ready to hear;" that is, 1st. We must diligently attend to the word of God read and preached. Be swift to hear the exposition which the priests give of the sacrifices, declaring the intent and meaning of them, and do not think it enough to gaze upon what they do, for it must be a reasonable service, otherwise it is the sacrifice of fools. 2nd. We must resolve to comply with the will of God as it is made known to us. Hearing is often put for obeying, and that is it that is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. xv. 22; Isa. i. 15, 16. We then come in a right frame to holy duties when we come with this upon our heart, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears." 'Let the word of the Lord come, (saith a good man,) and if I had six hundred necks, I would bow them all to the authority of it.'

4. We must be very cautious and considerate in all our approaches and addresses to God; ver. 2, "Be not rash with thy mouth" in making either prayers, or protestations, or promises. "Let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God." Note, 1st. When we are in the house of God, in solemn assemblies for religious worship, we are in a special manner before God and in his presence, there where he has promised to meet his people, where his eye is upon us, and ours ought to be up unto him. 2nd. We have something to say, something to utter before God, when we draw nigh to him in holy duties. He is one with whom we have to do, with whom we have business of vast importance. If we come without an errand, we shall go away without any advantage. 3rd. What we utter before God must come from the heart, and therefore we must not be rash with our mouth, never let our tongue outrun our thoughts in our devotions. The words of our mouth must always be the product of the meditation of our hearts. Thoughts are words to God, and words are but wind, if they be not copied from the thoughts. Lip-labour, though never so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour in religion, Mat. xv. 8, 9. 4th. It is not enough that what we say comes from the heart, but it must come from a composed heart, and not from a sudden heat or passion. As the mouth must not be rash, so the heart must not be hasty; we must not only think, but think twice before we speak, when we are to speak either from God in preaching, or to God in prayer, and not utter any thing indecent and undigested, 1 Cor. xiv. 15.

5. We must be few of our words in the presence of God; that is, we must be reverent and deliberate; not talk to God as boldly and carelessly as we do to one another, not speak what comes uppermost, not repeat things over and over, as we do to one another, that what we say may be understood and remembered, and may make impression. No, when we speak to God we must consider,

1st. That between him and us there is an infinite distance. "God is in heaven," where he reigns in glory over us, and all the children of men; where he is attended with an innumerable company of holy angels, and is far "exalted above all our blessing and praise." We are on earth, the footstool of his

iii. 18—22. After the triumph of faith in the preceding verse, the writer plunges down deeper into blind unbelief than ever, for he proclaims that the brute is as well off as the man in life, in death, and hereafter. So at least we understand it. They are alike in life and experience, they are alike in death, and they are alike in destiny. In verse 21 some, like our translators, avoid the last impiety suggested to the sceptical mind, and make it declare in effect that the spirit of man and of the brute have not the same destination. We fear the utmost that can be relied on is that the writer was tempted to deny that we know anything about it. Thus Dr. Ginsburg: "No one knoweth whether the spirit of man goeth upward, and whether the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth." But it is cruel to treat this exclamation of a soul under temptation as the deliberate doctrine of the Old Testament.

iv. 2. "Praised the dead" means commended the condition of the dead, or declared that they were better off than the living.

throne; are mean and vile, unlike God, and utterly unworthy to receive any favour from him, or to have any communion with him; therefore we must be very grave, and humble, and serious, and observe a decorum in speaking to him, as we do when we speak to a great man that is much our superior; and in token of this, let our words be few, that they may be well chosen, Job ix. 14. This doth not condemn all long prayers; were they not good, the Pharisees had not used them for a pretence. Christ prayed all night. And we are bid to continue in prayer; but it condemns careless, heartless praying, vain repetitions, Mat. vi. 7, repeating paternosters by tale. Let us speak to God, and of him, in his own words, words which the Scripture teacheth, and let our words, words of our own invention, be few, lest, not speaking by rule, we speak amiss.

2nd. That the multiplying of words in our devotions will make them the sacrifices of fools, ver. 3. As confused dreams, frightful and perplexed, and such as disturb the sleep, are an evidence of a hurry of business which fills our head, so many words and hasty ones used in prayer are an evidence of folly reigning in the heart; that is, ignorance of, and unacquaintedness with, both God and ourselves; low thoughts of God, and very careless thoughts of our own souls. Even in common conversation "a fool is known by the multitude of words." They that know least talk most, ch. x. 11, much more in devotion; there, no doubt, "a prating fool shall fall," Pr. x. 8, 10, shall fall short of acceptance. These are fools indeed who think they shall be heard in prayer for their much speaking.

4 When thou vowest a vow unto God,
Defer not to pay it;
For he hath no pleasure in fools:
Pay that which thou hast vowed.
5 Better is it that thou shouldest not vow,
Than that thou shouldest vow and not pay.
6 Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin;
Neither say thou before the angel, that it was an error:
Wherefore should God be angry at thy voice,
And destroy the work of thine hands?
7 For in the multitude of dreams and many words there are also divers vanities:
But fear thou God.
8 If thou seest the oppression of the poor,
And violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province,
Marvel not at the matter:
For he that is higher than the highest regardeth;
And there be higher than they.

Four things we are exhorted to in these verses:

First. To be conscientious in paying our vows. A vow is a bond upon the soul, Num. xxx. 2, by which we solemnly oblige ourselves, not only in general to that which we are already bound to, but in some particular instances, to which we were not under any antecedent obligation, to honour God, and serve the interests of his kingdom among men. When under the sense of some affliction, Ps. lxvi. 14, or in the pursuit of some mercy, 1 Sam. i. 11, thou hast vowed such a vow as this unto God, know that thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, and thou canst not go back. Therefore, 1. Pay it. Perform what thou hast promised, bring to God what thou hast dedicated and devoted to him. "Pay that which thou hast vowed," pay it in full, and keep not back any part of the price; pay it in kind, do not alter it, or change it, so the law was, Lev. xxvii. 10. Have we vowed to give our ownselves unto the Lord? let us then be as good as our word, act in his service, to his glory, and not sacrilegiously alienate ourselves. 2. "Defer not to pay it." If it be in the power of thy hands to pay it to-day, leave it not till to-morrow. Do not beg day, nor put it off to a more convenient season. By delay the sense of the obligation slackens and cools, and is in danger of wearing off; we thereby discover a loathness and backwardness to perform our vow. And qui non est hodie cras minus aptus erit,—'he who is not inclined to-day, will be averse to-morrow;' the longer it is put off, the more difficult it will be to bring ourselves to it. Death may not only prevent the payment, but fetch thee to judgment, under the guilt of a broken vow, Ps. lxxvi. 11.

Two reasons are here given why we must speedily and cheerfully pay our vows: 1st. Because otherwise we affront God. We play the fool with him, as if we designed to put a trick upon him; and "God has no pleasure in fools." More is implied than is expressed; the meaning is, he greatly abhors such fools, and such foolish dealings. Hath he need of fools? No, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked," but will surely and severely reckon with those that thus play fast and loose with him. 2nd. Because otherwise we wrong ourselves. We lose the benefit of the making of the vow; nay, we incur the penalty for the breach of it; so that it had been better a great deal not to have vowed, more safe, and more to our advantage, than to vow and not to pay. Not to have vowed had been but an omission; but to vow and not pay incurs the guilt of treachery and perjury; it is lying to God, Acts v. 4.

Secondly. To be cautious in making our vows. And this is necessary in order to our being conscientious in performing them, ver. 6. 1. We must take heed that we never vow any thing that is sinful, or may be an occasion of sin; for such a vow is ill made, and must be broken. "Suffer not thy mouth," by such a vow, "to cause thy flesh to sin," as Herod's rash promise caused him to cut off the head of John the Baptist. 2. We must not vow that which through the frailty of the flesh we have reason to fear we shall not be able to perform; as those that vow a single life, and yet know not how to keep their vow. Hereby, 1st. They shame themselves; for they are forced to say "before the angel, that it was an error;" that either they did not mean or did not consider what they said; and take it which way we will it is bad enough. When thou hast made a vow, do not seek to evade it, nor find out excuses to get clear of the obligation of it. "Say not before the priest," who is called the angel or messenger of the Lord of hosts, that upon second thoughts thou hast changed thy mind, and desirest to be absolved from the obligation of thy vow; but stick to it, and do not seek a hole to creep out at. Some by the angel here understand the guardian angel, which they suppose to attend every man, and to inspect what he doth. Others understand it of Christ, the angel of the covenant, who is present with his people in their assemblies, who searcheth the heart, and cannot be imposed upon; "Provoke him not, for God's name is in him," and he is represented as strict and jealous, Ex. xxiii. 20, 21. 2nd. They expose themselves to the wrath of God, for he is angry at the voice of those that thus "lie unto him with their mouth, and flatter him with their tongue," and is displeased at their dissimulation, and "destroys the works of their hands," that is, blasts their enterprises, and defeats those purposes which, when they made these vows, they were seeking to God for the success of. If we treacherously cancel the words of our mouth, and revoke our vows, God will justly overthrow our projects, and walk contrary and at all adventures with those that thus walk contrary and at all adventures with him. It is "a snare to a man, after vows, to make inquiry."

Thirdly. To keep up the fear of God, ver. 7. Many of old pretended to have known the mind of God by dreams, and were so full of them that they almost made God's people forget his name by their dreams, Jer. xxiii. 25, 26. And many perplex themselves with their frightful or odd dreams, or with other people's dreams, as if they foreboded this or the other disaster; and those that heed dreams shall have a multitude of them to fill their heads with. But in them all "there are divers vanities," and the more if we regard them, as there are in many words. They are but like the idle impertinent chat of children and fools, and therefore never heed them. Forget them instead of repeating them; lay no stress upon them, draw no disquieting conclusions from them, but fear thou God; have an eye to his sovereign dominion, set him before thee, keep thyself in his love, and be afraid of offending him; and then thou wilt not disturb thyself with foolish dreams. The way not to be dismayed at the signs of heaven, nor afraid of the idols of the heathen, is to fear God as king of nations, Jer. x. 2, 5, 7.

Fourthly. With that to keep down the fear of man, ver. 8. Set God before thee, and then, "if thou seest the oppression of the poor," thou wilt not "marvel at the matter," nor find fault with the Divine providence, nor think the worse of the institution of magistracy, when thou seest the ends of it thus perverted; nor of religion, when thou seest it will not secure men from suffering wrong. Observe here,

1. A melancholy sight on earth, and such as cannot but trouble every good man that has a sense of justice, and a concern for mankind; to "see the oppression of the poor," because they are poor and cannot right themselves, and the "violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province," oppression under colour of law, and backed with power. The kingdom in general may have a good government, and yet it may so happen that a particular province may be committed to an ill man, by whose maladministration justice may be perverted. So hard is it for the wisest of kings, in giving preferments, to be sure of their men; they cannot but redress the grievance when it doth appear.

2. A comfortable sight in heaven. When things look thus dismal, we may satisfy ourselves with this, 1st. That though oppressors be high God is above them, and in that very thing wherein they deal proudly, Ex. xviii. 11. God is higher than the highest of creatures, than the highest of princes, than the king that is higher than Agag, Num. xxiv. 7; than the highest angels, the thrones and dominions of the upper world. God is the most high over all the earth, and his glory is above the heavens. Before him princes are worms, the brightest but glowworms. 2nd. That though oppressors be secure God has his eye upon them, takes notice of, and will reckon for, all their violent perverting of judgment. He regardeth, not only sees it, but observes it, and keeps it on record, to be called over again; "his eyes are upon their ways:" see Job xxiv. 23. 3rd. That there is a world of angels, for "there are higher than they," and are employed by the Divine justice for the protecting of the injured, and the punishing of the injurious. Sennacherib bore himself high upon his potent army, but one angel proved too hard for him and all his forces. Some, by those that "are higher than they," understand the great council of the nation, the presidents to whom the princes of the provinces are accountable, Dan. vi. 2, the senate that receive complaints against the proconsuls, the courts above to which appeals are made from the inferior courts, which are necessary to the good government of a kingdom. Let it be a check to oppressors, that perhaps their superiors on earth may call them to an account; however, God, the supreme in heaven, will.

9 Moreover the profit of the earth is for all:
The king himself is served by the field.
10 He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver;
Nor he that loveth abundance with increase:
This is also vanity.
11 When goods increase,
They are increased that eat them:
And what good is there to the owners thereof,
Saving the beholding of them with their eyes?
12 The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much:
But the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep
13 There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, Namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt.
14 But those riches perish by evil travail:
And he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand
15 As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked Shall he return to go as he came,
And shall take nothing of his labour,
Which he may carry away in his hand.
16 And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came, so shall he go:
And what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind?
17 All his days also he eateth in darkness,
And he hath much sorrow and wrath with his sickness.

Solomon had shewed the vanity of pleasure, and gaiety, and fine works, of honour, and power, and royal dignity; and there is many a covetous worldling that will agree with him, and speak as slightly as he doth of these things. But money, he thinks, is a substantial thing, and if he can but have enough of that he is happy; and that is the mistake which Solomon attacks and attempts to rectify in these verses, and shews that there is as much vanity in great

iv. 5. The words "eateth his own flesh" are by some understood of devouring his property and stock; others explain them of living at the expense of his kindred; others of envy; and some understand them to mean that although he does not work, yet he eats. (Compare 2 Thess. iii. 10.)

iv. 8—12. Whatever uncertainty attaches to some portions of the imagery here, it is certain that the advantages of union, combination, and co-operation are especially before the writer's mind.

v. 6. The first words are diversely understood, but we prefer one or other of these explanations: "Let not thy tongue lead thee into sin;" or, "Let not thy tongue lead thy kindred into sin, by bad example or by bad precepts." With regard to "the angel," many suggestions have been made. The Greek has the word "God," in which it is followed by the Arabic and Syriac. The Chaldee refers it to the angel who shall have power over the sinner in the future judgment. The Latin is, "nor say before the angel, There is no riches and the lust of the eye about them, as there is in the lusts of the flesh and the pride of life, and a man can make himself no more happy by hoarding an estate than by spending it.

First. He grants that the products of the earth for the support and comfort of human life are valuable things; ver. 9, "The profit of the earth is for all," man's body being made of the earth, thence has its maintenance, Job xxviii. 5. And that he hath so, and that a barren land is not made his dwelling, as he has deserved for being rebellious, Ps. lxviii. 6, is an instance of God's great bounty to him. There is profit to be got out of the earth, and it is for all, all need it; it is appointed for all, there is enough for all. It is not only for all men, but for all the inferior creatures; the same ground brings grass for the cattle that brings herbs for the service of man. Israel had bread from heaven, angels' food, but (which is an humbling consideration) the earth is our store-house, and the beasts fellow-commoners with us. "The king himself is served of the field," and would be ill-served, would be quite starved, without the products of it. This puts a great honour upon the husbandman's calling, that it is the most necessary of all other to the support of man's life; the many have the benefit of it, the mighty cannot live without it; it is for all, it is for the king himself. Those that have an abundance of the fruits of the earth must remember they are for all, and therefore must look upon themselves but as stewards of their abundance, out of which they must give to those that need. Dainty meats and soft clothing are only for some, but the fruit of the earth is for all. And even those that suck the abundance of the seas, Deu. xxxiii. 19, cannot be without the fruit of the earth, while those that have a competency of the fruit of the earth may despise the abundance of the seas.

Secondly. He maintains that the riches that are more than these, that are for hoarding, not for use, are vain things, and will not make a man easy or happy. That which our Saviour hath said, Lu. xii. 15, that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth," is what Solomon here undertakes to prove by divers arguments.

1. The more men have the more they would have, ver. 10. A man may have but a little silver and be satisfied with it, may know when he has enough, and covet no more; "Godliness with contentment is great gain;" "I have enough," saith Jacob; "I have all and abound," saith St. Paul. But, 1st. He that loves silver and sets his heart upon it, will never think he has enough, but "enlargeth his desire as hell," Hab. ii. 5; "lays house to house, and field to field," Isa. v. 8; and, like "the daughters of the horse-leech, still cries, Give, give." Natural desires are at rest when that which was desired is obtained, but corrupt desires are insatiable. Nature is content with little, grace with less, but lust with nothing. 2nd. He that hath silver in abundance, and has it increasing never so fast upon him, yet doth not find that it yields any solid satisfaction to his soul. There are bodily desires which silver itself will not satisfy; if a man be hungry, ingots of silver will do no more to satisfy his hunger than clods of clay; much less will it satisfy spiritual desires. He that has never so much silver covets something more, not only of that, but something else, something of another nature. They that make themselves drudges to the world are spending their labour for that which satisfies not, Isa. lv. 2; which fills the belly, but will never fill the soul, Eze. vii. 19.

2. The more men have, the more occasion they have for it, and the more they have to do with it; so that it is as broad as long. "When goods increase they are increased that eat them," ver. 11; the more meat the more mouths. Doth the estate thrive? and doth not the family at the same time grow more numerous, and the children grow up to need more? The more men have, the better house they must keep, the more servants they must employ, the more guests they must entertain, the more they must give to the poor, and the more they will have hanging on them, for where the carcass is the eagles will be. What we have more than food and raiment we have it for others; and then what good is there to the owners themselves, but the pleasure of beholding it with their eyes? and a poor pleasure it is. An empty speculation is all the difference between the owners and the sharers. The owner sees that as his own which those about him enjoy as much of the real benefit of as he; only he has the satisfaction of doing good to others, which indeed is a satisfaction to one who believes what Christ said, "That it is more blessed to give than to receive;" but to a covetous man, who thinks all lost that goes beside himself, it is a constant vexation to see others eat of his increase.

3. The more men have, the more care they have about it, which perplexeth them and disturbs their repose, ver. 12. Refreshing sleep is as much the support and comfort of this life as food is. Now, 1st. Those commonly sleep best that work hard, and have but what they work for. "The sleep of the labouring man is sweet," not only because he hath tired himself with his labour, which makes his sleep the more welcome to him, and makes him sleep soundly, but because he has little to fill his head with care about, and so break his sleep. His sleep is sweet, though he eat but little, and have but little to eat, for his weariness rocks him asleep, though his belly be not full; and though he eat much yet he can sleep well, for his labour gets him a good digestion. The sleep of the diligent Christian, and his long sleep, is sweet, for having spent himself and his time in the service of God, he can cheerfully return to God, and repose in him as his rest. 2nd. Those that have every thing else many times cannot get a good night's sleep, but either their eyes are held waking, or their sleeps are unquiet, and do not refresh them; and it is their abundance that breaks their sleep and disturbs it; both the abundance of their care, as that rich man's, who, when his ground brought forth plentifully, thought within himself, What shall I do? Lu. xii. 18; and the abundance of what they eat and drink, which overchargeth the heart, makes them sick, and so hinders their repose. Ahasuerus, after a banquet of wine, could not sleep; and perhaps consciousness of guilt, both in getting and using what they have, breaks their sleep as much as any thing; but "God giveth his beloved sleep."

4. The more men have, the more danger they are in, both of doing mischief and of having mischief done them, ver. 13. It is an evil, a sore evil, which Solomon himself had seen under the sun, in this lower world, this theatre of sin and woe, "riches kept for the owners thereof," who have been industrious to keep them safe, "to their hurt;" they had better have been without them. 1st. Their riches do them hurt, make them proud and secure, and in love with the world, draw away their hearts from God and duty, and make it very difficult for them to enter into the kingdom of heaven, nay, help to shut them out of it. 2nd. They do hurt with their riches, which not only put them into a capacity of gratifying their own lusts, and living luxuriously, but give them an opportunity of oppressing others, and dealing hardly with them. 3rd. Many times they sustain hurt by their riches; they would not be envied, would not be robbed, if they were not rich. It is the fat beast that is led first to the slaughter. A very rich man, as one observes, hath sometimes been excepted out of a general pardon, both as to life and estate, for no other reason but his vast and overgrown estate; so riches often take away the life of the owners thereof, Pr. i. 19.

5. The more men have, the more they have to lose, and perhaps they may lose it all, ver. 14. "Those riches" that have been laid up with a great deal of pains, and kept with a great deal of care, "perish by evil travail," by the very pains and care which they take to secure and increase them. Many a one has ruined his estate by being over-solicitous to advance it and to make it more, and hath lost all by catching at all. Riches are perishing things, and all our travail about them cannot make them otherwise: they make themselves wings, and fly away; and he that thought he should have made his son a gentleman leaves him a beggar; he begetteth a son, and brings him up in the prospect of an estate, but when he dies leaves it under a charge of debt as much as it is worth, so that there is nothing in his hand. This is a common case; estates that made a great show do not prove what they seemed, but cheat the heir.

6. How much soever men have when they die, they must leave it all behind them; ver. 15, 16, "As he came forth of his mother's womb naked, so shall he return;" only as his friends, when he came naked into the world, in pity to him, helped him with swaddling-clothes, so, when he goes out, they help him with grave-clothes, and that is all: see Job i. 21; Ps. xlix. 17. This is urged as a reason why we should be content with such things as we have, 1 Tim. vi. 7. In respect of the body we must go as we came, the dust shall return to the earth as it was; but sad is our case if the soul returns as it came, for we were born in sin, and if we die in sin, unsanctified, better we had never been born. And that seems to be the case of the worldling here spoken of, for he is said to return in all points as he came, as sinful, as miserable, and much more so. This is a sore evil; he thinks it so whose heart is glued to this world, that he "shall take nothing of his labour which he may carry away in his hand;" his riches will not go with him into another world, nor stand him in any stead there. If we labour in religion, the grace and comfort we get by that labour we may carry away in our hearts, and shall be the better for to eternity, that is meat that endures. But if we labour only for the world, to fill our hands with that, we cannot take that away with us; we are born with our hands griping, but die with them extended, letting go what we hold fast. So that upon the whole matter he may well ask, "What profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind?" Note, Those that labour for the world labour for the wind; for that which hath more sound than substance, which is uncertain, and always shifting its point, unsatisfying, and often hurtful, which we cannot hold fast, and which, if we take up with as our portion, we do but feed upon wind, Hos. xii. 1. Men will see they have laboured for the wind, when at death they find the profit of their labour is all gone, gone like the wind, they know not whither.

7. Those that have much, if they set their hearts upon it, have not only uncomfortable deaths, but uncomfortable lives too, ver. 17. This covetous worldling, that is so bent upon raising an estate, "all his days he eats in darkness and much sorrow, and it is his sickness and wrath;" that is, he hath not only no pleasure of his estate, nor any enjoyment of it himself, for he eats the bread of sorrow, Ps. cxxvii. 2, but a great deal of vexation to see others eat of it. His necessary expenses make him sick, make him fret; and he seems as if he were angry that himself and those about him cannot live without meat. As we read the last clause, it intimates how ill this covetous worldling can bear the common and unavoidable calamities of human life; when he is in health he eats in darkness, always dull with care and fear about what he has, but if he be sick "he has much sorrow and wrath with his sickness;" he is vexed that his sickness takes him off from his business, and hinders him in his pursuits of the world; vexed that all his wealth will not give him any ease or relief; but especially terrified with the apprehensions of death, which his diseases are the harbingers of; of leaving this world and the things of it behind him, which he hath set his affections upon, and removing to a world he has made no preparation for. He has not any sorrow after a godly sort, doth not sorrow to repentance, but he hath sorrow and wrath, is angry at the providence of God, angry at his sickness, angry at all about him, fretful and peevish, which doubles his affliction, which a good man lessens and lightens by patience and joy in his sickness.

18 Behold that what I have seen:
It is good and comely for one to eat and to drink,
And to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun
All the days of his life, which God giveth him:
For it is his portion.
19 Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth,
And hath given him power to eat thereof,
And to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour;
This is the gift of God.
20 For he shall not much remember the days of his life;
Because God answereth him in the joy of his heart.

Solomon, from the vanity of riches hoarded up, here infers that the best course we can take is, to use what we have well, to serve God with it, do good with it, and take the comfort of it to ourselves and our families. This he had pressed before, ch. ii. 24; iii. 22. Observe,

First. What it is that is here recommended to us. Not to indulge the appetites of the flesh, or to take up with present pleasures or profits for our portion, but soberly and moderately to make use of what providence has allotted for our comfortable passage through this world. We must not starve ourselves either for covetousness, because we cannot afford ourselves food convenient, or for eagerness in our worldly pursuits, or through excessive care and grief, but eat and drink what is fit for us to keep our bodies in good plight for the serving of our souls in God's service. We must not kill ourselves with labour, and then leave others to enjoy the good of it, but take the comfort of that which our hands have laboured for, and that not now and then, but "all the days of our life which God gives us." Life is God's gift, and he has appointed us the number of the days of our life, Job xiv. 5. Let us therefore spend those days in serving the Lord our God with joyfulness and gladness of heart. We must not do the business of our calling as a drudgery, and make ourselves slaves to it, but we must rejoice in our labour, not grasp at more business than we can go through without perplexity and disquiet, take a pleasure in the calling wherein God has put us, and go on in the business of it with cheerfulness; this is to rejoice in our labour, whatever it is, as Zebulun in his going out and Issachar in his tents.

Secondly. What is urged to recommend it to us. 1. That it is good and comely to do thus; it is well, and it looks well. They that cheerfully use what God hath given them thereby honour the giver, answer the intention of the gift, act rationally and generously, do good in the world, and make what they have turn to the best account, and this is both their credit and their comfort. It is good and comely, and there is duty and decency in it. 2. That it is all the good we can have out of the things of this world. It is our portion, and in doing thus we take our portion, and make the best of bad. This is our part of providence," perhaps implying that the alleged mistake is on the part of God, and not of the speaker. It may, however, mean that the speaker is desirous of being released from paying his vow, because he made it through want of forethought; this last is, no doubt, the sense of the Hebrew. Some have supposed the angel to be one of the attendant angels which, though invisible, take cognisance of men's acts. But if an excuse for not fulfilling a vow is really meant, that excuse would be made to man, if not to God; and, therefore, we prefer to understand by the word rendered "angel" a human messenger or minister, requiring the payment of a public vow—in other words, the Jewish priest.

v. 7. Another controverted verse. It may mean, "Although amid a great multitude of dreams, and vanities, and words, yet fear God." The Hebrew text is obscure, and has exercised the ingenuity of the critics, whose opinions are very contradictory.

v. 8. This also is a difficult verse. The first clause is literally our worldly possessions. God must have his part, the poor theirs, and our families theirs; but this is ours, it is all that falls to our lot out of them. 3. That a heart to do thus is such a gift of God's grace as crowns all the gifts of his providence. If God hath given a man riches and wealth, he completes the favour, and makes that a blessing indeed, if withal he give him power to eat thereof; that is, wisdom and grace to take the good of it and to do good with it. If this is God's gift, we must covet it earnestly as the best gift relating to our enjoyments in this world. 4. That this is the way to make our own lives easy, and to relieve ourselves against the many toils and troubles which our lives on earth are incident to; ver. 10, "He shall not much remember the days of his life," the days of his sorrow and sore travail, his working days, his weeping days; he shall either forget them or "remember them as waters that pass away;" he shall not much lay to heart his crosses, nor long retain the bitter relish of them, because God "answereth him in the joy of his heart," balanceth all the grievances of his labour with the joy of it, and recompenseth him for it by giving him to "eat the labour of his hands." If he doth not answer all his desires and expectations in the letter of them, yet he answers them with that which is more than equivalent "in the joy of his heart." A cheerful spirit is a great blessing; it makes the yoke of our employments easy, and the burthen of our afflictions light.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter, I. The royal preacher goes on farther to shew the vanity of worldly wealth, when men place their happiness in it, and are eager and inordinate in laying it up. Riches, in the hand of a man that is wise and generous, are good for something, but in the hands of a sordid, sneaking, covetous miser, they are good for nothing. 1. He takes an account of the possessions and enjoyments which such a man may have: He hath wealth, ver. 2; he hath children to inherit it ver. 3; and lives long, ver. 3—6; 2. He describes his folly in not taking the comfort of it, he hath no power to eat of it, lets strangers devour it, is never filled with good, and at last has no burial, ver. 2, 3; 3. He condemns it as an evil, a common evil, vanity and a disease, ver. 1, 2; 4. He prefers the condition of a stillborn child before the condition of such a one, ver. 3; the stillborn child's infelicity is only negative, ver. 4, 5; but that of the covetous worldling is positive, he lives a great while to see himself miserable, ver. 6; 5. He shews the vanity of riches as pertaining only to the body, and giving no satisfaction to the mind, ver. 7, 8; and of those boundless desires with which covetous people vex themselves, ver. 9; which if they be gratified never so fully, leave a man but a man still, ver. 10. II. He concludes this discourse of the vanity of the creature with this plain inference from the whole, that it is folly to think of making up a happiness for ourselves in the things of this world, ver. 11, 12. Our satisfaction must be in another life, not in this.

1 THERE is an evil which I have seen under the sun,
And it is common among men:
2 A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour,
So that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth,
Yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof.
But a stranger eateth it:
This is vanity, and it is an evil disease
3 If a man beget an hundred children,
And live many years,
So that the days of his years be many,
And his soul be not filled with good,
And also that he have no burial;
I say, that an untimely birth is better than he.
4 For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness,
And his name shall be covered with darkness.
5 Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing:
This hath more rest than the other.
6 Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told,
Yet hath he seen no good:
Do not all go to one place?

Solomon has shewed, in the close of the foregoing chapter, how good it is to make a comfortable use of the gifts of God's providence. Now here he shews the evil of the contrary; having, and not using, gathering to lay up, for I know not what contingent emergencies to come, not to lay out on the most urgent occasions present. This is an evil which Solomon himself saw under the sun, ver. 1. A great deal of evil there is under the sun; there is a world above the sun where there is no evil, yet God causeth his sun to shine upon the evil as well as upon the good, which is an aggravation of the evil. God has lighted up a candle for his servants to work by; but they bury their talent, as slothful and unprofitable, and so waste the light, and are unworthy of it. Solomon, as a king, inspected the manners of his subjects, and took notice of this evil as a prejudice to the public, which is damaged, not only by men's prodigality on the one hand, but by their penuriousness on the other. As it is with the blood in the natural body, so it is with the wealth of the body politic, if instead of circulating it stagnates it will be of ill consequence. Solomon, as a preacher, observed the evils that were done, that he might reprove them, and warn people against them. This evil was in his days common; and yet then there was great plenty of silver and gold, which one would think should have made people less fond of riches. The times also were peaceable, nor was there any prospect of trouble, which to some is a temptation to hoard; but no providence will of itself, unless the grace of God work with it, cure the corrupt affection that is in the carnal mind to the world and the things of it; nay, when riches increase, we are most apt of all to set our hearts upon them. Now concerning this miser observe,

First. The abundant reason he hath to serve God with joyfulness and gladness of heart; how well God has done for him.

1. "He hath given him riches, wealth, and honour," ver. 2. Note, 1st. Riches and wealth commonly gain people honour among men. Though it be but an image, if it be a golden image, all people, nations, and languages will fall down and worship it. 2nd. Riches, wealth, and honour are God's gifts, the gifts of his providence, and not given as his rain and sunshine alike to all; but to some, and not to others, as God sees fit. 3rd. Yet they are given to many that do not make a good use of them, to many to whom God doth not give wisdom and grace to take the comfort of them, and serve God with them. The gifts of common providence are bestowed on many to whom are denied the gifts of special grace, without which the gifts of providence often do more hurt than good.

2. "He wants nothing for his soul of all that he desires." Providence has been so liberal to him, that he has as much as heart could wish, and more, Ps. lxxiii. 7. He doth not desire grace for his soul, the better part; all he desires is enough to gratify the sensual appetite, and that he hath; his belly is filled with these hid treasures, Ps. xvii. 14.

3. He is supposed to have a numerous family, to beget a hundred children, which are the stay and strength of his house, and as a quiver full of arrows to him, which are the honour and credit of his house, and in whom he has the prospect of having his name built up, and having all the immortality this world can give him. "They are full of children," Ps. xvii. 14; while many of God's people are written childless, and stripped of all.

4. To complete his happiness he is supposed to live many years, or rather, many days; for our life is to be reckoned rather by days than years, "the days of his years are many;" and so healthful is his constitution, and so slowly doth age creep upon him, that they are likely to be many more. Nay, he supposeth him to "live a thousand years," which no man, that we know of, ever did, nay, "a thousand years twice told;" a small part of which time, one would think, were enough to convince men, by their own experience, of the folly both of those that expect to find all good in worldly wealth, and of those that expect to find any good in it but in using it.

Secondly. The little heart he has to use this which God gives him for the ends and purposes for which it is given him. This is his fault and folly, that he renders not again according to the benefit done unto him, and serves not the Lord God his benefactor with joyfulness and gladness of heart in the abundance of all things. In the day of prosperity he is not joyful. Tristis es, et fœlix?—'Art thou happy, yet sad?' See his folly:

1. He cannot find in his heart to take the comfort of what he has himself. He has meat before him, he has wherewith to maintain himself and his family comfortably; but he has not power to eat thereof. His sordid, niggardly temper will not suffer him to lay it out, no, not upon himself, no, not upon that which is most necessary for himself. He has not power to reason himself out of this absurdity, to conquer his covetous humour. He is weak indeed that has not power to use what God gives him; for God gives him not that power, but withholds it from him to punish him for his other abuses of his wealth; because he has not the will to serve God with it, God denies him the power to serve himself with it.

2. He suffers those to prey upon him that he is under no obligations to: "A stranger eateth it." This is the common fate of misers; they will not trust their own children, perhaps, but retainers and hangers-on, that have the art of wheedling, insinuate themselves into them, and find ways of devouring what they have, or getting it to be left to them by their wills. God orders it so that a stranger eats it: "Strangers devour his strength," Hos. vii. 9; Pr. v. 10. This may be well called "Vanity and an evil disease." What we have we have in vain if we do not use it; and that temper of mind is certainly a most wretched distemper which keeps us from using it. Our worst diseases are those that arise from the corruption of our own hearts.

3. He deprives himself of the good that he might have had of his worldly possessions; not only forfeits it, but robs himself of it, and throws it from him. "His soul is not filled with good," ver. 3. He is still unsatisfied and uneasy. His hands are filled with riches, his barns filled, and his bags filled; but "his soul is not filled with good," no, not with that good, for it is still craving more. Nay, ver. 7, "he has not seen good," he cannot so much as please his eye, for that is still looking farther, and looking with envy on those that have more. He has not even the sensible good of an estate. Though he looks not beyond the things that are seen, yet he looks not with any true pleasure even on them

4. "He has no burial," that is, none agreeable to his rank, no decent burial, but the burial of an ass. Either through the sordidness of his temper he will not allow himself a fashionable burial, but forbids it, or the strangers that have eaten him up leave him so poor at last that he has not wherewithal; or those to whom he leaves what he has have so little esteem for his memory, and are so greedy of what they are to have from him, that they will not be at the charges of burying him handsomely; which his own children, if he had left it to them, would not have grudged him.

Thirdly. The preference which the preacher gives to an untimely birth before him. "An untimely birth," a child that is carried from the womb to the grave, "is better than he." Better is the fruit that drops from the tree before it is ripe than that which is left to hang on till it is rotten. Job, in his passion, thinks the condition of an untimely birth better than his when he was in adversity, Job iii. 16; but Solomon here pronounceth it better than the condition of a worldling in his greatest prosperity, when the world smiles upon him.

1. He grants the condition of an untimely birth upon many accounts to be very sad; ver. 4, 5, "He comes in with vanity;" for, as to this world, he that is born and dies presently, was born in vain; "and he departs in darkness." Little or no notice is taken of him; being an abortive, he has no name, or, if he had, it would soon be forgotten, and buried in oblivion; it would be covered with darkness as the body is with the earth; nay, ver. 5, "He hath not seen the sun," but from the darkness of the womb he is hurried immediately to that of the grave, and, which is worse than not being known to any, "he has not known any thing," and therefore has come short of that which is the greatest pleasure and honour of man. Those that live in wilful ignorance, and know nothing to purpose, are no better than an untimely birth that has not "seen the sun, nor known any thing."

2. Yet he prefers it before that of a covetous miser. "This" untimely birth "hath more rest than the other," for this hath some rest, but the other has none; this has no trouble and disquiet, but the other is in a perpetual toss, and has nothing but trouble, trouble of his own making. The shorter the life is, the longer the rest; and the fewer the days, and the less we have to do with this troublesome world, the less trouble we know.

It is better die a child at four,
Than live, and die so at fourscore.

The reason he gives why this has more rest is, because all go to one place to rest in, and this is sooner at his rest, ver. 6. He that lives a thousand years goes to the same place with the child that doth not live an hour, ch. iii. 20. The grave is the place we shall all meet in. Whatever differences there may be in men's condition in this world, they must all die, are all under the same sentence, and, to outward appearance, their deaths are alike. The grave is to one as well as another a land of silence, of darkness, of separation from the living, and a sleeping-place. It is the common rendezvous of rich and poor, honourable and mean, learned and unlearned; the short-lived and long-lived meet in the grave, only one rides post thither, the other goes in the waggon. The dust of both mingle, and lie undistinguished.

7 All the labour of man is for his mouth,
And yet the appetite is not filled.

"If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and the plundering of judgment and justice in the province, be not confounded at the matter." The next clause may be rendered, "for one who is high above the high observeth; and there are superiors over them." Many, however, think that the latter words, though plural in form, refer to God, and mean, "There is One who is above them all."

v. 9. This verse can be explained to signify that the land is a benefit in all respects, or to every one, so that even the king is subject to the field, or not independent of its produce. Our version suggests that the field is the king's servant, the exact opposite of the view just mentioned. A third suggestion is that a king is over a land which is cultivated. We prefer the common translation.

v. 18. After setting forth the vanity of worldly power and wealth, the sacred writer seems to introduce here certain observations, by way of reminding us that, after all, the blessings of God's providence are not to be refused and despised; they are not everything, but 8 For what hath the wise more than the fool?

What hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the [living?
9 Better is the sight of the eyes
Than the wandering of the desire:
This is also vanity and vexation of spirit.
10 That which hath been is named already,
And it is known that it is man:
Neither may he contend with him
That is mightier than he.

The preacher here farther shews the vanity and folly of heaping up worldly wealth, and expecting happiness in it.

First. How much soever we toil about the world, and get out of it, we can have for ourselves no more but a maintenance; ver. 7, "All the labour of man is for his mouth," which craveth it of him, Pr. xvi. 26. It is but food and raiment, what is more, others have, not we. It is all for the mouth; meats are but for the belly, and the belly for meats, there is nothing for the head and heart, nothing to nourish or enrich the soul. A little will serve to sustain us comfortably, and a great deal can do no more.

Secondly. Those that have never so much yet are still craving. Let a man labour never so much for his mouth, yet the appetite is not filled. 1. Natural desires are still returning, still pressing; a man may be feasted to-day, and yet hungry to-morrow. 2. Worldly, sinful desires are insatiable, ch. v. 10. Wealth to a worldling is like drink to one in a dropsy, which doth but increase the thirst. Some read the whole verse thus, 'Though all a man's labour fall out to his own mind,' (ori ejus obveniat,—'so as to correspond with his views,'—Juv.) just as himself would have it, "yet his desire is not satisfied," still he has a mind of something more. 3. The desires of the soul find nothing in the wealth of the world to give them any satisfaction at all. 'The soul is not filled,' so the word is. When God "gave Israel their request, he sent leanness into their souls," Ps. cvi. 15. He was a fool that, when his barns were full, said, "Soul, take thine ease."

Thirdly. A fool may have as much worldly wealth, and may enjoy as much of the pleasure of it, as a wise man, nay, and perhaps not be so sensible of the vexation of it. "What has the wise more than the fool?" ver. 8. Perhaps he has not so good an estate, so good a trade, nor such good preferment as the fool hath. Nay, suppose them to be equal in their possessions, what can a wise man, a scholar, a wit, a politician, squeeze out of his estate more than supplies for back and belly? and that a half-witted man may do. A fool can fare as well, and relish it, can dress as well, and make as good a figure in any public appearance, as a wise man; so that, if there were not pleasures and honour peculiar to the mind, which "the wise man has more than the fool," as to this world they would be upon a level.

Fourthly. Even a poor man that has business, and is discreet, and diligent, and dexterous in the management of it, may get as comfortably through this world as he that is loaded with an overgrown estate. Consider what the poor hath less than the rich if he do but know to walk before the living, know how to carry himself decently, and do his duty to all, how to get an honest livelihood by his labour, how to spend his time well, and improve his opportunities. What has he? Why, he is better beloved and more respected among his neighbours, and has a better interest than many a rich man that is griping and haughty. What has he? Why, he has as much of the comfort of this life, has food and raiment, and is therewith content, and so is as truly rich as he that hath abundance.

Fifthly. The enjoyment of what we have cannot but be acknowledged more rational than a greedy grasping at more; ver. 9, "Better is the sight of the eyes," making the best of that which is present, "than the wandering of the desire," the uneasy walking of the soul after things at a distance, and the affecting of a variety of imaginary satisfactions. He is much happier that is always content, though he has never so little, than he that is always coveting, though he has never so much. We cannot say, that better is the sight of the eyes than the fixing of the desire upon God, and the resting of the soul in him; it is better to live by faith in things to come, than to live by sense which dwells only upon present things; but better is the sight of the eyes than the roving of the desire after the world, and the things of it, than which nothing more uncertain, nor more unsatisfying at the best. This wandering of the desire is vanity and vexation of spirit. It is vanity at the best; if what is desired be obtained, it proves not what we promised ourselves from it; but commonly the wandering desire is crossed and disappointed, and then it turns to vexation of spirit.

Sixthly. Our lot, whatever it is, is that which is appointed us by the counsel of God, which cannot be altered; and it is therefore our wisdom to reconcile ourselves to it, and cheerfully to acquiesce in it; ver. 10, "That which has been," or as some read it, that which is, and so likewise that which shall be "is named already," that is, it is already determined in the Divine foreknowledge, and all our care and pains cannot make it otherwise than as it is fixed; jacta est alea,—the die is cast;' it is therefore folly to quarrel with that which will be as it is, and wisdom to make a virtue of necessity. We shall have what pleaseth God, and let that please us.

Seventhly. Whatever we attain to in this world, still we are but men, and the greatest possessions and preferments cannot set us above the common accidents of human life. "That which has been," and is, that busy animal that makes such a stir, and such a noise in the world "is named already," he that made him gave him his name, "and it is known that it is man;" that is his name by which he must know himself, and it is an humbling name, Gen. v. 2. He called their name Adam; and all theirs have the same character, 'red earth.' Though a man could make himself master of all the treasures of kings and provinces, yet he is a man still, mean, and mutable, and mortal, and may at any time be involved in the calamities that are common to men. It is good for rich and great men to know and consider that they are but men, Ps. ix. 6; and it is known that they are but men. Let them put what face they will upon it, and, like the king of Tyre, set their heart as the heart of God; yet the Egyptians are men, and not gods, and it is known they are so.

Eighthly. How far soever our desires wander, and how closely soever our endeavours keep pace with them, we cannot strive with the Divine providence, but must submit to the disposals of it whether we will or no. If it is man, he may not "contend with Him that is mightier than he;" it is presumption to arraign God's proceedings, and to charge him with folly or iniquity, nor is it to any purpose to complain of him, for "he is in one mind, and who can turn him?" Elihu pacifies Job with this incontestable principle, that "God is greater than man," Job xxxiii. 12; and, therefore, man may not contend with him, nor resist his judgments when they come with commission. A man cannot with the greatest riches make his part good against the arrests of sickness or death; but must yield to his fate.

11 Seeing there be many things that increase vanity,
What is man the better?
12 For who knoweth what is good for man in this life,
All the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a [shadow?
For who can tell a man
What shall be after him under the sun?

Here, First. Solomon lays down his conclusion which he had undertaken to prove, as that which was fully confirmed by the foregoing discourse; "there be many things that increase vanity." The life of man is vain at best, and there are abundance of accidents that concur to make it more so. Even that which pretends to increase the wealth and pleasure doth but increase the vanity, and make it more vexatious.

Secondly. He draws some inferences from it, which serve farther to evince the truth of it.

1. That a man is never the nearer to true happiness for the abundance that he hath in this world. What is man the better for his wealth and pleasure, his honour and preferment? What remains to man? What residuum has he? What overplus? What real advantage when he comes to balance his accounts? Nothing that will do him any good, or turn to account.

2. That we do not know what to wish for; because that which we promise ourselves most satisfaction in often proves most vexatious to us. "Who knows what is good for a man in this life," where every thing is vanity, and any thing, even that which we most covet, may prove a calamity to us? Thoughtful people are in care to do every thing for the best, if they know it; but as it is an instance of the corruption of our hearts, that we are apt to desire that as good for us which is really hurtful, as children that cry for knives to cut their fingers with, so it is an instance of the vanity of this world, that what by all probable conjectures seems to be for the best often proves otherwise. Such is our short-sightedness concerning the issues and events of things, and such broken reeds are all our creature-confidences. We know not how to advise others for the best, nor how to act ourselves, because that which we apprehend likely to be for our welfare may become a trap.

3. That therefore our life upon earth is what we have no reason to take any great complacency in, or to be confident of the continuance of. It is to be reckoned by days, it is but a vain life, and we spend it as a shadow; so little is there in it substantial, so fleeting, so uncertain, so transitory is it, and so little in it to be fond of, or to be depended on. If all the comforts of life be vanity, life itself can have no great reality in it to constitute a happiness for us.

4. That our expectations from this world are as uncertain and deceitful as our enjoyments are. Since every thing is vanity, "who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?" He can no more please himself with the hopes of what shall be after him to his children and family, than with the relish of what is with him, since he can neither foresee himself, nor can any one else foretell to him what shall be after him, nor shall he have any intelligence sent him of it when he is gone; "his sons come to honour, and he knows it not." So that, look which way we will, "Vanity of vanity, all is vanity.

CHAPTER VII.

Solomon had given many proofs and instances of the vanity of this world, and the things of it; now, in this chapter, I. He recommends to us some good means proper to be used for the redress of these grievances, and the arming of ourselves against the mischief we are in danger of from them, that we may make the best of bad: as, 1. Care of our reputation, ver. 1; 2. Seriousness, ver. 2—6; 3. Calmness of spirit, ver. 7—10; 4. Prudence in the management of all our affairs, ver. 11, 12; 5. Submission to the will of God in all events, accommodating ourselves to every condition, ver. 13—15; 6. A conscientious avoiding of all dangerous extremes, ver. 16—18; 7. Mildness and tenderness towards those that have been injurious to us, ver. 19—22. In short, the best way to save ourselves from the vexation which the vanity of the world creates us, is to keep our temper, and to maintain a strict government of our passions. II. He laments his own iniquity, as that which was more vexatious than any of these vanities, that mystery of iniquity, the having of many wives, by which he was drawn away from God and his duty, ver. 23—29.

A GOOD name is better than precious ointment;
And the day of death than the day of one's birth.
2 It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting:
For that is the end of all men;
And the living will lay it to his heart.
3 Sorrow is better than laughter: [better
For by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made 4 The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning;
But the heart of fools is in the house of mirth.
5 It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise,
Than for a man to hear the song of fools.
6 For as the crackling of thorns under a pot,
So is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity

In these verses Solomon lays down some great truths, which seem paradoxes to the unthinking part, that is, the far greatest part of mankind.

First. That the honour of virtue is really more valuable and desirable than all the wealth and pleasure in this world; ver. 1, "A good name is before good ointment," so it may be read; that is, it is preferable to it, and will be rather chosen by all that are wise. Good ointment is here put, both for all the profits of the earth, among the products of which oil was reckoned one of the most valuable, and for all the delights of sense; for ointment and perfume rejoice the heart, and it is called the oil of gladness; nay, and for the highest titles of honour with which men are dignified, for kings are anointed. A good name is better than all riches, Pr. xxii. 1; that is, a name for wisdom and goodness with those that are wise and good; the memory of the just. This is a good that will bring a more grateful pleasure to the mind, will give a man a larger opportunity of usefulness, and will go farther and last longer than the most precious box of ointment; for Christ paid Mary for her ointment with a good name, a name in the Gospels, Mat. xxvi. 13, and we are sure he always pays with advantage.

rightly used they are a good. Some, however, view these closing verses as a return to the desponding tone of chapter ii. 24, &c., in which case verse 20 must be differently explained: "Let him remember that the days of his life are not many wherein God grants him enjoyment of heart." An intelligible literal rendering of these words seems almost impossible.

vi. 1. For "it is common among men" the Hebrew has "it is great upon man," i.e., it is heavy or grievous.

vi. 2, 3. For "wanteth" translate "lacketh." For "an evil disease" translate "a sore evil." The words rendered "and also that he have no burial" rather seem to mean "even if the grave did not await him," as Ginsburg maintains.

vi. 6. The words "yet hath he seen no good" scarcely represent the force of the original: "And should he live a thousand years twice told, and not see good, do not all go to one place?" i.e., must he not die after all, however long his life?

Secondly. That, all things considered, our going out of the world is a greater kindness to us than our coming into the world was. The day of death is preferable to the birthday. Though, as to others, there was joy when a child was born into the world, and where there is death there is lamentation, yet, as to ourselves, if we have lived so as to merit a good name, the day of our death, which will put a period to our cares, and toils, and sorrows, and remove us to rest, and joy, and eternal satisfaction, is better than the day of our birth, which ushered us into a world of so much sin and trouble, vanity and vexation. We were born to uncertainty; but a good man doth not die at uncertainty. The day of our birth clogged our souls with the burthen of the flesh; but the day of our death will set them at liberty from that burthen.

Thirdly. That it will do us more good to go to a funeral than to go to a festival; ver. 2, "It is better to go to the house of mourning," and there weep with them that weep, "than to go to the house of feasting," to a wedding suppose, or a wake, there to "rejoice with them that do rejoice;" it will do us more good, and make better impressions upon us. We may lawfully go to both as there is occasion. Our Saviour both feasted at the wedding of his friend in Cana and wept at the grave of his friend in Bethany; and we may possibly both glorify God, and do good and get good in the house of feasting, but, considering how apt we are to be vain and frothy, proud and secure, and indulgent of the flesh, it is better for us to go to the house of mourning; not to see the pomp of the funeral, but to share in the sorrow of it, and to learn good lessons, both from the dead that is there going to his long home and the mourners that go about the streets.

The uses to be gathered from the house of mourning are, 1. By way of information; "that is the end of all men." It is the end of man as to this world, a final period to their state here; "he shall return no more to his house." It is the end of all men; all have sinned, and therefore death passeth upon all; we must thus be left by our friends as the mourners are, and thus leave as the dead doth. What is others' lot will be ours; the cup is going round; it will come to our turn to pledge it shortly. 2. By way of admonition; "the living will lay it to his heart." Will they? It were well if they would. They that are spiritually alive will lay it to heart; and as for all the survivors, one would think they should. It is their own fault if they do not; for nothing more easy and natural, than by the death of others to be put in mind of our own. Some perhaps will lay that to heart, and consider their latter end, who would not lay a good sermon to heart.

For the farther proof of this, ver. 4, he makes it the character, 1st. Of a wise man, that his heart is in the house of mourning; he is much conversant with mournful subjects, and it is both an evidence and a furtherance of his wisdom. The house of mourning is the wise man's school, where he hath learned many a good lesson; and there where he is serious he is in his element. When he is in the house of mourning his heart is there to improve the spectacles of mortality that are presented to him; nay, when he is in the house of feasting his heart is in the house of mourning, by way of sympathy with those that are in sorrow. 2. It is the character of a fool that his heart is in the house of mirth; his heart is all upon it to be merry and jovial, his whole delight is in sport and gaiety, in merry stories, and merry songs, and merry company, merry days, and merry nights. If he be at any time in the house of mourning, he is under a restraint, his heart at the same time is in the house of mirth, and it is his folly, and helps to make him more and more foolish.

Fourthly. That gravity and seriousness better become us, and are better for us, than mirth and jollity, ver. 3. The common proverb saith, that an ounce of mirth is worth a pound of sorrow; but the preacher teacheth us a contrary lesson, that "sorrow is better than laughter," more agreeable to our present state, where we are daily sinning and suffering ourselves more or less, and daily seeing the sins and sufferings of others. While we are in a vale of tears it is fit we should conform to the temper of the climate. It is also more for our advantage; for by the sadness that appears in the countenance the heart is often made better. Note, 1. That is best for us that is best for our souls, by which the heart is made better, though it be unpleasing to sense. 2. Sadness is often a happy means of seriousness, and that affliction which is impairing to the health, estate, and family, may be improving to the mind, and make such impressions upon that as may alter its temper very much for the better, may make it humble and meek, loose from the world, penitent for sin, and careful of duty. Vexatio dat intellectum,—'Vexation sharpens the intellect.' Periissem nisi periissem,—'I should have perished if I had not been made wretched.' 3. It will follow, on the contrary, that by the mirth and frolicsomeness of the countenance the heart is made worse, more vain, and carnal, and sensual, and secure; more in love with the world, and more estranged from God and spiritual things, Job xxi. 12, 14, and utterly unconcerned in the afflictions of Joseph, as those, Am. vi. 5, 6, and the king and Haman, Est. iii. 15.

Fifthly. That it is much better for us to have our corruptions mortified by the rebuke of the wise than to have them gratified by the song of fools, ver. 5. Many that would be very well pleased to hear the information of the wise, and much more to have their commendations and consolations, yet do not care for hearing their rebukes, that is, care not for being told of their faults, though never so wisely; but therein they are no friends to themselves, for "reproofs of instruction are the way of life," Pr. vi. 23. And though they be not so tooth some as the song of fools, they are more wholesome. To hear not only with patience but pleasure the rebuke of the wise, is a sign and means of wisdom; but to be fond of the song of fools is a sign the mind is vain, and the way to make it more so. And what an absurd thing is it for a man to doat so much upon such a transient pleasure as the laughter of a fool is, which may fitly be compared to the burning of thorns under a pot, which makes a great noise and a great blaze for a little while, but is gone presently, scatters its ashes, and contributes next to nothing to the making of the pot boil, for that requires a constant fire. The laughter of a fool is noisy and flashy, and is not an instance of true joy. "This is also vanity," it deceives men to their destruction, for "the end of that mirth is heaviness." Our blessed Saviour hath read us our doom, "Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh; woe to you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep," Lu. vi. 21, 25.

7 Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad;
And a gift destroyeth the heart.
8 Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof:
And the patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit.
9 Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry:
For anger resteth in the bosom of fools.
10 Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these?
For thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this.

Solomon had often complained before of the oppressions which he saw under the sun, which gave occasion for many melancholy speculations, and were a great discouragement to virtue and piety. Now here,

First. He grants the temptation to be strong; ver. 7, "Surely," it is often too true, that "oppression makes a wise man mad." If a wise man be much and long oppressed, he is very apt to speak and act unlike himself, to lay the reins in the neck of his passions, and break out in indecent complaints against God and man, or to make use of unlawful, dishonourable means of relieving himself. The righteous, when the rod of the wicked rests long on their lot, are in danger of "putting forth their hands to iniquity," Ps. cxxv. 3. When even wise men have unreasonable hardships put upon them, they have much ado to keep their temper and to keep their place. 'It destroys the heart of a gift,' so the latter clause may be read; that is, even the generous heart that is ready to give gifts and a gracious heart that is endowed with many excellent gifts, is destroyed by being oppressed. We should, therefore, make great allowances to those that are abused and ill-dealt with, and not be severe in our censures of them, though they do not act so discreetly as they should; we know not what we should do if it were our own case.

Secondly. He argues against it. Let us not fret at the power and success of oppressors, nor be envious at them; for, 1. The character of oppressors is very bad; so some understand ver. 7. If he that had the reputation of a wise man becomes an oppressor, he becomes a madman, his reason is departed from him, he is no better than a roaring lion and a ranging bear; and the gifts, the bribes he takes, the gains he seems to reap by his oppressions, do but destroy his heart, and quite extinguish the poor remains of sense and virtue in him; and therefore he is rather to be pitied than envied. Let him alone, and he will act so foolishly and drive so furiously, that in a little time he will ruin himself. 2. The issue at length will be good. "Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof." By faith see what the end will be, and with patience expect it. When proud men begin to oppress their poor honest neighbours, they think their power will bear them out in it, doubt not but to carry the day and gain the point; but it will prove better in the end than it seemed in the beginning; their power will be broken, their wealth gotten by oppression will be wasted and gone, they will be humbled and brought down, and reckoned with for their injustice, and oppressed innocency will be both relieved and recompensed. Better was the end of Moses' treaty with Pharaoh, that proud oppressor, when Israel was brought forth with triumph, than the beginning of it, when the tale of bricks was doubled, and every thing looked discouraging.

Thirdly. He arms us against it with some necessary directions. If we would not be driven mad by oppression, but preserve the possession of our own souls,

1. We must be clothed with humility: for the proud in spirit are they that cannot bear to be trampled upon, but grow outrageous, and fret themselves when they are hardly bestead. That will break a proud man's heart which will not break an humble man's sleep. Mortify pride, therefore, and a lowly spirit will easily be reconciled to a low condition.

2. We must put on patience—bearing patience to submit to the will of God in the affliction, and waiting patience to expect the issue in God's due time. The patient in spirit are here opposed to the proud in spirit; for where there is humility there will be patience: those will be thankful for any thing who own they deserve nothing at God's hand. And the patient are said to be better than the proud, they are more easy to themselves, more acceptable to others, and more likely to see a good issue of their troubles.

3. We must govern our passion with wisdom and grace; ver. 9, "Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry." Those that are hasty in their expectations, and cannot brook delays, are apt to be angry if they be not gratified presently. Be not angry at proud oppressors, or any that are the instruments of your trouble. 1st. Be not soon angry; not quick in apprehending an affront and resenting it, nor forward to express your resentments of it. 2nd. Be not long angry; for though anger may come into the bosom of a wise man, and pass through it, as a wayfaring man, it rests only in the bosom of fools. There it resides, there it remains, there it has the innermost and uppermost place, there it is hugged, as that which is dear and laid in the bosom, and loathly parted with. He, therefore, that would approve himself so wise as not to give place to the devil must not let the sun go down upon his wrath, Eph. iv. 26, 27.

4. We must make the best of that which is, ver. 10. Take it not for granted, that "the former days were better than these," nor inquire "what is the cause" that they were so, for therein "thou dost not inquire wisely;" since thou inquirest into the reason of the thing before thou art sure that the thing itself is true; and besides, thou art so much a stranger to the times past, and such an incompetent judge even of the present times, that thou canst not expect a satisfactory answer to the inquiry, and therefore "thou dost not inquire wisely;" nay, the supposition is a foolish reflection upon the providence of God in the government of the world. Note, 1st. It is folly to cry out of the badness of our own times when we have more reason to cry out of the badness of our own hearts, (if men's hearts were better the times would mend,) and when we have more reason to be thankful that they are not worse, but that even in the worst of times we enjoy many mercies, which help to make them not only tolerable but comfortable. 2nd. It is folly to cry up the goodness of former times, so as to derogate from the mercy of God to us in our own times; as if former ages had not the same things to complain of that we have; or if, perhaps, in some respects they had not, yet, as if God had been unjust and unkind to us in casting our lot in an iron age, compared with the golden ages that went before us, which arises from nothing but fretfulness and discontent, and an aptness to pick quarrels with God himself. We are not to think there is any universal decay in nature, or degeneracy in morals. God has been always good, and men always bad; and if in some respects the times are now worse than they have been, perhaps in other respects they are better.

11 Wisdom is good with an inheritance:
And by it there is profit to them that see the sun
12 For wisdom is a defence, and money is a defence:
But the excellency of knowledge is,
That wisdom giveth life to them that have it.
13 Consider the work of God: [crooked?
For who can make that straight, which he hath made 14 In the day of prosperity be joyful,
But in the day of adversity consider:
God also hath set the one over against the other,
To the end that man should find nothing after him.
15 All things have I seen in the days of my vanity:
There is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness,

vi. 7. "All the labour of the man is for his mouth, and yet the soul is not filled," i.e., satisfied.

vi. 8. The sense may be, "For what advantage has the wise man over the fool, or what advantage has a prudent man over a poor man?" Expositors vary greatly in their explanations.

vii. 3. For "sorrow" the margin wrongly has "anger."

vii. 8. For "thing" the Hebrew has "word," which is to be retained, unless we substitute the wider term, "speech."

vii. 11. The marginal rendering is better: "Wisdom is as good as an inheritance." The second clause may mean, "and better to them that see the sun;" i.e., wisdom is as good as wealth, and better, for living men.

vii. 12. He who is protected by wisdom is protected by wealth, and wisdom is the best kind of wealth, because it gives life to its owners.

vii. 14. In happy times be happy, and in bad times consider

And there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedness

16 Be not righteous over much:
Neither make thyself over wise;
Why shouldest thou destroy thyself?

17 Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish:
Why shouldest thou die before thy time?

18 It is good that thou shouldest take hold of this;
Yea, also from this withdraw not thine hand:
For he that feareth God shall come forth of them all.

19 Wisdom strengtheneth the wise
More than ten mighty men which are in the city

20 For there is not a just man upon earth,
That doeth good, and sinneth not.

21 Also take no heed unto all words that are spoken;
Lest thou hear thy servant curse thee:

22 For oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth
That thou thyself likewise hast cursed others.

Solomon in these verses recommends wisdom to us as the best antidote against those distempers of mind which we are liable to, by reason of the vanity and vexation of spirit that there is in the things of this world. Here are some both of the praises and the precepts of wisdom.

First. The praises of wisdom. Many things are here said in its commendation, to engage us to get and retain wisdom.

1. Wisdom is necessary to the right managing and improving of our worldly possessions. "Wisdom is good with an inheritance," that is, an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. If a man have a great estate, if it come easily to him, by descent from his ancestors, if he have not wisdom to use it for the end for which he has it, he had better have been without it. Wisdom is not only good for the poor, to make them content and easy; but it is good for the rich too, good with riches to keep a man from getting hurt by them, and to enable a man to do good with them. Wisdom is good of itself, and makes a man useful; but if he have a good estate with it, that will put him into a greater capacity of being useful, and with his wealth he may be more serviceable to his generation than he could have been without it, and make friends to himself, Lu. xvi. 9. 'Wisdom is as good as an inheritance; yea, better too,' so the margin reads it. It is more our own, more our honour; will make us greater blessings, will remain longer with us, and turn to a better account.

2. It is of great advantage to us throughout the whole course of our passage through this world. "By it there is" real "profit to them that see the sun," both to those that have it and to their contemporaries. It is pleasant to see the sun, ch. xi. 7, but that pleasure is not comparable to the pleasure of wisdom. The light of this world is an advantage to us in doing the business of this world, Job xi. 9; but to them that have that advantage, unless withal they have wisdom wherewith to manage their business, that advantage is worth little to them. The clearness of the eye of the understanding is of greater use to us than bodily eyesight.

3. It contributes much to our safety, and is a shelter to us from the storms of trouble, and its scorching heat. It is a shadow, so the word is, "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." "Wisdom is a defence, and money," that is, as money "is a defence." As a rich man makes his wealth, so a wise man makes his wisdom, a strong city. 'In the shadow of wisdom,' (so the words run,) 'and in the shadow of money, there is safety.' He puts wisdom and money together, to confirm what he had said before, that wisdom is good with an inheritance. Wisdom is as a wall, and money may serve as a thorn hedge, which protects the field.

4. It is joy and true happiness to a man. This is "the excellency of knowledge," Divine knowledge, not only above money, but above wisdom too, human wisdom, the wisdom of this world, that it "gives life to them that have it." The fear of the Lord that is wisdom, and that is life, it prolongeth life. Men's wealth exposeth their lives, but their wisdom protects them. Nay, whereas wealth will not lengthen out the natural life, true wisdom will give spiritual life, the earnest of eternal life, so much better is it to get wisdom than gold.

5. It will put strength into a man, and be his stay and support; ver. 19, "Wisdom strengtheneth the wise," strengthens their spirits, and makes them bold and resolute, by keeping them always on sure grounds; it strengthens their interest, and gains them friends and reputation; it strengthens them for their services under their sufferings, and against the attacks that are made upon them, "more than ten mighty men," great commanders, strengthen "the city." They that are truly wise and good are taken under God's protection, and there are safer than if ten of the mightiest men in the city, men of the greatest power and interest, should undertake to secure them, and become their patrons.

Secondly. Some of the precepts of wisdom, that wisdom which will be of so much advantage to us.

1. We must have an eye to God and to his hand in every thing that befalls us; ver. 13, "Consider the work of God." To silence our complaints concerning cross events, let us consider the hand of God in them, and not open our mouths against that which is his doing. Look upon the disposal of our condition, and all the circumstances of it, as the work of God; and consider it as the product of his eternal counsel, which is fulfilled in every thing that befalls us. Consider that every work of God is wise, and just, and good, and there is an admirable beauty and harmony in his works, and all will appear at last to have been for the best. Let us therefore give him the glory of all his works concerning us, and study to answer his designs in them. Consider the work of God as that which we cannot make any alteration of. "Who can make that straight which he hath made crooked?" Who can change the nature of things from what is settled by the God of nature? If he speak trouble, who can make peace? And if he hedge up the way with thorns, who can get forward? If desolating judgments go forth with commission, who can put a stop to them? Since therefore we cannot mend God's work, we ought to make the best of it.

2. We must accommodate ourselves to the various dispensations of providence that are concerning us, and do the work and duty of the day, in its day, ver. 14. Observe,

1st. How the appointments and events of providence are counterchanged. In this world at the same time, some are in prosperity, others are in adversity; the same persons at one time are in great prosperity, at another time in great adversity; nay, one event prosperous, and another grievous, may occur to the same person at the same time; both come from the hand of God, "out of his mouth both evil and good proceed," Isa. xlv. 7, and "he hath set the one over against the other," so that there is a very short and easy passage between them, and they are a foil to each other. Day and night, summer and winter, are set the one over against the other, that in prosperity we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and in adversity may weep as though we wept not; for we may plainly see the one from the other, and quickly exchange the one for the other; and it is "to the end that man may find nothing after him," that is, that he may not be at any certainty concerning future events, or the continuance of the present scene, but may live in a dependence upon providence, and be ready for whatever happens. Or, that man may find nothing in the work of God which he can pretend to amend.

2nd. How we must comply with the will of God in events of both kinds. Our religion in general must be the same in all conditions, but the particular instances and exercises of it must vary, as our outward condition doth, that we may walk after the Lord. First. In a day of prosperity (and it is but a day) we must be joyful, be in good, be doing good, and getting good; maintain a holy cheerfulness, and "serve the Lord with gladness of heart, in the abundance of all things." When the world smiles, rejoice in God, and praise him, and let the joy of the Lord be thy strength. Secondly. In a day of adversity (and that is but a day too) consider. Times of affliction are proper times for consideration. Then God calls us to consider, Hag. i. 5; then, if ever, we are disposed to it, and no good will be gotten by the affliction without it. We cannot answer God's end in afflicting us, unless we consider why and wherefore he contends with us. And consideration is necessary also to our comfort and support under our afflictions.

3. We must not be offended at the greatest prosperity of wicked people, nor at the saddest calamities that may befall the godly in this life, ver. 15. Wisdom will teach us how to construe those dark chapters of providence, so as to reconcile them with the wisdom, and holiness, and goodness, and faithfulness of God. We must not think it strange. Solomon tells us there were instances of this kind in his time; "All things have I seen in the days of my vanity." I have taken notice of all that passed, and this has been as surprising and perplexing to me as any thing. Observe, Though Solomon was so wise and great a man, yet he calls the days of his life the days of his vanity; for the best days on earth are so, in comparison with the days of eternity. Or perhaps he refers to the days of his apostacy from God, (those were indeed the days of his vanity,) and reflects upon this as one thing that tempted him to infidelity, or at least to indifferency in religion, that he saw "just men perish in their righteousness;" that the greatest piety would not secure men from the greatest afflictions by the hand of God; nay, and sometimes did expose men to the greatest injuries from the hand of wicked and unreasonable men. Naboth perished in his righteousness, and Abel long before. He had also seen "wicked men prolonging their lives in their wickedness;" they "live, become old, yea, are mighty in power," Job xxi. 7; nay, and by their fraud and violence they screen themselves from the sword of justice. Now in this, "consider the work of God," and let it not be a stumblingblock to thee. The calamities of the righteous are preparing them for their future blessedness; and the wicked, while their days are prolonged, are but ripening for ruin. There is a judgment to come, which will rectify this seeming irregularity, to the glory of God, and the full satisfaction of all his people, and we must wait with patience till then.

4. Wisdom will be of use both for caution to saints in their way and for a check to sinners in their way.

1st. As to saints, it will engage them to proceed and persevere in their righteousness, and yet will be an admonition to them to take heed of running into extremes. A just man may perish in his righteousness, but let him not by his own imprudence and rash zeal, pull trouble upon his own head, and then reflect upon Providence as dealing hardly with him; ver. 16, "Be not righteous over much." In the acts of righteousness govern thyself by the rules of prudence, and be not transported, no, not by a zeal for God, into any intemperate heats or passions, or any practices unbecoming thy character, or dangerous to thine interests. Note, There may be overdoing in well-doing. Self-denial and mortification of the flesh is good; but if we prejudice our health by it, and disfit ourselves for the service of God, we are righteous overmuch. To reprove those that offend is good, but to cast that pearl before swine, who will turn again and rend us, is to be righteous overmuch. "Make not thyself over wise;" be not opinionative and conceited of thine own abilities; set not up for a dictator, nor pretend to give law to, and give judgment upon, all about thee; set not up for a critic, to find fault with every thing that is said and done, nor busy thyself in other men's matters, as if thou knewest every thing, and couldst do any thing. "Why shouldest thou destroy thyself," as fools often do, by meddling with strife that belongs not to them? Why shouldest thou provoke authority, and run thyself into the briars, by needless contradictions, and by going out of thy sphere to correct what is amiss? "Be wise as serpents," "Beware of men."

2nd. As to sinners, if it cannot prevail with them to forsake their sins, yet it may restrain them from growing very exorbitant. It is true "there is a wicked man that prolongs his life in his wickedness," ver. 15; but let none say, therefore, they may safely be as wicked as they will; no, "be not over much wicked," ver. 17; do not run to an excess of riot. Many that will not be wrought upon by the fear of God, and a dread of the torments of hell, to avoid all sin, will yet, if they have never so little consideration, avoid those sins that ruin their health and estate, and expose them to public justice. And Solomon here makes use of these considerations. The magistrate bears not the sword in vain, has a quick eye, and a heavy hand, and is a terror to evil-doers; therefore be afraid of coming within his reach, be not so foolish as to lay thyself open to the law. "Why shouldest thou die before thy time?" Solomon perhaps in these two cautions had a special regard to some of his own subjects that were disaffected to his government, and were meditating the revolt which they made immediately after his death. Some, it may be, quarrelled with the sins of their governor, and made that their pretence; to them he saith, "Be not righteous over much." Others were weary of the strictness of the government, and the temple service, and that made them desirous to set up another king; but he frightens both from their seditious practices with the sword of justice, and others likewise from meddling with them that were given to change.

5. Wisdom will direct us in the mean between extremes, and keep us always in the way of our duty, which we shall find a plain and safe way; ver. 18, "It is good that thou shouldest take hold of this," this wisdom, this care, not to run ourselves into snares, "yea, also from this withdraw not thine hand," never slacken thy diligence, nor abate thy resolution, to maintain a true decorum and a good government of thyself. Take hold of the bridle by which thy headstrong passions must be held in from hurrying thee into one mischief or other, as the horse and mule that have no understanding; and, having taken hold of it, keep thine hold, and withdraw not thine hand from it, for if thou do, the liberty they will take will be as the letting forth of water, and thou wilt not easily recover thy hold again. Be conscientious, and yet be cautious, and to this exercise thyself. Govern thyself steadily by the principles of religion and thou shalt find that God orders both, that man may not find out anything that is to come hereafter.

vii. 15. "All this have I seen in the days of my vanity, the righteous perishing in his righteousness, and the wicked living long in his wickedness."

vii. 16. The sense is, "Be not over strict, and be not over wise; lest thou be abandoned." The idea is, not that a man can be more religious than is good, but that a man can be more scrupulous and rigid, and more confident in his wisdom, than is good for him. Punctilious self-righteousness is not a virtue.

vii. 17. Some men strive to excel in wickedness and foolishness, but to their peril and injury.

vii. 18. Dr. Ginsburg surprises us by saying Rashbam "beautifully" explains the whole verse, "It is good for thee to take hold on this (namely, on righteousness, to be righteous); and also from that (namely, sin) do not withdraw, and do not take away thy hand from that he that fears God shall come forth out of all those straits and difficulties which they run themselves into that cast off that fear. The fear of the Lord is that wisdom which will serve as a clue to extricate us out of the most intricate labyrinths. Honesty is the best policy. They that truly fear God, have but one end to serve, and therefore act steadily. God has likewise promised to direct those that fear him, and to order their steps not only in the right way, but out of every dangerous way, Ps. xxxvii. 23, 24.

6. Wisdom will teach us how to carry it in reference to the sins and offences of others, which commonly contribute more than any thing else to the disturbance of our repose, which contract both guilt and grief.

1st. Wisdom teacheth us not to expect that those we deal with should be faultless; we ourselves are not so, none are so, no, not the best. This wisdom strengthens the wise as much as any thing, and arms them against the danger that ariseth from provocation, ver. 19, so that they are not put into any disorder by it. They consider that those they have dealings and conversation with are not incarnate angels, but sinful sons and daughters of Adam; even the best are so, insomuch that "there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not," ver. 20. Solomon had this in his prayer, 1 Kin. viii. 46, in his proverbs, Pr. xx. 9, and here in his preaching. Note, First. It is the character of just men that they do good; for the tree is known by its fruits. Secondly. The best men, and they that do most good, yet cannot say that they are perfectly free from sin. Even those that are sanctified, yet are not sinless. None that live on this side heaven live without sin. "If we say we have not sinned, we deceive ourselves." Thirdly. We sin, even in our doing good. There is something defective, nay, something offensive, in our best performances. That which for the substance of it is good and pleasing to God, yet is not so well done as it should be; and omissions in duty are sins as well as omissions of duty. Fourthly. It is only just men upon earth that are subject thus to sin and infirmity. The spirits of just men, when they are got clear of the body, are made perfect in holiness, Heb. xii. 23; and in heaven they do good and sin not.

2nd. Wisdom teacheth us not to be quick-sighted, or quick-scented, in apprehending and resenting affronts; but to wink at many of the injuries that are done us, and take on us we do not see them; ver. 21, "Take no heed to all words that are spoken," set not thy heart to them. Vex not thyself at men's peevish reflections upon thee, or suspicions of thee; but be as a deaf man that hears not, Ps. xxxviii. 13, 14. Be not solicitous or inquisitive to know what people say of thee; if they speak well of thee, it will feed thy pride, if ill, it will stir up thy passion. See, therefore, that thou approve thyself to God and thy own conscience, and then heed not what men say of thee. Hearkeners, we say, seldom hear good of themselves. If thou heed every word that is spoken, perhaps thou wilt hear thine own servant curse thee, when he thinks thou dost not hear him; thou wilt be told that he doth, and perhaps told falsely, if thou have thine ear open to tale-bearers, Pr. xxix. 12. Nay, perhaps it is true, and thou mayest stand behind the curtain and hear it thyself; mayest hear thyself not only blamed and despised, but cursed, the worst ill said of thee, and wished to thee; and that by a servant, one of the meanest rank, of the abjects, nay, by thy own servant, who should be an advocate for thee, and protect thy good name, as well as thy other interests; perhaps it is a servant that thou hast been kind to, and yet he requites thee thus ill; and this will vex thee, thou hadst better not have heard it. Perhaps it is a servant thou hast wronged, and dealt unjustly with, and, though he dare not tell thee so, he tells others so, and tells God so, and then thy own conscience will join with him in the reproach, which will make it much more uneasy. The good names of the greatest lie much at the mercy even of the meanest. And perhaps there is a great deal more evil said of us than we think there is, and by those from whom we little expected it. But we do not consult our own repose, no, nor our credit, though we pretend to be jealous of it, if we take notice of every word that is spoken diminishingly of us. It is easier to pass by twenty such affronts, than avenge one.

3rd. Wisdom puts us in mind of our own faults, ver. 27. Be not enraged at those that speak ill of thee, or wish ill to thee; "For oftentimes," in that case, if thou retire into thyself, thy own conscience will tell thee that "thou thyself hast cursed others," spoken ill of them, and wished ill to them, and thou art paid in thine own coin. Note, When any affront or injury is done us, it is seasonable to examine our consciences, whether we have not done the same, or as bad, to others; and if, upon reflection, we find we have, we must take that occasion to renew our repentance for it, must justify God, and make use of it, to qualify our own resentments. If we be truly angry with ourselves, as we ought to be, for backbiting and censuring others, we shall be the less angry with others for backbiting and censuring us. We must shew all meekness towards all men, for we ourselves were sometimes foolish, Tit. iii. 2, 3; Mat. vii. 1, 2; Jas. iii. 1, 2.

23 All this have I proved by wisdom:
I said, I will be wise; but it was far from me
24 That which is far off,
And exceeding deep, who can find it out?
25 I applied mine heart to know, and to search,
And to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things,
And to know the wickedness of folly,
Even of foolishness and madness:
26 And I find more bitter than death the woman, whose heart is snares and nets,
And her hands as bands:
Whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her;
But the sinner shall be taken by her.
27 Behold, this have I found, saith the preacher,
Counting one by one, to find out the account:
28 Which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not:
One man among a thousand have I found;
But a woman among all those have I not found.
29 Lo, this only have I found,
That God hath made man upright;
But they have sought out many inventions.

Solomon had hitherto been proving the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make men happy; now, here he comes to shew the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make men miserable; and this, as the former, he proves from his own experience, and it was a dear-bought experience. He is here, more than any where in all this book, putting on the habit of a penitent. He reviews what he had been discoursing of already, and tells us what he had said was what he knew, and was well assured of, and what he resolved to stand by. "All this have I proved by wisdom," ver. 23. Now here,

First. He owns and laments the deficiencies of his wisdom. He had wisdom enough to see the vanity of the world, and to experience that that would not make a portion for a soul; but when he came to inquire farther he found himself at a loss, his eye was too dim, his line was too short, and though he discovered this, there were many other things he could not prove by wisdom.

1. His searches were industrious. God had given him a capacity for knowledge above any; he set up with a great stock of wisdom; he had the largest opportunities of improving himself that ever any man had. And, 1st. He resolved if it were possible to gain his point. "I said, I will be wise;" he earnestly desired it as highly valuable; he fully designed it as that which he looked upon to be attainable; he determined not to sit down short of it, Pr. xviii. 1. Many are not wise because they never said they would be so, being indifferent to it; but Solomon set it up for the mark he aimed at. When he made trial of sensual pleasures he still thought to acquaint his heart with wisdom, ch. ii. 3, and not to be diverted from the pursuits of that. But perhaps he did not find it so easy a thing as he imagined to keep up his correspondence with wisdom while he addicted himself so much to his pleasures. However, his will was good; he said, "I will be wise." And that was not all. 2nd. He resolved to spare no pains; ver. 25, "I applied my heart," I and my heart turned every way; I left no stone unturned, no means untried, to compass what I had in view. I set myself "to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom" to accomplish myself in all useful learning, philosophy, and divinity. If he had not thus closely applied himself to study it had been but a jest for him to say, "I will be wise;" for those that will attain the end must take the right way. Solomon was a man of great quickness, and yet, instead of using that (with many) as an excuse for slothfulness, he pressed it upon himself as an inducement to diligence; and the easier he found it to master a good notion, the more intent he would be that he might be master of the more good notions. Those that have the best parts should take the greatest pains, as those that have the largest stock should trade most. He applied himself not only to know what lay on the surface, but to search what lay hid out of the common view and road; nor did he search a little way and then give it over, because he did not presently find what he searched for, but he sought it out, went to the bottom of it; nor did he aim to know things only, but the reasons of things, that he might give an account of them.

2. Yet his success was not answerable or satisfying. "I said, I will be wise, but it was far from me," I could not compass it. After all this only I know, that I know nothing, and the more I know the more I see there is to be known, and the more sensible I am of my own ignorance. "That which is far off and exceeding deep, who can find it out?" He means God himself, his counsels, and his works. When he searched into these he presently found himself puzzled and run aground; he could not order his speech by reason of darkness. It is higher than heaven, what can he do? Job xi. 8 Blessed be God, there is nothing we have to do but it is plain and easy, the word is nigh us, Pr. viii. 9. But there is a great deal we would wish to know which is far off and exceeding deep, among the secret things which belong not to us. And probably it is a culpable ignorance and error that Solomon here laments, that his pleasures, and the many amusements of his court, had blinded his eyes, and cast a mist before them, so that he could not attain to true wisdom as he designed.

Secondly. He owns and laments the instances of his folly in which he had exceeded, as in wisdom he came short. Here is,

1. His inquiry concerning the evil of sin. He applied his heart "to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness." Observe, 1st. The knowledge of sin is a difficult knowledge, and hard to be attained; Solomon took pains for it. Sin has many disguises with which it palliates itself, as being loath to appear sin, and it is very hard to strip it of these, and to see it in its true nature and colours. 2nd. It is necessary to our repentance for sin that we be acquainted with the evil of it, as it is necessary to the cure of a disease to know its nature, causes, and malignity. St. Paul therefore valued the Divine law because it discovered sin to him, Rom. vii. 7. Solomon, that in the days of his folly had set his wits on work to invent pleasures and sharpen them, and was ingenious in making provision for the flesh, now God had opened his eyes, is as industrious to find out the aggravations of sin, and so to put an edge upon his repentance. Ingenious sinners should be ingenious penitents, and wit and learning, among other the spoils of the strong man armed, should be divided by the Lord Jesus. 3rd. It well becomes penitents to say the worst they can of sin, for the truth is we can never speak bad enough of it. Solomon here for his farther humiliation desired to see more, First. Of the sinfulness of sin. That is it which he lays the greatest stress upon in this inquiry, "to know the wickedness of folly;" by which perhaps he means his own iniquity, the sin of uncleanness, for that was commonly called folly in Israel, Gen. xxxiv. 7; Deu. xxii. 21; Jud. xx. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 12. When he indulged himself in it he made a light matter of it, but now he desires to see the wickedness of it; its "great wickedness," so Joseph speaks of it, Gen. xxxix. 9. Or, it may be taken there generally for all sin. Many extenuate their sins with this, they were folly; but Solomon sees wickedness in those follies; an offence to God, and a wrong to conscience, "this is wickedness," Jer. iv. 18 Zec. v. 8. Secondly. Of the folly of sin. As there is a wickedness in folly, so there is a folly in wickedness, even foolishness and madness. Wilful sinners are fools and madmen; they act contrary both to right reason and to their true interest.

2. The result of this inquiry.

1st. He now discovered more than ever the evil of that great sin which he himself had been guilty of, the loving of many strange women, 1 Kin. xi. 1; this is that which he here most feelingly laments, and in very pathetical expressions.

First. He found the remembrance of the sin very grievous. Oh how heavy did it lie upon his conscience! what an agony was he in upon the thought of it; the wickedness, the foolishness, the madness, that he had been guilty of! "I find it more bitter than death." As great a terror seized him in reflection upon it as if he had been under the arrests of death. Thus do they that have their sins set in order before them, by a sound conviction, cry out against them; they are bitter as gall, nay, bitter as death, to all true penitents. Uncleanness is a sin that is in its own nature more pernicious than death itself. Death may be made honourable and comfortable; but this sin can be no other but shame and pain, Pr. v. 9, 11.

Secondly. He had found the temptation to the sin very dangerous, and that it was extremely difficult, and next to impossible, for those that ventured into the temptation to escape the sin, and for those that had fallen into the sin to recover themselves by repentance. The heart of the adulterous woman is snares and nets; she plays her game to ruin souls with as much art and it: for the man that fears God will proceed properly in both, as he 'akes care not to be very righteous, nor to sin above measure," &c. But surely sin is that from which a man should withdraw his hand. We believe the reference is to the precepts, one as well as another of which is to be observed, and, indeed, he who fears God will proceed with or carry out all of them. Nor can we perceive any reason for not explaining the verse in an orthodox sense.

vii. 26. The Hebrew for "whoso pleaseth God" is "he that is good before God." The good man will escape, the bad man will be caught.

vii. 27, 28. "After particular inquiry to ascertain the fact, and still continuing my search, I have found one man in a thousand, but not a woman, free from blame."

viii. 1. The sense is, "Who is like the wise man, and (like) him that understands the interpretation of a matter? A man's wisdom brightens his countenance, and subdues the sternness of his aspect."

subtlety as ever any fowler used to take a silly bird. The methods such sinners use are both deceiving and destroying, as snares and nets are. The unwary souls are enticed into them by the bait of pleasure, which they greedily catch at, and promise themselves satisfaction in, but they are taken ere they are aware, and taken irrecoverably. "Her hands are as bands," with which, under colour of fond embraces, she holds those fast that she hath seized; they are held in the cords of their own sin, Pr. v. 22. Lust gets strength by being gratified, and its charms are more prevalent.

Thirdly. He reckoned it a great instance of God's favour to any man if by his grace he has kept him from this sin. "He that pleaseth God shall escape from her;" shall be preserved either from being tempted to this sin or from being overcome by the temptation. Those that are kept from this sin must acknowledge it is God that keeps them, and not any strength or resolution of their own; must acknowledge it a great mercy; and they that would have grace sufficient for them to arm them against this sin must be careful to please God in every thing, by keeping his ordinances, Lev. xviii. 30.

Fourthly. He reckoned it a sin that is as sore a punishment of other sins as a man can fall under in this life. "The sinner shall be taken by her;" that is, 1*st*. Those that allow themselves in other sins, by which their minds are blinded and their consciences debauched, are the more easily drawn to this. 2*nd*. It is just with God to leave them to themselves to fall into it: see Rom. i. 26, 28; Eph. iv. 18, 19. Thus doth Solomon, as it were with horror, bless himself from the sin in which he had plunged himself.

2nd. He now discovered more than ever of the general corruption of man's nature. He runs up that stream to the fountain, as his father had done before him on a like occasion, Ps. li. 5, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity."

First. He endeavoured to find out the number of his actual transgressions; ver. 27, "Behold, this have I found;" that is, this I hoped to have found. I thought I could have understood my errors, and have brought in a complete list at least of the heads of them; I thought I could have counted them one by one, and have found out the account, which as a penitent he desired to find out, that he might the more particularly acknowledge them; and generally the more particular we are in the confession of sin the more comfort we have in the sense of the pardon; and as a preacher, that he might the more particularly give warning to others. Note, A sound conviction of one sin will put us upon inquiring into the whole confederacy; and the more we see amiss in ourselves the more diligently we should inquire farther into our own faults, that what we see not may be discovered to us, Job xxxiv. 32.

Secondly. He soon found himself at a loss, and perceived that they were innumerable; ver. 28, "Which yet my soul seeketh." I am still counting, and still desirous to find out the account, "but I find not;" I cannot count them all, nor find out the account of them to perfection; I still make new and amazing discoveries of the desperate wickedness that there is in my own heart; Jer. xvii. 9, 10, "Who can know it?" "Who can understand his errors?" Who can tell how often he offends? Ps. xix. 12. He finds that if God enter into judgment with him, or he with himself, for all his thoughts, words, and actions, he is not able to answer for one of a thousand, Job ix. 3. This he illustrates by comparing the corruption of his own heart and life with the corruption of the world, where he scarce found one good man among a thousand; nay, among all the thousand wives and concubines which he had he did not find one good woman. Even so, saith he, when I come to recollect and review my own thoughts, words, and actions, and all the passages of my life past, perhaps among those that were manly I might find one good among a thousand, and that was all; the rest even of those had some corruption or other in them, (he found, ver. 26, he had sinned even in doing good;) but for those that were effeminate, that passed in the indulgence of his pleasures, they were all naught. In that part of his life there did not appear so much as one of a thousand good. In our hearts and lives there appears little good at the best, but sometimes none at all. Doubtless this is not intended as a censure of the female sex in general, it is probable enough that there have been, and are, more good women than good men, Acts xvii. 4, 12; but he only alludes to his own sad experience; and perhaps there may be this farther in it, he doth in his proverbs warn us against the snares both of the evil man and of the strange woman, Pr. ii. 12, 16; iv. 14; v. 3. Now he had observed the ways of the evil women to be more deceitful and dangerous than those of the evil men, that it was more difficult to discover their frauds and elude their snares; and therefore he compares sin to an adulteress, Pr. ix. 13; and perceives he can no more find out the deceitfulness of his own heart than he can that of the strange woman, whose "ways are movable, that thou canst not know them."

Thirdly. He therefore runs up all the streams of actual transgression to the fountain of original corruption. The source and spring of all the folly and madness that is in the world is in man's apostacy from God, and his degeneracy from his primitive rectitude; ver. 29, "Lo, this only have I found," when I could not find out the particulars, yet the gross account was manifest enough, it is as clear as the sun, that man is corrupted, and revolted, and is not as he was made. Observe,

1*st*. How man was made by the wisdom and goodness of God. "God made man upright," 'Adam, the first man,' so the Chaldee. God made him, and he made him upright; that is, such a one as he should be. Being made a rational creature, he was in all respects such a one as a rational creature should be; upright, without any irregularity; one could find no fault in him. He was upright; that is, determined to God only, in opposition to the many inventions which afterwards he turned aside to. Man, as he came out of God's hands, was (as we may say) a little picture of his Maker, who is good and upright.

2*nd*. How he was marred, and in effect unmade, by his own folly and badness. "They have sought out many inventions." They; that is, our first parents, or the whole race, all in general, and every one in particular. 'They have sought out great inventions,' so some; inventions to become great as gods, Gen. iii. 5. Or, 'the inventions of the great ones,' so some; that is, of the angels that fell, the magnates. Or, 'many inventions.' Man, instead of resting in what God had found for him, was for seeking to mend himself, like the prodigal that left his father's house to go seek his fortune. Instead of being for one, he was for many; instead of being for God's institutions, he was for his own inventions: the law of his creation would not hold him, but he would be at his own dispose, and follow his own sentiments and inclinations. "Vain man would be wise;" wiser than his Maker; is giddy and unsettled in his pursuits, and therefore has many inventions. They that forsake God wander endlessly. Men's actual transgressions are multiplied. Solomon could not find out how many they are, ver. 28; but he found they were very many. Many kinds of sins, and those oft repeated; they are more than the hairs on our head, Ps. xl. 12.

CHAPTER VIII.

Solomon in this chapter comes to recommend wisdom to us as the most powerful antidote against both the temptations and vexations that arise from the vanity of the world. Here is, I. The benefit and praise of wisdom, ver. 1. II. some particular instances of wisdom prescribed to us: 1. We must keep in due subjection to the government God hath set over us, ver. 2—5; 2. We must get ready for sudden evils, and especially for sudden death, ver. 6—8; 3. We must arm ourselves against the temptation of an oppressive government, and not think it strange, ver. 9, 10: the impunity of oppressors makes them more daring, ver. 11; but in the issue it will be well with the righteous, and ill with the wicked, ver. 12, 13; and therefore the present prosperity of the wicked, and afflictions of the righteous, ought not to be a stumblingblock to us, ver. 14; 4. We must cheerfully use the gifts of God's providence, ver. 15; 5. We must with an entire satisfaction acquiesce in the will of God, and, not pretending to find the bottom, we must humbly and silently adore the depth of his unsearchable counsels, being assured they are all wise, and just, and good, ver. 16, 17.

WHO is as the wise man?
And who knoweth the interpretation of a thing?
A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine,
And the boldness of his face shall be changed.
2 I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment,
And that in regard of the oath of God.
3 Be not hasty to go out of his sight:
Stand not in an evil thing;
For he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him.
4 Where the word of a king is, there is power:
And who may say unto him, What doest thou?
5 Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing:
And a wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment.

Here is, First. An encomium of wisdom, ver. 1; that is of true piety, guided in all its exercises by prudence and discretion. The wise man is the good man, that knows God, and glorifies him, knows himself, and doth well for himself. His wisdom is a great happiness to him. For,

1. It advanceth him above his neighbours, and makes him more excellent than they. "Who is as the wise man?" Note, Heavenly wisdom will make a man an incomparable man; no man without grace, though he be learned, or noble, or rich, is to be compared with a man that hath true grace, and is therefore accepted of God.

2. It makes him useful among his neighbours, and very serviceable to them. 'Who but the wise man knows the interpretation of a thing?' that is, understands the times, and the events of them, and their critical junctures, so as to direct what Israel ought to do, 1 Chr. xii. 32.

3. It beautifies a man in the eyes of his friends. It "makes his face to shine," as Moses' did, when he came down from the mount; it puts an honour upon a man, and a lustre on his whole conversation, makes him to be regarded and taken notice of, and gains him respect, as Job xxix. 7, &c; it makes him lovely and amiable, and the darling and blessing of his country. The 'strength of his face,' that is, the sourness and severity of his countenance, (so some understand the last clause,) 'shall be changed' by it into that which is sweet and obliging. Even those whose natural temper is rough and morose, by wisdom are strangely altered, and become mild and gentle, and learn to look pleasant.

4. It emboldens a man against his adversaries, their attempts, and contempts. 'The boldness of his face shall be doubled' by wisdom; it will add very much to his courage in maintaining his integrity, when he not only hath an honest cause to plead, but by his wisdom knows how to manage it, and where to find "the interpretation of a thing." "He shall not be ashamed, but shall speak with his enemy in the gate."

Secondly. A particular instance of wisdom pressed upon us, and that is, subjection to authority, and a dutiful and peaceable perseverance in our allegiance to the government which Providence hath set over us. Observe,

1. How the duty of subjects is here described,

1st. We must be observant of the laws. In all those things wherein the civil power is to interpose, whether legislative or judicial, we ought to submit to its order and constitutions. "I counsel thee,"—it may as well be supplied, I charge thee, not only as a prince, but as a preacher, he might do both,—I recommend it to thee as a piece of wisdom; I say, whatever those say that are given to change, "Keep the king's commandment," wherever the sovereign power is lodged be subject to it. 'Observe the mouth of a king,' so the phrase is, say as he saith, do as he bids thee; let his word be a law, or rather, let the law be his word. Some understand the following clause as a limitation of this obedience; 'Keep the king's commandment, yet so as to have a regard to the oath of God;' that is, so as to keep a good conscience, and not to violate thy obligations to God, which are prior and superior to thine obligations to the king. "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," but so as to reserve pure and entire to God the things that are his.

2nd. We must not be forward to find fault with the public administration, or quarrel with every thing that is not just according to our mind, nor quit our post of service under the government, and throw it up upon every discontent; ver. 3, "Be not hasty to go out of his sight," when he is displeased at thee, ch. x. 4; or, when thou art displeased at him, fly not off in a passion, nor entertain such jealousies of him as will tempt thee to renounce the court or forsake the kingdom. Solomon's subjects, as soon as his head was laid, went directly contrary to this rule, when upon the rough answer which Rehoboam gave them, they were hasty to go out of his sight, would not take time for second thoughts, nor admit proposals of accommodation, but cried, "To your tents, O Israel." There may perhaps be a just cause to go out of his sight, but be not hasty to do it; act with great deliberation.

3rd. We must not persist in a fault when it is shewed us; "Stand not in an evil thing;" in any offence thou hast given to thy prince. Humble thyself, and do not justify thyself, for that will make the offence much more offensive. In any ill design thou hast upon some discontent conceived against thy prince, do not proceed in it, but "if thou hast, done foolishly in lifting up thyself, or hast thought evil, lay thy hand upon thy mouth," Pr. xxx. 32. Note, Though we may by surprise be drawn into an evil thing, yet we must not stand in it, but recede from it as soon as it appears to us to be evil.

4th. We must prudently accommodate ourselves to our opportunities, both for our own relief, if we think ourselves wronged, and for the redress of public grievances. "A wise man's heart discerns both time and judgment," ver. 5; that is, it is the wisdom of subjects, in applying themselves to their princes, to inquire and consider, both at what season and in what manner they may do it best, and most effectually; to pacify his anger, obtain his favour, or obtain the revocation of any grievousness prescribed. Esther, in dealing with Ahasuerus, took a deal of pains to discern both time and judgment, and it sped accordingly. This may be taken as a general rule of wisdom, that every thing should be well-timed; and our enterprises are then likely to succeed when we nick the opportunity for them.

viii. 2. "The oath of God" is the oath of obedience and fidelity taken before God.

viii. 4. This verse gives reasons for the preceding injunction, "Because the word of a king is powerful."

viii. 5. He that keeps the king's commandment will know (or be subject to) no evil word. The obedient will not be blamed.

viii. 6. More literally, "For to every purpose there is time and judgment, for the evil of man is great upon him." This verse and the next may both explain why the wise man acts as described in verse 5. The word "evil" may signify calamity, or exposure to harm, or it may mean wickedness, though the former is most probable.

viii. 8. The sense is, "There is no man who can control the spirit to restrain the spirit; no one has control over death's day, and there is no discharge in the war; and sin will not deliver its masters."

viii. 9. The second clause may be translated, "There is a time when man rules over man to his hurt," i.e., the hurt of the subject.

2. What arguments are here used to engage us to be subject to the higher powers; they are much the same with those which St. Paul useth, Rom. xiii. 1, &c.

1st. We must needs be subject for conscience sake, and that is the most powerful principle of subjection. We must be subject, because "of the oath of God;" that is, the oath of allegiance which we have taken to be faithful to the government; the covenant between the king and the people, 2 Chr. xxiii. 16. David made a covenant or contract with the elders of Israel, though he was king by Divine designation, 1 Chr. xi. 3. Keep the king's commandment, for he hath sworn to rule thee in the fear of God; and thou hast sworn in that fear to be faithful to him. It is called the oath of God, because he is a witness to it, and will avenge the violation of it.

2nd. For wrath's sake. Because of the sword which the prince bears, and the power he is intrusted with, which make him very formidable, "He doth whatsoever pleaseth him;" that is, he hath a great authority, and a great ability to support that authority; ver. 4, "where the word of a king is," giving orders to seize a man, "there is power," there are enough that will execute his orders, which makes "the wrath of a king," or supreme government, "like the roaring of a lion," and like "messengers of death." "Who may say unto him, What doest thou?" that is, he that contradicts him, it is at his peril; kings will not bear to have their orders disputed, but expect they should be obeyed; in short, it is dangerous contending with sovereignty, and what many have repented. A subject is an unequal match for a prince; he may command me that has legions at command.

3rd. For the sake of our own comfort. "Whoso keepeth the commandment," and lives a quiet and peaceable life, he "shall feel no evil thing;" to which that of the apostle answers, Rom. xiii. 4, "Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power" of the king? "Do that which is good," as becomes a dutiful and loyal subject, "and thou shalt" ordinarily "have praise of the same." He that doth no ill shall feel no ill, and needs fear none.

6 Because to every purpose there is time and judgment,
Therefore the misery of man is great upon him
7 For he knoweth not that which shall be:
For who can tell him when it shall be?
8 There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit;
Neither hath he power in the day of death:
And there is no discharge in that war;
Neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

Solomon had said, ver. 5, that "a wise man's heart discerneth time and judgment," that is, a man's wisdom will go a great way by the blessing of God in moral prognostications. But here he shews that few have that wisdom, and that even the wisest may yet be surprised by a calamity which they had not any foresight of; and, therefore, it is our wisdom to expect and prepare for sudden changes. Observe,

First. All the events concerning us, with the exact time of them, are determined and appointed in the counsel and foreknowledge of God, and all in wisdom. "To every purpose there is a time" prefixed, and it is the best time, for it is "time and judgment," time appointed both in wisdom and righteousness; the appointment is not chargeable with folly or iniquity.

Secondly. We are very much in the dark concerning future events, and the time and season of them. Man "knows not that which shall be" himself, and "who can tell him when" or how "it shall be?" ver. 7. It cannot either be foreseen by him or foretold to him; the stars cannot foretell a man what shall be, nor any of the arts of divination. God hath in wisdom concealed from us the knowledge of future events, that we may be always ready for changes.

Thirdly. It is our great unhappiness and misery that, because we cannot foresee an evil, we know not how to avoid it, or guard against it; and because we are not aware of the proper, successful season of actions, therefore we lose our opportunities, and miss our way. "Because to every purpose" there is but one way, one method, one proper opportunity, "therefore the misery of man is great upon him," because it is so hard to hit that, and it is a thousand to one but he misseth it. Most of the miseries men labour under, had been prevented if they could have been foreseen, and the happy time discovered to avoid them. Men are miserable because they do not look to their hits.

Fourthly. Whatever other evils may be avoided, we are all under a fatal necessity of dying, ver. 8.

1. When the soul is required it must be resigned; and it is to no purpose to dispute it either by arms or arguments: not ourselves or any friend we have for us. "There is no man that has power over his own spirit to retain it," when it is summoned to return to God who gave it. It cannot fly anywhere out of the jurisdiction of death, nor find any place where its writs do not run; it cannot abscond, so as to escape death's eye, though it is hid from the eyes of all living. A man has no power to adjourn the day of his death, nor can he by prayers or bribes obtain a reprieve; no bail will be taken, no essoin [excuse], protection, or imparlance [conference], allowed. We have not power over the spirit of a friend to retain that; the prince with all his authority cannot prolong the life of the most valuable of his subjects; nor the physician with his medicines and methods; nor the soldier with his force, nor the orator with his eloquence, nor the best saint with his intercessions. The stroke of death can by no means be put by, when our days are determined, and the hour appointed us is come.

2. Death is an enemy that we must all enter the lists with, sooner or later. "There is no discharge in that war," that is, no dismission from it; either of the men of business, or of the fainthearted, as there was among the Jews, Deu. xx. 5, 8. While we live we are struggling with death, and we shall never put off the harness till we put off the body, never obtain a discharge till death has obtained the mastery; the youngest is not released as a freshwater soldier, nor the oldest as miles emeritus,—'a soldier whose merits have entitled him to a discharge.' Death is a battle that must be fought; 'there is no sending to that war,' so some read it; no substituting another to muster for us, no champion admitted to fight for us; we must ourselves engage, and are concerned to provide accordingly, as for a battle.

3. Men's wickedness, by which they often evade or outface the justice of the prince, cannot secure them from the arrests of death; nor can the most obstinate sinner harden his heart against those terrors. Though he strengthen himself never so much in his wickedness, Ps. lii. 7, death will be too strong for him. The most subtle wickedness cannot outwit death, nor the most impudent wickedness outbrave death. Nay, the wickedness which men give themselves to will be so far from delivering them from death, that it will deliver them up to death.

9 All this have I seen, and applied my heart
Unto every work that is done under the sun:
There is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt.
10 And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone
From the place of the holy, and they were forgotten
In the city where they had so done:
This is also vanity. [speedily,
11 Because sentence against an evil work is not executed
Therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.
12 Though a sinner do evil an hundred times,
And his days be prolonged,
Yet surely I know that it shall be well with them
That fear God, which fear before him:
13 But it shall not be well with the wicked,
Neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow;
Because he feareth not before God.

Solomon, in the beginning of the chapter, had warned us against having any thing to do with seditious subjects; here in these verses he encourageth us in reference to the mischief of tyrannical and oppressive rulers, such as he had complained of before, ch. iii. 16; iv. 1.

First. He had observed many such rulers, ver. 9. In the serious views and reviews he had taken of the children of men, and their state, he had observed that many a time "one man rules over another to his hurt;" that is, 1. To the hurt of the ruled; many understand it so. Whereas they ought to be God's ministers unto their subjects for their good, Rom. xiii. 4, to administer justice, and to preserve the public peace and order, they use their power for their hurt, to invade their property, encroach upon their liberty, and to patronise the acts of injustice. It is sad with a people, when those that should protect their religion and rights aim at the destruction of both. 2. To the hurt of the rulers, so we render it, to their own hurt; to the feeding of their pride and covetousness, the gratifying of their passion and revenge, and so to the filling up of the measure of their sins, and the hastening and aggravating of their ruin. Agens agendo repatitur,—'What hurt men do to others will return, in the end, to their own hurt.'

Secondly. He had observed them to prosper and flourish in the abuse of their power, ver. 10. 'I saw those wicked rulers come and go from the place of the holy;' go in state to, and return in pomp from, the place of judicature, which is called the place of the holy one, because "the judgment is the Lord's," Deu. i. 17; and "he judgeth among the gods," Ps. lxxxii. 1; and is with them in the judgment, 2 Chr. xix. 6. And they continued all their days in office, were never reckoned with for their maladministration, but died in honour, and were buried magnificently; their commissions were durante vita,—'during life,' and not quamdiu se bene gesserint,—'during good behaviour.' "And they were forgotten in the city where they had so done;" their wicked practices were not remembered against them to their reproach and infamy when they were gone. Or, rather, it notes the vanity of their dignity and power; for that is his remark upon it in the close of the verse, "This is also vanity." They are proud of their wealth, and power, and honour, because they sit in the place of the holy; but all this cannot secure, 1. Their bodies from being buried in the dust. I saw them laid in the grave, and their pomp, though it attended them thither, could not descend after them, Ps. xlix. 17. 2. Nor their names from being buried in oblivion; for they were forgotten, as if they had never been.

Thirdly. He had observed that their prosperity hardened them in their wickedness, ver. 11. It is true of all sinners in general, and particularly of wicked rulers, that, "because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily," they think it will never be executed, and therefore they set the law at defiance, and "their hearts are full in them to do evil." They venture to do so much the more mischief, fetch a greater compass in their wicked designs, and are secure and fearless in it, and commit iniquity with a high hand. Observe, 1. Sentence is past against evil works, and evil workers, by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth; even against the evil works of princes and great men, as well as of inferior persons. 2. The execution of this sentence is oftentimes delayed a great while; and the sinner goes on, not only unpunished, but prosperous and successful. 3. Impunity hardens sinners in impiety; and the patience of God is shamefully abused by many, who, instead of being led by it to repentance, are confirmed by it in their impenitency. 4. Sinners herein deceive themselves; for though the sentence be not executed speedily, it will be executed the more severely at last. Vengeance comes slowly, but it comes surely; and wrath is in the meantime treasured up against the day of wrath.

Fourthly. He foresaw such an end of all these things as would be sufficient to keep us from quarrelling with the Divine providence upon account of them. He supposeth a wicked ruler to do an unjust thing a hundred times, and that yet his punishment is deferred, and God's patience towards him is prolonged much beyond what was expected, and the days of his power are lengthened out, so that he continues to oppress; yet be not discouraged.

1. God's people are certainly a happy people, though they be oppressed; "It shall be well with them that fear God;" I say, with all them, and them only, "which fear before him." Note, 1st. It is the character of God's people that they fear God; have an awe of him upon their hearts, and make conscience of their duty to him. And this because they see his eye always upon them, and they know it is their concern to approve themselves to him. When they lie at the mercy of proud oppressors, they fear God more than they fear them. They do not quarrel with the providence of God, but submit to it. 2nd. It is the happiness of all that fear God, that in the worst of times it shall be well with them. Their happiness in God's favour cannot be prejudiced, nor their communion with God interrupted, by their troubles; they are in a good case, for they are kept in a good frame under their troubles; and in the end they shall have a blessed deliverance from, and an abundant recompence for, their troubles. And therefore surely I know,—I know it by the promise of God, and the experience of all the saints,—that however it goes with others it shall go well with them. All is well that ends well.

2. Wicked people are certainly a miserable people; though they prosper and prevail for a time, the curse is as sure to them as the blessing is to the righteous. "It shall not be well with the wicked," as others think it is who judge by outward appearance, and as they themselves expect it will be; nay, "woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them," Isa. iii. 10, 11. They shall be reckoned with viii. 10. This is a very difficult passage. It may be almost literally translated, "And thus I have seen the wicked buried, and they have come, and from the holy place they have gone, and they have been forgotten in the city wherein they have so done: this also is vanity." Another explanation advocated by some of the older and of the more recent critics is, "Thus I have seen the wicked buried, and they have returned, while those who had done right came from the sanctuary, and were forgotten in the city." However ingenious the second explanation, it is difficult to set aside for it the more common and natural one. It is, nevertheless, worthy of attention, and especially in substituting the words "done right" for "done so."

viii. 12. This may be explained as continuing verse 11: "For that a sinner does evil a hundred times, and his life is prolonged; yet I also know that it shall be well," &c.

viii. 15. In this verse the writer returns like a poet to the refrain or chorus of his song; although it is but just to observe that he is for all the ill they have done; nothing that befalls them shall be really well for them. Nihil potest ad malos pervenire quod prosit, imo nihil quod non noceat,—'No event can occur to the wicked which will do them good, rather no event which will not do them harm.'—Seneca. Note, 1st. The wicked man's days "are as a shadow," not only uncertain and declining, as all men's days are, but altogether unprofitable. A good man's days have some substance in them, he lives to good purpose; a wicked man's days are all as a shadow, empty and worthless. 2nd. These days shall not be prolonged to what he promised himself; he shall not live out half his days, Ps. lv. 23; though they may be prolonged, ver. 12, beyond what others expected, yet his day shall come to fall. He shall fall short of everlasting life, and then his long life on earth will be worth little. 3rd. God's great quarrel with wicked people is for their not fearing before him; that is at the bottom of their wickedness, and cuts them off from all happiness.

14 There is a vanity which is done upon the earth;
That there be just men, unto whom it happeneth
According to the work of the wicked;
Again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth
According to the work of the righteous:
I said that this also is vanity.
15 Then I commended mirth,
Because a man hath no better thing under the sun,
Than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry:
For that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life,
Which God giveth him under the sun.
16 When I applied mine heart to know wisdom,
And to see the business that is done upon the earth:
(For also there is that neither day nor night Seeth sleep with his eyes:)
17 Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out
The work that is done under the sun:
Because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it;
Yea farther; though a wise man think to know it,
Yet shall he not be able to find it.

Wise and good men have of old been perplexed with this difficulty, how the prosperity of the wicked and the troubles of the righteous can be reconciled with the holiness and goodness of the God that governs the world; concerning this Solomon here gives us his advice.

First. He would not have us to be surprised at it, as though some strange thing happened; for he himself saw it in his days, ver. 14. 1. He saw "just men, to whom it happened according to the work of the wicked," who, notwithstanding their righteousness, suffered very hard things, and continued long to do so, as if they were to be punished for some great wickedness. 2. He saw "wicked men, to whom it happened according to the work of the righteous," who prospered as remarkably as if they had been rewarded for some good deed, and these from themselves, from God, from men. We see the just troubled and perplexed in their own minds, the wicked easy, fearless, and secure; the just crossed and afflicted by the Divine providence, the wicked prosperous, successful, and smiled upon; the just censured and reproached, and run down by the higher powers, the wicked applauded and preferred.

Secondly. He would have us to take occasion from hence, not to charge God with iniquity, but to charge the world with vanity. No fault is to be found with God; but as to the world, "this is vanity upon the earth," and again, "this is also vanity," that is, it is a certain evidence that the things of this world are not the best things, nor were ever designed to make a portion and happiness for us; for if they had, God would not have allotted so much of this world's wealth to his worst enemies, and so much of its troubles to his best friend. There must, therefore, be another life after this, the joys and griefs of which must be real and substantial, and able to make men truly happy, and truly miserable, for this world doth neither.

Thirdly. He would have us not to fret and perplex ourselves about it, or make ourselves uneasy, but cheerfully to enjoy what God hath given us in the world; to be content with it, and make the best of it, though it be much better with others, and such as we think very unworthy; ver. 15, "Then I commended joy," a holy security and serenity of mind, arising from a confidence in God and his power, providence, and promise, "because a man has no better thing under the sun," (though a good man has much better things above the sun,) "than to eat and drink," that is, soberly and thankfully to make use of the things of this life according as his rank is, and to be cheerful whatever happens; "for that shall abide with him of his labour," that is, all the fruit he hath for himself of the pains that he takes in the business of the world, let him therefore take it, and much good may it do him. And let him not deny himself that out of a peevish discontent, because the world doth not go as he would have it. "That shall abide with him during the days of his life which God giveth him under the sun." Our present life is a life under the sun, but we look for the life of the world to come, which will commence and continue when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and shine no more. This present life must be reckoned by days; this life is given us, and the days of it allotted to us, by the counsel of God, and therefore while it doth last we must accommodate ourselves to the will of God, and study to answer the ends of life.

Fourthly. He would not have us undertake to give a reason for that which God doth; for "his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters," past finding out, and therefore we must be contentedly and piously ignorant of the meaning of God's proceedings in the government of the world, ver. 16, 17. Here he shews,

1. That both he himself and many others had very closely studied the point, and searched far into the reasons of the prosperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the righteous. He, for his part, had applied his heart to know this wisdom, and to see the business that is done by the Divine providence upon the earth, to find out if there were any certain scheme, any constant rule or method, by which the affairs of this lower world were administered,—any course of government as sure and steady as the course of nature,—so that by what is done now we might as certainly foretell what will be done next, as by the moon's changing now we can foretell when it will be at the full. This he would fain have found out. Others likewise had set themselves to make this inquiry, with so close an application, that they could not find time for sleep either day or night, nor find in their hearts to sleep, so full of anxiety were they about these things. Some think Solomon speaks of himself, that he was so eager in prosecuting this great inquiry, that he could not sleep for thinking of it.

2. That it was all labour in vain, ver. 17. When we look upon all the works of God, and his providence, and compare one part with another, we cannot find that there is any such certain method by which "the work that is done under the sun" is directed; we cannot discover any key by which to decipher the character, nor by consulting precedents can we know the practice of this court, nor what the judgment will be. 1st. Though a man be never so industrious, though he labour to seek it out; 2nd. Though he be never so ingenious, though he be a wise man in other things, and can fathom the counsels of kings themselves, and trace them by their footsteps; nay, 3rd. Though he be very confident of success, though he think to know it; yet he shall not, he cannot find it out. God's ways are above ours, nor is he tied to his own former ways but his judgments are a great deep.

CHAPTER IX.

Solomon, in this chapter, for a farther proof of the vanity of this world, gives us four observations which he had made upon a survey of the state of the children of men in it: I. He observed that commonly as to outward things good and bad men fare much alike, ver. 1—3. II. That death puts a final period to all our employments and enjoyments in this world, ver. 4—6; from whence he infers, that it is our wisdom to enjoy the comforts of life, and mind the business of life while it doth last, ver. 7—10. III. That God's providence often crosseth the fairest and most hopeful probabilities of men's endeavour, and great calamities often surprise men ere they are aware, ver. 11, 12. IV. That wisdom often makes men very useful, and yet gains them little respect, but pesons of great merit are slighted, ver. 13—19. And what is there then in this world that should make us fond of it?

FOR all this I considered in my heart even to declare all this,
That the righteous, and the wise,
And their works, are in the hand of God:
No man knoweth either love or hatred
By all that is before them.
2 All things come alike to all:
There is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked;
To the good and to the clean, and to the unclean;
To him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not:
As is the good, so is the sinner;
And he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath.
3 This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun,
That there is one event unto all:
Yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil,
And madness is in their heart while they live,
And after that they go to the dead.

It has been observed concerning those who have pretended to search for the philosopher's stone, that, though they could never find what they sought for, yet in the search they have hit upon many other useful discoveries and experiments. Thus Solomon, when in the close of the foregoing chapter he applied his heart to know the work of God, and took a great deal of pains to search into it, though he despaired of finding it out, yet he found out that which abundantly recompensed him for the search, and gave him some satisfaction, which here he gives us; for therefore he considered all this in his heart, and weighed it deliberately, that he might declare it for the good of others. Note, What we are to declare, we should first consider; think twice before we speak once; and what we have considered we should then declare. "I believed, therefore have I spoken." The great difficulty which Solomon met with in studying the book of providence was the little difference that is made between good men and bad, in the distribution of comforts and crosses, and the disposal of events. This has perplexed the minds of many wise and contemplative men; Solomon discourseth of it in these verses, and though he doth not undertake to find out this work of God, yet he saith that which may prevent its being a stumblingblock to us.

First. Before he describes the temptation in its strength he lays down a great and unquestionable truth, which he resolves to stick to, and which, if firmly believed, will be sufficient to break the force of the temptation. This has been the way of God's people in grappling with this difficulty. Job, before he discourseth of this matter, lays down the doctrine of God's omniscience, Job xxiv. 1; Jeremiah the doctrine of his righteousness, Jer. xii. 1; another prophet that of his holiness, Hab. i. 13; the psalmist that of his goodness, and peculiar favour to his own people, Ps. lxxiii. 1; and that is it which Solomon here fastens upon, and resolves to abide by, that though good and evil seem to be dispensed promiscuously, yet God has a particular care of, and concern for, his own people: "The righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God," under his special protection and conduct; all their affairs are managed by him for their good; all their wise and righteous actions are in his hand, to be recompensed in the other world, though not in this. They seem as if they were given up into the hand of their enemies, but it is not so; men have no power against them but what is given them from above. The events concerning them do not come to pass by chance, but all according to the will and counsel of God, which will turn that to be for them which seemed to be most against them. Let this make us easy, whatever happens, that all God's saints are in his hand, Deu. xxxiii. 3; Jno. x. 29; Ps. xxxi. 15.

Secondly. He lays this down for a rule, that the love and hatred of God is not to be measured and judged of by men's outward condition. If prosperity were a certain sign of God's love, and affliction of his hatred, then it might justly be an offence to us to see the wicked and godly fare alike. But the matter is not so; "no man knows either love or hatred by all that is before them" in this world, by those things that are the objects of sense. These we may know by that which is within us: if we love God with all our heart, thereby we may know that he loves us: as we may know likewise that we are under now less declaring his ultimate conviction than the unbelief or false philosophy which prevailed over him at each stage of his long investigations. Those who think the Preacher here declares his final conclusion overlook the very different maxims which occur farther on. The verse may be rendered, "And I praised merriment; for there is no good to man under the sun, except to eat and to drink, and to rejoice: and this will abide with him the days of his life, which God gives him under the sun."

ix. 1, 2. This chapter carries on the course of thought introduced by the two preceding verses, that men cannot by searching find out God. We may translate thus: "For to all this I gave my heart, and to search out all this, for that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God: as well love as hatred, there is no man who knows all before them. All happens alike to all: one thing befalls the righteous and the wicked, the good and the pure, and the defiled; him that sacrifices, and him that sacrifices not: as his wrath, if we be governed by that carnal mind which is enmity to him. These will be known by that which shall be hereafter, by men's everlasting state. It is certain men are happy or miserable according as they are under the love or hatred of God, but not according as they are under the smiles or frowns of the world: and therefore if God love a righteous man, as certainly he doth, he is happy, though the world frown upon him; and if he hate a wicked man, as certainly he doth, he is miserable, though the world smile upon him. Then is the offence of this promiscuous distribution of events ceased.

Thirdly. Having laid down these principles, he acknowledgeth that "all things come alike to all;" so it has been formerly, and therefore we are not to think it strange if it be so now,—if it be so with us and our families. Some make this, and all that follows to ver. 13, to be the perverse reasonings of the atheists against the doctrine of God's providence; but I rather take it to be Solomon's concession, which he might the more freely make when he had fixed those truths which are sufficient to guard against any ill use that may be made of what he grants. Observe here, ver. 2,

1. The great difference that there is between the characters of the righteous and the wicked, which in several instances are set the one over against the other, to shew that, though "all things come alike to all," yet that doth not in the least confound the eternal distinction between moral good and evil, but that remains immutable. 1st. The righteous are clean, have clean hands, and pure hearts; the wicked are unclean, under the dominion of unclean lusts: pure perhaps in their own eyes, but not cleansed from their filthiness. God will certainly put a difference between the clean and the unclean, the precious and the vile, in the other world, though he doth not seem to do so in this. 2nd. The righteous sacrifice; that is, they make conscience of worshipping God according to his will, both with inward and outward worship. The wicked sacrifice not; they live in the neglect of God's worship, and grudge to part with any thing for his honour; "What is the Almighty that they should serve him?" 3rd. The righteous are good, good in God's sight, they do good in the world; the wicked are sinners, violating the laws of God and man, and provoking to both. 4th. The wicked man swears; has no veneration for the name of God, but profanes it by swearing rashly, and swearing falsely; but the righteous man fears an oath, swears not, but is sworn, and then with great reverence; he fears to take an oath, because it is a solemn appeal to God, as a witness and judge. He fears, when he has taken an oath, to break it, because God is righteous, who taketh vengeance.

2. The little difference there is between the conditions of the righteous and the wicked in this world; there is one event to both. Is David rich? so is Nabal; is Joseph favoured by his prince? so is Haman. One bad event: is Ahab killed in battle? so is Josiah; are the bad figs carried to Babylon? so are the good, Jer. xxiv. 1. There is a vast difference between the original, the design, and the nature of the same event to the one and to the other. The effects and issues of them are likewise vastly different; the same providence to the one is a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death, though to outward appearance it is the same.

Fourthly. He owns this to be a very great grievance to those that are wise and good. "This is an evil," the greatest perplexity, "among all things that are done under the sun," ver. 3. Nothing has given me more disturbance than this, "that there is one event unto all." It hardens atheists, and strengthens the hands of evil-doers; for therefore it is that "the hearts of the sons of men are full of evil," and "fully set in them to do evil," ch. viii. 11. When they see "that there is one event to the righteous and the wicked," they wickedly infer from thence that it is all one to God whether they are righteous or wicked; and therefore they stick at nothing to gratify their lusts.

Fifthly. For the farther clearing of this great difficulty, as he began this discourse with the doctrine of the happiness of the righteous, whatever they may suffer,—they and their works are in the hands of God, and therefore in good hands, they could not be in better,—so he concludes with the doctrine of the misery of the wicked, however they may prosper. "Madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead." Envy not the prosperity of evil-doers; for, 1. They are now madmen, and all the delights they seem to be blessed with are but like the pleasant dreams and fancies of a distracted man. They are mad upon their idols, Jer. l. 38; are mad against God's people, Acts xxvi. 11. When the prodigal repented, it is said he came to himself, Lu. xv. 17, which intimates that he had been beside himself before. 2. They will shortly be dead men. They make a mighty noise and bustle while they live, but after a while they go to the dead, and there is an end of all their pomp and power; they will then be reckoned with for all their madness and outrage in sin. Though on this side death the righteous and the wicked seem alike, on the other side death there will be a vast difference between them.

4 For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope;
For a living dog is better than a dead lion.
5 For the living know that they shall die:
But the dead know not any thing,
Neither have they any more a reward;
For the memory of them is forgotten.
6 Also their love, and their hatred,
And their envy, is now perished;
Neither have they any more a portion for ever
In any thing that is done under the sun.
7 Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy,
And drink thy wine with a merry heart;
For God now accepteth thy works
8 Let thy garments be always white;
And let thy head lack no ointment
9 Live joyfully with the wife
Whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity,
Which he hath given thee under the sun,
All the days of thy vanity:
For that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour
Which thou takest under the sun.
10 Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might:
For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge,
Nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

Solomon, in a fret, had praised the dead more than the living, ch. iv. 2; but here, considering the advantages of life, to prepare for death, and make sure the hope of a better life, he seems to be of another mind.

First. He shews the advantages which the living have above those that are dead, ver. 4—6.

1. While there is life there is hope. Dum spiro spero,—'While I breathe I hope.' It is the privilege of the living that they are "joined to the living," in relation, commerce, and conversation, and while they are so "there is hope." If a man's condition be upon any account bad, there is hope it will be amended; if the heart be full of evil, and madness be in it, yet while there is life there is hope that by the grace of God there may be a blessed change wrought: but after men go to the dead, ver. 3, it is too late then; he that is then filthy will be filthy still, for ever filthy. If men be thrown aside as useless, yet while they are "joined to the living there is hope" that they may yet again take root, and bear fruit. He that is alive is or may be good for something, but he that is dead as to this world is not capable of being any farther serviceable. Therefore "a living dog is better than a dead lion;" that is, the meanest beggar alive has that comfort of this world, and doth that service to it, which the greatest prince, when he is dead, is utterly incapable of.

2. While there is life there is an opportunity of preparing for death. "The living know" that which the dead have no knowledge of; particularly they know that "they shall die," and are or may be thereby influenced to prepare for that great change which will come certainly, and may come suddenly. Note, "The living" cannot but "know that they shall die," that they must needs die; they know they are under a sentence of death; they are already taken into custody of its messengers, and feel themselves declining. This is a needful, useful knowledge; for what is our business while we live but to get ready to die? The living know they shall die; it is a thing yet to come, and therefore provision may be made for it; the dead know they are dead, and it is too late; they are on the other side the great gulf fixed.

3. When life is gone, all this world is gone with it as to us. 1st. There is an end of all our acquaintance with this world, and the things of it; "the dead know not any thing" of that which, while they lived, they were intimately conversant with. It doth not appear that they know any thing of what is done by those they leave behind; "Abraham is ignorant of us," they are removed into darkness, Job x. 22. 2nd. There is an end of all our enjoyments in this world. They have no more a reward for their toils about the world, but all they got must be left to others; they have a reward for their holy actions, but not for their worldly ones; the meats and the belly will be destroyed together, 1no. vi. 27; 1 Cor. vi. 13. It is explained, ver. 6, "Neither have they any more a portion for ever;" none of that which they imagined would be a portion for ever of that which is done and got under the sun. The things of this world will not be a portion for the soul, because they will not be a portion for ever: they that choose them and have them for their good things have only a portion in this life, Ps. xvii. 14. The world can only be an annuity for life, not a portion for ever. 3rd. There is an end of their name. There are but few whose names survive them long; the grave is a land of forgetfulness, for the memory of them that are laid there is soon forgotten; their place knows them no more, nor the lands they called by their own names. 4th. There is an end of their affections, their friendships and enmities. "Their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished;" the good things they loved, the evil things they hated, the prosperity of others which they envied, are now all at an end with them. Death parts those that loved one another, and puts an end to their friendship; and those that hated one another too, and puts an end to their quarrels. Actio moritur cum persona,—'The person and his actions die together.' There we shall be never the better for our friends, their love can do us no kindness; nor ever the worse for our enemies, their hatred and envy can do us no damage; "there the wicked cease from troubling." Those things which now so affect us and fill us, which we are so concerned about and so jealous of, will there be at an end.

Secondly. From hence he infers that it is our wisdom to make the best use of life that we can while it doth last, and manage wisely what remains of it.

1. Let us relish the comfort of life while we live, and cheerfully take our share of the enjoyments of it. Solomon, having been himself ensnared by the abuse of sensitive delights, warns others of the danger, not by a total prohibition of them, but by directing to the sober and moderate use of them. We may use the world, but not abuse it; take what is to be had out of it, and expect no more. Here is,

1st. The particular instances of this cheerfulness prescribed. Thou that art drooping and melancholy, "go thy way," like a fool as thou art, and get into a better temper of mind.

First. Let thy spirit be easy and pleasant; then let there be joy and a merry heart within. A good heart, (so the word is,) which distinguisheth this from carnal mirth and sensual pleasure, which is the evil of the heart, both a symptom and a cause of much evil there. We must enjoy ourselves, enjoy our friends, enjoy our God, and be careful to keep a good conscience, that nothing may disturb us in these enjoyments. We must serve God with gladness in the use of what he gives us, and be liberal in communicating of it to others, and not suffer ourselves to be oppressed with inordinate care and grief about the world. We must eat our bread as Israelites, not in our mourning, Deu. xxvi. 11; as Christians, with gladness and liberality of heart, Acts ii. 46: see Deu. xxviii. 47.

Secondly. Make use of the comforts and enjoyments which God hath given thee. "Eat thy bread, drink thy wine;" thine, not another's; not the bread of deceit, or the wine of violence, but that which is honestly got, else thou canst not eat it with any comfort, nor expect a blessing upon it. Thy bread and thy wine, that is, such as is agreeable to thy place and station, not extravagantly above it, nor sordidly below it. Lay out what God has given thee for the ends for which thou art intrusted with it, as being but a steward.

Thirdly. Evidence thy cheerfulness: ver. 8, "Let thy garments be always white." Observe a proportion in thine expenses, and let the back and the belly each have their just share: pinch not thy belly to feed thy pride, as some do, nor starve thy back to indulge thy luxury, as others do. Be neat, wear clean linen, and be not slovenly. Or, "Let thy garments be white," in token of joy and cheerfulness, which was expressed by white raiment, Rev. iii. 4. And, as a farther token of joy, let "thy head lack no ointment" that is fit for it; our Saviour admitted this piece of pleasure at a feast, Mat. xxvi. 7. And David observes it among the gifts of God's bounty to him, Ps. xxiii. 5, "Thou anointest my head with oil." Not that we must place our happiness in any of the delights of sense, or set our hearts upon them; but what God has given us we must make a comfortable use of as we can afford, under the limitations of sobriety and wisdom, and not forgetting the poor.

Fourthly. Make thyself agreeable to thy relations; "Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest." Do not engross thy delights, making much of thyself only, and not caring what becomes of those about thee, but let them share with thee, and make them easy too. Have a wife, for even in paradise "it the good, so is the sinner; he that swears is as he that fears an oath." See the note on chap. viii. 15.

ix. 4. There is a various reading here, which connects this verse with verse 3: "Who is excepted? to all the living there is hope," &c.

ix. 10. The words "do it with thy might" may signify "do it whilst thou canst," or "art able."

ix. 11. "I returned, and saw" means "and again I saw." "Time and chance" may denote "the time of calamity," or "misfortune."

ix. 13—18. The incidents here recorded may not refer to any particular event, so that we can scarcely call the illustration an anecdote. And yet, as such things have happened, the case adduced is not exactly a parable, as Lord Bacon calls it.

x. 1. "Dead flies:" literally, "flies of death," i.e., either deadly, poisonous flies, or dead flies. It is said that, "especially in hot climates, dead insects cause syrup and other such preparations to ferment and putrify." Dr. Kitto says there is an Arabic proverb, "A was not good for man to be alone." Keep to thy wife, to one, and do not multiply wives. Solomon had found the mischief of that; to her only, and have nothing to do with any other. How can a man live joyfully with one with whom he doth not live honestly? Love thy wife, and the wife whom thou lovest thou wilt be likely to live joyfully with. When we do the duty of relations we may expect the comfort of them: see Pr. v. 19. Live with thy wife, and delight in her society; live joyfully with her, and be most merry when thou art with her. Take pleasure in thy family, thy vine and thine olive plants.

2nd. The qualification necessary to this cheerfulness. Rejoice and have a merry heart. If God now accepteth thy works, if thou art reconciled to God and recommended to him, then thou hast reason to be cheerful; otherwise not, "Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy as other people, for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God," Hos. ix. 1. Our first care must be to make our peace with God, and obtain his favour; to do that which he will accept of, and then go thy way, eat thy bread with joy. Note, Those whose works God has accepted have reason to be cheerful, and ought to be so. Now thou eatest the bread of thy sacrifices with joy, and partakest of the wine of thy drink-offerings with a merry heart, now God accepts thy works; thy religious services, when performed with holy joy, are pleasing to God. He loves to have his servants sing at their work; it proclaims him a good master.

3rd. The reasons for it. Live joyfully; for, First. It is all little enough to make thy passage through this world easy and comfortable. The days of thy life are the days of thy vanity; there is nothing here but trouble and disappointment. Thou wilt have time enough for sorrow and grief when thou canst not help it, and therefore live joyfully while thou canst, and perplex not thyself with thoughts and cares about to-morrow; "sufficient to the day is the evil thereof." Let a gracious serenity of mind be a powerful antidote against the vanity of the world. Secondly. It is all thou canst get from this world; that is thy portion in the things of this life. In God and another life thou shalt have a better portion and a better recompence for thy labours in religion; but for thy pains which thou takest about the things under the sun, this is all thou canst expect, and therefore do not deny this to thyself.

2. Let us apply ourselves to the business of life while life lasts, and so use the enjoyments of it as by them to be fitted for the employments. Therefore, eat with joy and a merry heart; not that thy soul may take its ease, as Lu. xii. 19, but that thy soul may take the more pains, and the joy of the Lord may be its strength, and oil to its wheels; ver. 10, "Whatsoever thy hand finds to do, do it with thy might." Observe here, 1st. That there is not only something to be had, but something to be done, in this life, and the chief good we are to inquire after is the good we should do, Eccl. ii. 3. This is the world of service, that to come is the world of recompence. This is the world of probation and preparation for eternity; we are here upon business and upon our behaviour. 2nd. That opportunity is to direct and quicken duty. That is to be done which our hand finds to do, which occasion calls for; and an active hand will always find something to do that will turn to a good account. What must be done of necessity our hand will here find a price in it for the doing of, Pr. xvii. 16. 3rd. That what good we have an opportunity of doing we must do while we have the opportunity, and do it with our might; with care, and vigour, and resolution, whatever difficulties and discouragements we may meet with in it. Harvest days are busy days, and we must make hay while the sun shines. Serving God and working out our salvation must be done with all that is within us, and all little enough. 4th. There is good reason why we should "work the works of him that sent us while it is day, because the night comes wherein no man can work," Jno. ix. 4. We must up and be doing now with all possible diligence, because our doing-time will be done shortly, and we know not how soon. But this we know, that if the work of life be not done when our time is done, we are undone for ever. "There is no work" to be done, "nor device" to do it, "no knowledge" for speculation, "nor wisdom" for practice, "in the grave whither thou goest." We are all going towards the grave, every day brings us a step nearer it. When we are in the grave it will be too late to mend the errors of life, too late to repent and make our peace with God, too late to lay up any thing in store for eternal life; it must be done now or never. The grave is a land of darkness and silence, and therefore there is no doing any thing for our souls there; it must be done now or never, Jno. xii. 35.

11 I returned, and saw under the sun,
That the race is not to the swift,
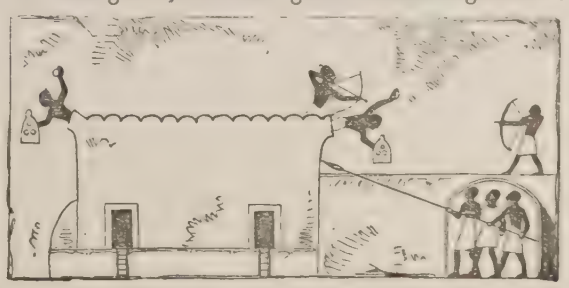
Nor the battle to the strong,
Neither yet bread to the wise,
Nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill;
But time and chance happeneth to them all.

12 For man also knoweth not his time:
As the fishes that are taken in an evil net,

FISHING WITH NETS.

And as the birds that are caught in the snare;
So are the sons of men snared in an evil time,
When it falleth suddenly upon them.

The preacher here, for a farther proof of the vanity of the world, and to convince us that all our works are in the hand of God, and not in our own hand, shews the uncertainty and contingency of future events, and how often they contradict the prospects we have of them. He had exhorted us, ver. 10, to do what we have to do with all our might, but here he reminds us that when we have done all we must leave the issue with God, and not be confident of the success.



First. We are often disappointed of the good we had great hopes of, ver. 11. Solomon had himself made the observation, and so has many a one since, that events, both in public and private affairs, do not always agree even with the most rational prospects and probabilities that there were of them. Nulli fortuna tam dedita est ut multa tentanti ubique respondeat,—'Fortune surrenders herself to no one so as to ensure him success, however numerous his undertakings.'—Seneca. The issue of affairs is oftentimes unaccountably cross to every one's expectation, that the highest may not presume, nor the lowest despair, but all may live in an humble dependence upon God, from whom every man's judgment proceeds.

1. He gives instances of disappointment, even there where means and instruments were most encouraging, and promised fair. 1st. One would think that the lightest of foot should, in running, win the prize, and yet "the race is not" always "to the swift;" some accident happens to retard them, or they are too secure, and therefore remiss, and let those that are slower get the start of them. 2nd. One would think that, in fighting, the most numerous and puissant army should be always victorious, and, in single combat, that the bold and mighty champion should win the laurel; but "the battle is not" always "to the strong." A host of Philistines was once put to flight by Jonathan and his man; "One of you shall chase a thousand." The goodness of the cause has many a time carried the day against the most formidable power. 3rd. One would think that men of sense should be always men of substance, and that those that know how to live in the world should not only have a plentiful maintenance, but get great estates, and yet it doth not always prove so; even "bread is not" always "to the wise," much less "riches" always "to men of understanding." Many ingenious men and men of business, that were likely to thrive in the world, have strangely gone backward and come to nothing. 4th. One would think that those who understand men, and have the art of management, should always get preferment and obtain the smiles of great men; but many ingenious men have been baulked, and have spent their days in obscurity, nay, have fallen into disgrace, and perhaps have ruined themselves by those very methods by which they hoped to have raised themselves, for "favour is not" always "to men of skill," but fools are favoured and wise men frowned upon.

2. He resolves all these disappointments into an overruling power and providence; the disposals of which to us seem casual, and we call them chance, but really they are according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, here called time, in the language of this book, ch. iii. 1; Ps. xxxi. 15. "Time and chance happens to them all." A sovereign providence breaks men's measures, and blasts their hopes, and teacheth them, that "the way of man is not in himself," but subject to the Divine will. We must use means, but not trust to them; if we succeed, we must give God the praise, Ps. xliv. 3; if we be crossed, we must acquiesce in his will, and take our lot.

Secondly. We are often surprised with the evils we were in little fear of; ver. 12, "Man knows not his time," the time of his calamity, his fall, his death, which in Scripture is called our day, and our hour. 1. We know not what troubles are before us, which will take us off our business, and take us out of the world; what time and chance will happen to us, nor what one day or a night may bring forth. It is not for us to know the times, no, not our own time, when or how we shall die. God has in wisdom kept us in the dark that we may be always ready. 2. Perhaps we may meet with trouble in that very thing wherein we promise ourselves the greatest satisfaction and advantage as the fishes and the birds are drawn into the snare and net by the bait that is laid to allure them, which they greedily catch at, so are the sons of men often snared in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them, ere they are aware. And these things too come alike to all. Men often find their bane where they sought their bliss, and catch their death where they thought to have found a prize. Let us therefore never be secure, but always ready for changes, that though they may be sudden, they may be no surprise or terror to us.

13 This wisdom have I seen also under the sun,
And it seemed great unto me:
14 There was a little city, and few men within it;
And there came a great king against it,
And besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it:

BESIEGING A CITY.

15 Now there was found in it a poor wise man,
And he by his wisdom delivered the city;
Yet no man remembered that same poor man.
16 Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength:
Nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised,
And his words are not heard.
17 The words of wise men are heard in quiet
More than the cry of him that ruleth among fools.
18 Wisdom is better than weapons of war:
But one sinner destroyeth much good.

Solomon still recommends wisdom to us as necessary to the preserving of our peace, and the perfecting of our business, notwithstanding the vanities and fly is nothing, yet it creates loathesomeness." Dr. Tristram also says, "The swarms of flies in the East very soon corrupt and destroy any moist unguent or mixture which is not carefully covered from them, and pollute a dish of food in a few minutes." The second clause is difficult to translate, but the Syriac version conveys nearly the correct idea: "A little folly is weightier than wisdom and much glory." It is a fact that folly often has more influence than wisdom, hence the common saying that wisdom is with the minority.

x. 3. The idea is, "When a fool walks in the way, or on the public road, his sense fails him, and he says to everybody, He is a fool." It really seems that he proves himself a fool by proclaiming everybody else one.

x. 4. If your ruler is angry with you, do not proudly quit your post, for mildness allays great offence; or, perhaps, hushes up great transgressions.

x. 6. It is sheer arbitrariness for Dr. Ginsburg to represent the crosses which human affairs are subject to. He had said, ver. 11, that "bread is not always to the wise," yet he would not therefore be thought either to disparage or to discourage wisdom; no, he still sticks to his principle, "that wisdom excels folly as much as light excels darkness," ch. ii. 13. And we ought to love and embrace it, and be governed by it, for the sake of its own intrinsic worth, and the capacity it gives us of being serviceable to others, though we ourselves should not get wealth and preferment by it. This wisdom, that is, this which he here describes, wisdom which enables a man to serve his country, out of pure affection to its interests, when he himself gains no advantage by it, no, not so much as thanks for his pains, or the reputation of it, this is the wisdom which Solomon saith seemed great unto him, ver. 13. A public spirit in a private sphere is wisdom, which those who understand things that differ cannot but look upon as very magnificent.

First. Solomon here gives an instance, which probably was a case in fact in some neighbouring country, of a poor man, that with his wisdom did great service in a time of public distress and danger; ver. 14, "There was a little city," no great prize, whoever was master of it, there were but "few men within it," to defend it; and men, if men of fortitude, are the best fortifications of a city. Here were few men, and because few, feeble and fearful, and ready to give up their city, as not tenable. Against this little city a great king came with a numerous army and besieged it, either in pride and covetousness to possess it, or in revenge for some affront given him, to chastise and destroy it; thinking it stronger than it was, he "built great bulwarks against it," from which to batter it, and doubted not but in a little time to make himself master of it. What a great deal of unjust vexation do ambitious princes give to their harmless neighbours! This great king needed not fear this little city, what need he frighten it then? It would be little profit to him, why then should he put himself to such a great expense to gain it? But, as unreasonably and insatiably greedy as little people sometimes are to "lay house to house, and field to field," great kings often are to lay city to city, and province to province, "that they may be placed alone in the earth," Isa. v. 8. Now, was the victory and success to the strong? No; there was found in this little city, among the few men that were in it, one poor wise man. A wise man, and yet poor, and not preferred to any place of profit or power in the city. Places of trust were not given to men according to their merit and meetness for them, else such a wise man as this had not been a poor man. Now,

1. Being wise, he served the city, though he was poor. In their distress they found him out, Jud. xi. 7, and begged his advice and assistance, "and he by his wisdom delivered the city," either by prudent instructions given to the besieged, directing them to some unthought of stratagem for their own security, or by a prudent treaty with the besiegers, as the woman at Abel, 2 Sam. xx. 16. He did not upbraid them with the contempt they had put upon him in leaving him out of their council, nor tell them he was poor and had nothing to lose, and therefore cared not what became of the city, but did his best for it, and was blessed with success. Note, Private interests and personal resentments must always be sacrificed to the public good, and forgotten when the common welfare is concerned.

2. Being poor, the city slighted him, though he was wise, and had been an instrument to save them all from ruin; "no man remembered that same poor man," his good services were not taken notice of, no recompence was made him, no marks of honour put upon him, but he lived in as much poverty and obscurity as he had done before. Riches were not to this man of understanding, nor favour to this man of skill. Many that have well merited of their prince and country have been ill paid; such an ungrateful world do we live in. It is well useful men have a God to trust to, who will be their bountiful rewarder; for among men great services are often envied, and rewarded with evil for good.

Secondly. From this instance he draws some useful inferences; looks upon it and receives instruction.

1. Hence he observes the great usefulness and excellency of wisdom, and what a blessing it makes men to their country: "Wisdom is better than strength," ver. 16. A prudent mind, which is the honour of a man, is to be preferred before a robust body, in which many of the brute creatures excel man. A man may by his wisdom effect that which he could never compass by his strength; and may overcome those by outwitting them that are able to overpower him. Nay, "wisdom is better than weapons of war," offensive or defensive, ver. 18. Wisdom, that is religion and piety, (for the wise man is here opposed to a sinner,) this is better than all military endowments or accoutrements, for it will engage God for us, and then we are safe in the greatest perils, and successful in the greatest enterprises. If God be for us, who can be against us, or stand before us?

2. Hence, he observes, the commanding force and power of wisdom, though it labour under external disadvantages; ver. 17, "The words of wise men are heard in quiet," that is, what they speak being rational and to the purpose, being spoken calmly, and with deliberation,—though not being rich and in authority, they dare not speak loud, nor with any great assurance,—yet it will be hearkened to and regarded; will gain respect, nay, will gain the point, and sway with men more than the imperious, passionate clamours of him that ruleth among fools, who, like fools, choose him to be their ruler for his noise and blustering, and, like fools, think he must by those methods carry the day with every body else. A few close arguments are worth a great many big words. And those will strike sail to fair reasoning who will answer them that bounce and hector according to their folly. "How forcible are right words!" What is spoken wisely should be spoken calmly, and then it will be heard in quiet, and calmly considered. But passion will lessen the force even of reason, instead of adding any force to it.

3. Hence he observes that wise and good men, notwithstanding this, must often content themselves with the satisfaction of having done good, or at least endeavoured it, and offered at it, when they cannot do the good they would do, nor have the praise they should have. Wisdom capacitates a man to serve his neighbours, and he offers his service; but, alas, if he be poor his "wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard," ver. 16. Many a man is buried alive in poverty and obscurity, that, if he had but fitting encouragement given him, might be a great blessing to the world. Many a pearl is lost in its shell. But there is a day coming when wisdom and goodness shall be in honour, and the righteous shall shine forth.

4. From what he had observed of the great good which one wise and virtuous man may do, he infers what a great deal of mischief one wicked man may do, and what a great deal of good he may be the hindrance of. "One sinner destroys much good." 1st. As to himself; a sinful condition is a wasteful condition. How many of the good gifts both of nature and providence doth one sinner destroy and make waste of! Good sense, good parts, good learning, a good disposition, a good estate, good meat, good drink, and abundance of God's good creatures, all made use of in the service of sin, and so destroyed and lost, and the end of giving them frustrated and perverted! He that destroys his own soul destroys much good. 2nd. As to others; what a great deal of mischief may one wicked man do in a town or country! One sinner, that makes it his business to debauch others, may defeat and frustrate the intentions of a great many good laws, and a great deal of good preaching, and draw many into his pernicious ways. One sinner may be the ruin of a town, as one Achan troubled the whole camp of Israel. The wise man that delivered the city had had his due respect and recompence for it, but that some one sinner hindered it, and invidiously diminished the service. And many a good project well laid for the public welfare has been destroyed by some one subtle adversary to it. The wisdom of some would have healed the nation, but through the wickedness of a few it would not be healed. See who are a kingdom's friends and enemies, if one saint doth much good, and "one sinner destroys much good."

CHAPTER X.

This chapter seems to be, like Solomon's proverbs, a collection of wise sayings and observations, rather than a part of his sermon; but the preacher studied to be sententious and set in order many proverbs to be brought in in his preaching; yet the general scope of all the observations in this chapter is to recommend wisdom to us, and its precepts and rules, as of great use for the right ordering of our conversation, and to caution us against folly. I. He recommends wisdom to private persons that are in an inferior station. 1. It is our wisdom to preserve our reputation in managing our affairs dexterously, ver. 1—3; 2. To be submissive to our superiors, if at any time we have offended them, ver. 4; 3. To live quiet and peaceable lives, and not to meddle with those that are factious and seditious, and are endeavouring to disturb the government and the public repose; the folly and danger of which disloyal, turbulent practices, he shews, ver. 8—11; 4. To govern our tongues well, ver. 12—15; 5. To be diligent in our business, and provide well for our families, ver. 18, 19; 6. Not to speak ill of our rulers, no, not in secret, ver. 20. II. He recommends wisdom to rulers; let not them think that, because their subjects must be quiet under them, therefore they may do what they please; no, but, 1. Let them be careful whom they prefer to places of trust and power, ver. 5—7; 2. Let them manage themselves discreetly, be generous and not childish, temperate and not luxurious, ver. 16, 17. And happy nation when princes and people make conscience of their duty according to these rules.

DEAD flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour:
So doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.
2 A wise man's heart is at his right hand;
But a fool's heart at his left
3 Yea also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way,
His wisdom faileth him,
And he saith to every one that he is a fool.

In these verses Solomon shews,

First. What great need wise men have to take heed of being guilty of any instance of folly; for "a little folly" is a great blemish "to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour," and is as hurtful to his good name, as dead flies are to a sweet perfume, not only spoiling the sweetness of it, but making it "to send forth a stinking savour." Note, 1. True wisdom is true honour, and will gain a man a reputation, which is like a box of precious ointment, pleasing, and very valuable. 2. The reputation that is hardly got, and by a great deal of wisdom, may be easily lost, and by a little folly; because envy fastens upon eminency, and makes the worst of the mistakes and miscarriages of those that are cried up for wisdom, and improves them to their disadvantage; so that the folly, which in another would not be taken notice of, in them is severely censured. Those that make a great profession of religion have need to walk very circumspectly, to abstain from all appearances of evil, and approaches towards it, because many eyes are upon them that watch for their halting; their character is soon sullied, and they have a great deal of reputation to lose.

Secondly. What a deal of advantage a wise man has above a fool in the management of business; ver. 2, "A wise man's heart is at his right hand," so that he goes about his business with dexterity, turns his hand readily to it, and goes through it with despatch; his counsel and courage are ready to him whenever he has occasion for them; "but a fool's heart is at his left hand," it is always to seek when he has any thing to do that is of importance, and therefore goes awkwardly about it, like a man that is left handed, and is soon at a loss, and at his wit's end.

Thirdly. How apt fools are at every turn to proclaim their own folly, and expose themselves. He that is either witless or graceless, either silly or wicked, if he be never so little from under the check, and left to himself, if he but "walk by the way," soon shews what he is, "his wisdom fails him," and by some indecent, ill carriage or other, "he saith to every one he meets that he is a fool," ver. 3, that is, he discovers it as plainly as if he had told them so. He cannot conceal it, and he is not ashamed of it. Sin is the reproach of sinners wherever they go.

4 If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee,
Leave not thy place;
For yielding pacifieth great offences
5 There is an evil which I have seen under the sun,
As an error which proceedeth from the ruler:
6 Folly is set in great dignity,
And the rich sit in low place.
7 I have seen servants upon horses,
And princes walking as servants upon the earth.
8 He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it;
And whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him.
9 Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith;
And he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby.
10 If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge,
Then must he put to more strength:
But wisdom is profitable to direct.
11 Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment;
And a babbler is no better.

word "folly" by "a great fool," for it is evident that the literal rendering makes good English and good sense, although it is plain that folly here refers to mere unworthiness and incompetency.

x. 8, 9. A serpent shall bite the man that breaks down a stone fence. The idea is similar to the prohibition against removing old landmarks, and forbids encroachments. In the next verse the removal of landmarks may be more clearly alluded to, and also the unauthorised cutting down of timber We cannot suppose that the Preacher refers only to the risks run by labourers at such work as digging pits, throwing down walls, &c. All these things are the starting-points of wise reflections.

x. 10. This verse means to say that what men are called to do should be done with proper instruments in the best condition. If edged tools are not sharpened when they are blunt, they will require more power to use them. The exercise of wisdom is the most advantageous thing in all causes, and reliance on force alone the worst.

The scope of these verses is to keep subjects loyal and dutiful to the government. In Solomon's reign the people were very rich, and lived in prosperity, which perhaps made them proud and petulant; and when the taxes were high, though they had enough to pay them with, it is probable many carried it insolently towards the government, and threatened to rebel. To such Solomon here gives some necessary cautions.

First. Let not subjects carry on a quarrel with their prince upon any private personal disgust; ver. 4, "If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee," if upon some misinformation given him, or some mismanagement of thine, he is displeased at thee, and threatens thee, yet "leave not thy place," forget not the duty of a subject, revolt not from thine allegiance, do not in a passion quit thy post in his service, and throw up thy commission, as despairing ever to regain his favour. No, wait a while, and thou wilt find he is not implacable, but that yielding pacifies great offences." Solomon speaks for himself, and for every wise and good man, that is a master or magistrate, that he could easily forgive those upon their submission, whom yet upon their provocation he had been very angry with. It is safer and better to yield to an angry prince than to contend with him.

Secondly. Let not subjects commence a quarrel with their prince, though the public administration be not in every thing as they would have it. He grants "there is an evil often seen under the sun," and it is a king's-evil, an evil which the king only can cure, for "it is an error which proceedeth from the ruler," ver. 5. It is a mistake which rulers, consulting their personal affections more than the public interests, are too often guilty of, that men are not preferred according to their merit, but "folly is set in great dignity;" men of shattered brains, and broken fortunes, are put in places of power and trust, "while the rich" men, of good sense and good estates, whose interest would oblige them to be true to the public, and whose abundance would be likely to set them above temptations to bribery and extortion, yet "sit in low place," and can get no preferment, ver. 6. Either the ruler knows not how to value them, or the terms of preferment are such as they cannot in conscience comply with. It is ill with a people when vicious men are advanced, and men of worth are kept under hatches. This is illustrated, ver. 7, "I have seen servants upon horses," men not so much of mean extraction and education,—if that were all, it were the more excusable, nay, there is many "a wise servant" who, with good reason, "hath rule over a son that causeth shame,"—but of sordid, servile, mercenary dispositions; I have seen these riding in pomp and state, as princes, "while princes," men of noble birth and qualities, fit to rule a kingdom, have been forced to "walk as servants upon the earth," poor and despised, and little regarded. Thus God in his providence punisheth a wicked people; but, as far as it is the ruler's act and deed, it is certainly his error, and a great evil; a grievance to the subject, and very provoking. But it is "an error under the sun," which will certainly be rectified above the sun, and when it shall shine no more; for in heaven it is only wisdom and holiness that is set in great dignity. But if the prince be guilty of this error, yet let not the subjects leave their place, nor rise up against the government, nor form any project for the alteration of it; nor let the prince carry on the humour too far, nor set such servants, such beggars, on horseback, as will ride furiously over the ancient landmarks of the constitution, and threaten the subverting of it.

1. Let neither prince nor people violently attempt any changes, nor make a forcible entry upon a national settlement, for they will both find it of dangerous consequence; which he shews here by four similitudes, the scope of which is to give us a caution not to meddle to our own hurt. Let not princes invade the rights and liberties of their subjects; let not subjects mutiny and rebel against their princes; for, 1st. "He that digs a pit" for another, it is ten to one "falls into it" himself, and his violent dealing returns upon his own head. If princes become tyrants, or subjects become rebels, all histories will tell both what is like to be their fate, and that it is at their utmost peril, and it were better for both to be content within their own bounds. 2nd. "Whoso breaks a hedge," an old hedge, that has long been a landmark, let him expect that "a serpent," or adder, such as use to harbour in rotten hedges, "will bite him;" some viper or other will fasten upon his hand, Acts xxviii. 2. God by his ordinance, as by a hedge, hath inclosed the prerogatives and powers of princes, their persons are under his special protection; those therefore that form any treasonable designs against their peace, their crown and dignity, are but twisting halters for themselves. 3rd. "Whoso removeth stones," to pull down a wall, or building, doth but pluck them upon himself; he "shall be hurt therewith," and will wish he had let them alone. Those that go about to alter a well-modelled, well-settled government, under colour of redressing some grievances, and correcting some amisses in it, will quickly perceive not only that it is easier to find fault than mend, to demolish that which is good than to build up that which is better, but that they thrust their own fingers into the fire, and pull an old house about their ears. 4th. "He that cleaveth wood," especially if, as it follows, he hath sorry tools, ver. 10, he "shall be endangered thereby," the chips will fly in his face, or his own axe-head. If we meet with knotty pieces of timber, men of perverse and ungovernable spirits, and we think to master them by force and violence, and hew them to pieces, they may not only prove too hard for us, but the attempt may turn to our own damage.

2. Rather let both prince and people carry it to each other with prudence, and mildness, and good temper. "Wisdom is profitable to direct" the ruler how to manage a people that are inclined to be turbulent, so as neither, on the one hand, by a supine negligence, to embolden and encourage them, nor on the other hand, by rigour and severity, to exasperate and provoke them, to any seditious practices. It is likewise profitable to direct the subjects how to carry themselves towards a prince that is inclined to bear hard upon them, so as not to alienate his affections from them, but to win upon him by humble remonstrances, (not insolent demands, such as the people made upon Rehoboam,) by patient submissions, and peaceable expedients. The same rule is to be observed in all relations, for the preserving of the comfort of them. Let wisdom direct to gentle methods, and forbear violent ones. Thus one wise, and both happy. 1st. Wisdom will teach us to whet the tool we are to make use of, rather than by leaving it blunt oblige ourselves to put to so much the more strength, ver. 10. We might save ourselves a great deal of labour, and prevent a great deal of danger, if we did whet before we cut, that is, consider and premeditate what is fit to be said and done in every difficult case, that we may accommodate ourselves to it, and may do our work smoothly and easily, both to others and to ourselves. Wisdom will direct how to sharpen and put an edge upon both ourselves and those we employ; not to work deceitfully, Ps. lii. 2, but to work clean and cleverly. The mower loses no time when he is whetting his scythe. 2nd. Wisdom will teach us to enchant the serpent we are to contend with, rather than think to out-hiss it, ver. 11. The serpent will bite, if he be not by singing and music charmed and enchanted, against which therefore he stops his ears, Ps. lviii. 4, 5; "and a babbler is no better" to all those that enter the lists with him, who therefore must not think by dint of words to out-talk him, but by prudent management to enchant him. 'He that is lord of the tongue,' (so the phrase is,) that is, a ruler that has liberty of speech, and may say what he will, it is as dangerous dealing with him as with a serpent uncharmed; but if you use the enchantment of a mild and humble submission you may be safe and out of danger. Herein wisdom, the meekness of wisdom, is profitable to direct. "By long forbearing is a prince persuaded," Pr. xxv. 15. Jacob enchanted Esau with a present, and Abigail, David. To those that may say any thing it is wisdom to say nothing that is provoking.

12 The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious;
But the lips of a fool will swallow up himself.
13 The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness;
And the end of his talk is mischievous madness.
14 A fool also is full of words:
A man cannot tell what shall be;
And what shall be after him, who can tell him?
15 The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them,
Because he knoweth not how to go to the city.

Solomon having shewed the benefit of wisdom, and of what great advantage it is to us in the conduct of our affairs, here shews the mischief of folly, and how it exposeth men, which perhaps comes in as a reflection upon those rulers who set folly in great dignity.

First. Fools talk a great deal to no purpose, and they shew their folly as much by the multitude, impertinence, and mischievousness of their words as by any thing; whereas "the words of a wise man's mouth are gracious," are grace, manifest grace in his heart, and minister grace to the hearers, are good, and such as become him, and do good to all about him. "The lips of a fool" not only expose him to reproach, and make him ridiculous, but "will swallow up himself," and bring him to ruin, by provoking the government to take cognizance of his seditious talk, and call him to an account for it. Adonijah foolishly spoke against his own life, 1 Kin. ii. 23. Many a man has been sunk by having his own tongue fall upon him, Ps. lxiv. 8. See what a fool's talk is.

1. It takes rise from his own weakness and wickedness. "The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness," the foolishness bound up in his heart, that is the corrupt spring from which all these polluted streams flow; the evil treasure out of which evil things are brought. As soon as he begins to speak, you may perceive his folly; at the very first he talks idly, and passionately, and like himself.

2. It riseth up to fury, and tends to the hurt and injury of others. "The end of his talk," the end it comes to, "is madness;" he will presently talk himself into an indecent heat, and break out into the wild extravagances of a distracted man. The end it aims at is mischief. As at first he appeared to have little government of himself, so at last it appears he has a great deal of malice to his neighbours. That root of bitterness bears gall and wormwood. Note, It is not strange if those that begin foolishly end madly; for an ungoverned tongue, the more liberty is allowed it, the more violent it grows.

3. It is all the same over and over; ver. 14, "A fool also is full of words," a passionate fool especially, that runs on endlessly, and never knows when to take up; he will have the last word, though it be but the same with that which was the first. What is wanting in the weight and strength of his words he endeavours in vain to make up in the number of them; and they must be repeated, because otherwise there is nothing in them to make them regarded. Note, Many that are empty of sense are full of words, and the least solid are the most noisy. The following words may be taken either, 1st. As checking him for his vainglorious bragging in the multitude of his words, what he will do and what he will have, not considering that which everybody knows, that "a man cannot tell what shall be" in his own time, while he lives, Pr. xxvii. 1, much less can any one tell what shall be after him, when he is dead and gone. Would we duly consider our own ignorance of, and uncertainty about, future events, that would cut off a great many of the idle words we foolishly multiply. Or, 2nd. As mocking him for his tautologies. He is full of words; for if he do but speak the most trite and common thing, "A man cannot tell what shall be," because he loves to hear himself talk, he will say it again, "What shall be after him, who can tell him?" like Battus in Ovid, ——— Sub illis,

Montibus (inquit) erant, et erant sub montibus illis,—
'Under those mountains were they,
They were under those mountains, I say.'

Whence vain repetitions are called battologies, Mat. vi. 7.

Secondly. Fools toil a great deal to no purpose; ver. 15, "The labour of the foolish" to accomplish their designs, "wearieth every one of them;" that is, 1. They weary themselves in that labour which is very foolish and absurd. All their labour is for the world, and the body, and the meat that perisheth; and in this labour they spend their strength, and exhaust their spirits, and "weary themselves for very vanity," Hab. ii. 13; Isa. lv. 2. They choose that service which is perfect drudgery rather than that which is perfect liberty. 2. That labour which is necessary, and would be profitable, and might be gone through with ease, yet wearies them, because they go about it awkwardly and foolishly, and so make their business a toil to them, which, if they applied themselves to it prudently, would be a pleasure to them. Many complain of the labours of religion as grievous, which they would have no reason to complain of, if the exercises of Christian piety were always under the direction of Christian prudence. The foolish tire themselves in endless pursuits, and never bring any thing to pass, "because they know not how to go to the city;" that is, because they have not capacity to apprehend the plainest thing, such as the entrance into a great city is, where one would think it were impossible for a man to miss his road. Men's imprudent management of their business robs them both of the comfort and of the benefit of it. But it is the excellency of the way to the heavenly city that it is a highway, in which the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err, Isa. xxxv. 8; yet sinful folly makes men miss that way.

And thy princes eat in due season,
For strength, and not for drunkenness!

x. 11. Explain this, "If the serpent will bite because not (or while not) charmed, then the charmer has no advantage." A serpent which is not charmed would bite a serpent-charmer as soon as any one else.

x. 12. A wise man's words win him favour, but a fool's words ruin him.

x. 14. Translate, "And a fool multiplies words: when man knows not what shall be, and shall be after him, who can tell him?"

x. 16. Feasting early in the day is wrong, because it prevents attention to duty.

x. 19. The sense may be, "They use for merriment bread and wine, which gladdens life; and money procures everything."

20 Curse not the king, no not in thy thought;
And curse not the rich in thy bedchamber;
For a bird of the air shall carry the voice,
And that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

Solomon here observes,

First. How much the happiness of a land depends upon the character of its rulers. It is well or ill with the people according as the princes are good or bad.

1. The people cannot be happy when their princes are childish and voluptuous; ver. 16, "Woe unto thee, O land," even the land of Canaan itself, though otherwise the glory of all lands, "when thy king is a child," not so much in age (Solomon himself was young when his kingdom was happy in him as in understanding. When the prince is weak and foolish as a child, fickle and fond of [illegible] and [illegible], easily imposed upon, and hardly brought to reason, it is ill with the people. The body staggers if the head be giddy. Perhaps Solomon wrote this with a fore-sight of his son Rehoboam's ill conduct, 2 Chr. xii. 7. He was a child all the days of his life, and his family and kingdom fared the worse for it. Nor is it much better with a people when their "princes eat in the morning," that is, make a god of their belly, and make themselves slaves to their appetites. If the king himself be a child, yet if the counsellors and privy councellors are wise and faithful, and apply themselves to business, the land may do well enough; but if they addict themselves to their pleasures, and prefer the gratifications of the flesh before the despatch of the public business, which they divert themselves for by eating and drinking in a morning,—when princes are epicures, and do not eat to live, but live to eat,—what good can a nation expect?

2. The people cannot but be happy when their rulers are generous and active, sober and temperate, and men of business, ver. 17. The land is then blessed. 1st. When the sovereign is governed by principles of honour, "when the king is the son of nobles;" that is, acted and animated by a noble spirit, which scorns to do a base thing, and unbecoming so high a character; which is solicitous for the public welfare, and prefers that before any private interests. Wisdom, and virtue, and the fear of God, beneficence, and a readiness to do good to all mankind, these ennoble the royal blood. 2nd. When the subordinate magistrates are more in care to discharge their trusts than to gratify their appetites; when they "eat in due season," that is, when they have despatched their business and got them a stomach. God gives the creatures their meat in due season, Ps. cxlv. 15; let not us take ours unseasonably, lest we lose the comfort of seeing God give it us. When they eat "for strength," that their bodies may be fitted to serve their souls in the service of God and their country, "and not for drunkenness," to make themselves unfit to do any thing either for God or man; and particularly to sit in judgment, for they will err through wine, Isa. xxviii. 7, will drink and forget the law, Pr. xxxi. 5. It is well with a people when their princes are examples of temperance, when those that have most to spend upon themselves yet know how to deny themselves.

Secondly. Of what ill consequence slothfulness is both to private and public affairs; ver. 18, "By much slothfulness, and idleness of the hands," the neglect of business, and the love of ease and pleasure, "the building decays," drops through first, and by degrees drops down. If it be not kept well covered, and care be not taken to repair the breaches, as any happen, it will rain in, and the timber will rot, and the house will become unfit to dwell in. It is so with the family and the affairs of it. If men cannot find in their hearts to take pains in their callings, to tend their shops, and look after their own business, they will soon run in debt, and go behindhand, and instead of making what they have more, for their children, will make it less. It is so with the public, if the king be a child, and will take no care. If the princes eat in the morning, and will take no pains, the affairs of the nation suffer loss, and its interests are prejudiced; its honour sullied, its power weakened, its borders encroached upon, the course of justice obstructed, the treasure exhausted, and all its foundations out of course: and all this through the slothfulness and self-seeking of those that should be the "repairers of its breaches, and the restorers of paths to dwell in," Isa. lviii. 12.

Thirdly. How industrious generally all are, both princes and people, to get money, whereas that serves for all purposes, ver. 19. He seems to prefer money before mirth: "A feast is made for laughter," not merely for eating, but chiefly for pleasant conversation and the sweetness of friendship; not the laughter of the fool, which is madness, but that of wise men, by which they fit themselves for business and severe studies. Spiritual feasts are made for spiritual delight, holy joy in God. Wine maketh merry, makes glad the life; but money is the measure of all things, and answers all things. Pecunia omnia orbis.—'Money commands all things.' Though wine make merry, it will not be a house for us, nor a bed, nor clothing, nor provisions, and portions for children; but money, if men have enough of it, will be all these. The feast cannot be made without money, and though men have wine, they are not much disposed to be merry, unless they have money for the necessary supports of life. Money of itself answers nothing, it will neither feed nor clothe; but as it is the instrument of commerce, it answers all the occasions of this present life: what is to be had may be had for money, but it answers nothing to the soul: it will not procure the pardon of sin, the favour of God, the peace of conscience. The soul, as it is not redeemed, so it is not maintained, with corruptible things, as silver and gold. Some refer this to rulers. It is ill with the people when they give up themselves to luxury and riot, feasting and making merry, not only because their business is neglected, but because money must be had to answer all these things, and, in order to that, the people squeezed by heavy taxes.

Fourthly. How cautious subjects have need to be, that they harbour not any disloyal purposes in their minds, nor keep up any factious cabals or consultations against the government; because it is ten to one they are discovered and brought to light, ver. 20. Though rulers should be guilty of some errors, yet let not their subjects arraigning their administration, and running them down, make the most of them. Here, 1. The command teacheth us our duty; "curse not the king, no not in thy thought;" do not wish ill to the government in thy mind. All evil begins there, and therefore the first risings of it must be curbed and suppressed, and particularly that of treason and sedition. "Curse not the rich," the princes and governors, "in thy bedchamber," in a conclave or cabal of private disaffected persons to the government; associate not with such, "come not into their secret," join not with them in speaking ill of the government, or plotting ill against it. 2. The reason expresses our safety. Though the design be carried on never so closely, "a bird of the air shall carry the voice" to the king, who has many more ways of coming to the knowledge of things than we are aware of, "and that which has wings shall tell the matter," by one instrument or another. God sees what men do, and hears what they say to secret, and when he pleaseth he can bring it to light by strange and unexpected ways. "Wouldst thou then not be hurt" by the powers that be, nor be afraid of them, "do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: but if thou do that which is evil, be afraid," Rom. xiii. 3, 4.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter we have, 1. A pressing exhortation to works of charity and bounty to the poor, as the best cure of the vanity which our worldly riches are subject to, and the only way of making them turn to a substantial good account, ver. 1—6. 11. A serious admonition to prepare for death and judgment, and to begin betimes, even in the days of our youth to do so, ver. 7—10.

CAST thy bread upon the waters:
For thou shalt find it after many days.
2 Give a portion to seven, and also to eight;
For thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.
3 If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth:
And if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north,
In the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be.
4 He that observeth the wind shall not sow;
And he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap.
5 As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit,
Nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: [all.
Even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh
6 In the morning sow thy seed,

GARDENERS PLANTING AND SOWING.

And in the evening withhold not thine hand:
For thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this
Or whether they both shall be alike good [or that,

Solomon had often in this book pressed it upon rich people to take the comfort of their riches themselves; here he presseth it upon them to do good to others with them, and to abound in liberality to the poor, which will another day abound to our account. Observe,

First. How the duty itself is recommended to us, ver. 1.

1. "Cast thy bread upon the waters." Thy bread-corn upon the low places, so some understand it, alluding to the husbandman, who goes forth bearing precious seed, sparing bread-corn from his family for his sowing, knowing that without that he can have no harvest another year. Thus the charitable man takes from his bread-corn for seed-corn, abridgeth himself to supply the poor, that he may sow beside all waters, Isa. xxxii. 20, because as he sows he must reap, Gal. vi. 7. We read of "the harvest of the river," Isa. xxiii. 3. Waters in Scripture are put for multitudes, Rev. xvii. 5; and there are multitudes of poor,—we do not want objects of charity; and for mourners,—the poor are men of sorrows. Thou must give bread, the necessary supports of life; not only give good words, but good things, Isa. lviii. 7. It must be thy bread, that which is honestly got; it is no charity but injury to give that which is none of our own to give. First do justly, and then love mercy. Thy bread which thou dost design for thyself, let the poor have a share with thee, as they had with Job, ch. xxxi. 17. Give freely to the poor, though it may seem thrown away and lost, as that which is cast upon the waters. Send it a voyage, send it a venture, as merchants that trade by sea. Trust it upon the waters, it shall not sink.

2. "Give a portion to seven, and also to eight;" that is, be free and liberal in works of charity. 1st. Give much, if thou hast much to give: not a pittance, but a portion: not a bit or two, but a mess, a meal: give a large dole, not a sneaking one: give good measure, Lu. vi. 38. Be generous in giving, as they were when on festival days they sent portions to them for whom nothing was prepared, Neh. viii. 10. worthy portions. 2nd. Give to many, "to seven, and also to eight." If thou meet with seven objects of charity, give to them all, and then if thou meet not only with an eighth, give to that, but with eight more, give to them all too. Excuse not thyself with the good thou hast done, from the good thou hast farther to do, but hold on and mend. In hard times, when the number of the poor increaseth, let thy charity be proportionably enlarged. God is rich in mercy to all; to us though unworthy, he gives liberally, and upbraids not with former gifts, and we must be merciful as our heavenly Father is.

Secondly. The reasons with which it is pressed upon us. Consider,

1. Our reward for well-doing is very certain. Though thou cast it upon the waters, and it seem lost, thou thinkest thou hast given thy good word with it, and are never like to hear of it again, yet "thou shalt find it after many days," as the husbandman finds his seed again in a plentiful harvest, and the merchant his venture in a rich return. It is not lost, but well laid out, and well laid up; it brings in full interest in the present gifts of God's providence, and graces and comforts of his Spirit; and the principal is sure, laid up in heaven, for it is lent to the Lord. Seneca, a heathen, could say, Nihil magis possidere me credimus, quam bene donatum.—'I possess nothing so completely as that which I have given away.' Hoc habeo quodcunque dedi: hæ sunt divitiæ certæ in quemcunque casitis humanæ leritate.—'Whatever I have imparted I still possess: those riches remain with me through all the vicissitudes of life.' "Thou shalt find it," perhaps not quickly, but "after many days;" the return may be slow, but it is sure.

it unto thee with a happy increase." The common idea that the allusion is to sowing rice in the water is untenable.

xi. 4 The husbandman must do his work at the proper time, and not wait for wind and weather. So, generally, men must do their duty, and not delay till they are sure no accidents will happen.

xi. 5. For "spirit" we should understand "wind."

xi. 8 "For if a man live many years, let him rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness, for they will be many."

xii. 2—6. It is generally allowed that these verses contain a series of metaphors pointing to future trials in man's life, and specially to old age and death: but there are two modes of understanding them. Most writers admit the difficulty of applying some of the images; but according to one class they have a separate reference to the successive decay of men's powers, while another treats them as a group of phenomena portending a coming storm. The one say that sun, light, moon, stars, &c., are put for various and will be so much the more plentiful. Wheat, the most valuable grain, lies longest in the ground. Long voyages make best returns.

2. Our opportunity for well-doing is very uncertain. "Thou knowest not what evil may be upon the earth," which may deprive thee of thine estate, and put thee out of a capacity to do good, and therefore, while thou hast wherewithal, be liberal with it; improve the present season, as the husbandman in sowing his ground before the frost comes. We have reason to expect evil upon the earth, for we are born to trouble: what the evil may be we know not, but, that we may be ready for it, whatever it is, it is our wisdom in the day of prosperity to be in good, to be doing good. Many make use of this as an argument against giving to the poor, because they know not what hard times may come, when they may want themselves; whereas we should therefore the rather be charitable in that when evil days come, we may have the comfort of having done good while we were able; we would then hope to find mercy both with God and man, and therefore should now shew mercy. If by charity we trust God with what we have, we put it into good hands against bad times.

Thirdly, How he obviates the objections which might be made against this duty, and the excuses of the uncharitable.

1. Some will say what they have is their own, and they have it for their own use, and why then should they cast it thus upon the waters? Why should I take my bread, and my flesh, and give it to I know not who, as Nabal pleaded, 1 Sam. xxv. 11. Look up, man, and consider how soon thou wouldst be starved in a barren ground, "if the clouds" over thy head should plead thus, that they have their waters for themselves; but rain sweet, when they are "full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth," to make it fruitful till they are wearied and spent with watering it, Job xxxvii. 11. Are the heavens thus bountiful to the poor earth, that is so far below them, and wilt thou grudge thy bounty to thy poor brother, that is none of thy home? Or thus: some will say, though they give but little to the poor, yet they thank God they have as charitable a heart as any. Nay, saith Solomon, "if the clouds be full of rain, they will empty themselves." If there be charity in the heart, it will shew itself, Jas. ii. 15, 16. He that draws out his soul to the hungry, will reach forth his hand to them, as he has ability.

2. Some will say their sphere of usefulness is low and narrow, they cannot do the good that they see others can who are in more public stations, and therefore they will sit still and do nothing; Nay, saith he, "In the place where the tree falls," or happens to lie, "there it shall lie," for the benefit of those to whom it belongs: that is, every man must labour to be a blessing to that place, whatever it is, where the providence of God casts him. Wherever we are, we may find good work to do, if we have but hearts to do it. Or thus: some will say, there are many that present themselves as objects of charity who are unworthy, and I do not know whom it is fit to give to. Trouble not thyself about that, saith Solomon, give as discreetly as thou canst, and then be satisfied that, though the person should prove undeserving of thy charity, yet if thou give it with an honest heart, thou shalt not lose thy reward. Which way soever the charity is directed, north or south, thine shall be the benefit of it. This is commonly applied to death; therefore let us be good, and, as good trees, bring forth the fruits of righteousness, because death will shortly come and lay us down, and we shall then be determined to an unchangeable state of happiness or misery, according to what was done in the body. As the tree falls at death, so it is like to lie to all eternity.

3. Some will object the many discouragements they have met with in their charity. They have been reproached for it as proud and pharisaical: they have but little to give, and they shall be despised if they do not give as others do; they know not but their children may come to want it, and they had better lay it up for them; they have taxes to pay, and purchases to make; they know not what use will be made of their charity, nor what construction will be put upon it. These, and a hundred such objections, he answers in one word, ver. 4, "He that observeth the wind shall not sow," which signifies doing good, "and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap," which signifies getting good. If we stand thus magnifying every little difficulty, and making the worst of it, starting objections, and fancying hardship and danger where there is none, we shall never go on much less do any work, nor make any thing of it. If the husbandman should decline or leave off sowing for the sake of every flying cloud, and reaping for the sake of every blast of wind, he would make but an ill payment of his husbandry at the year's end. The duties of religion are as necessary as sowing and reaping, and will turn as much to our own advantage. The discouragements we meet with in these duties are but as winds and clouds, which will do us no harm, and which those that put on a little courage and resolution will despise and easily break through. Note, Those that will be deterred and driven off by small and seeming difficulties from great and real duties, will never bring any thing to pass in religion; for there will always arise some wind, some cloud or other, at least in our own imagination, to discourage us. Winds and clouds are in God's hand, are designed to try us, and our Christianity obliges us to endure hardness.

4. Some will say they do not see in which way what they expend in charity should ever be made up to them, they do not find themselves ever the richer; why should they depend upon the general promise of a blessing on the charitable, unless they saw which way to expect the operation of it? To this he answers, "Thou knowest not the work of God," nor is it fit thou shouldst. Thou mayest be sure he will make good his word of promise, though he doth not tell thee how or which way, and though he work in a way by himself, according to the unsearchableness of his unsearchable wisdom. He will work and none shall hinder, but then, he will work and none shall direct or prescribe to him. The blessing shall work insensibly, but irresistibly. God's work shall certainly agree with his word, whether we see it or no. Our ignorance of the work of God he shews in two instances. 1st. We know "not what is the way of the Spirit." Of the wind, so some; we know not whence it comes, or whither it goes, nor when it will turn; yet the seamen lie ready waiting for it till it turn one way about in favour of them; so we must be in our duty in expectation of the time appointed for the blessing. Or, if the human soul. We know that God made us, and dare us these walls, but how they entered into these bodies, are unknown to them, animate them, and operate upon them, we know not. The soul unites to them, animates them, and operates upon them, we know not. The soul is a mystery to itself, no marvel then that the work of God is so to us. 2nd. We know not "how the bones are fashioned in the womb of her that is with child." We cannot see into the manner either of the formation of the body, or its information with a soul; both we know are the work of God, and we a purpose in his work, but cannot by either trace the process of the operation. We doubt not of the birth of the child, though we know not how it is formed; we trust we shall see the performance of the promise, though we perceive not how things work towards it. And we may well trust God to provide for us that which is sufficient, with all our anxious, distrustful cares, and therein to recompense us for our charity, since it was without any knowledge or foresight of ours that our bodies were curiously wrought in secret, and our souls formed the way they were; and so the argument is the same, and grand to the same purpose with that of our Saviour, Matt. vi. 25. The life the living soul that feed the fowls of the air, is more than meat; the body that God has made us is more than raiment. Let him, therefore, that has done the greater for us be cheerfully depended upon to do the lesser.

5. Some may say they have been charitable, have given a great deal to the poor, and never yet saw any return for it; many days are past, and they have not found it again. To which he answers, ver. 6, Yet go on, proceed and persevere in well-doing: let slip no opportunity: "in the morning sow thy seed" upon the objects of charity that offer themselves early, and "in the evening do not withhold thy hand," under pretence that thou art weary. As thou hast opportunity be doing good, some way or other, all the day long, as the husbandman follows his seedness from morning till night. "In the morning" of youth lay out thyself to do good; give out of the little thou hast to begin the world with; "and in the evening," of old age yield not to the common temptation old people are in to be penurious, even then "withhold not thy hand," and think not to excuse thyself from charitable works, by purposing to make a charitable will, but be good in the life, "for thou knowest not which" work of charity and piety "shall prosper," both as to others, and as to thyself. "this or that," but best reason to hope that "both shall be alike good." "Be not weary of well-doing, for in due season," in God's time, and that is the best time, "you shall reap," Gal. vi. 9. This is applicable to spiritual charity, our pious endeavours for the good of the souls of others; but as to pecuniary charity, though we have long laboured in vain, we may at length see the success of them. Let ministers on the days of their seedness sow both morning and evening, for who can tell which shall prosper?

7 Truly the light is sweet,
And a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun:
8 But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all;
Yet let him remember the days of darkness;
For they shall be many.
All that cometh is vanity.
9 Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth;
And let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth,
And walk in the ways of thine heart,
And in the sight of thine eyes:
But know thou, that for all these things
God will bring thee into judgment.
10 Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart,
And put away evil from thy flesh:
For childhood and youth are vanity.

Here is an admonition, both to old people and to young people, to think of dying, and get ready for it. Having by many excellent precepts taught us how to live well, the preacher comes now, to what is the close of his discourse, to teach us how to die well, and to put us in mind of our latter end.

First, He applies himself to the aged, writes to them as fathers, to awaken them to think of death, ver. 7, 8. Here is,

1. A rational concession of the sweetness of life, which old people find by experience, viz. "Truly the light is sweet." The light of the sun is so: it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold it. Light was the first thing made in the formation of the great world, as the eye is one of the first in the formation of the body, the little world. It is pleasant to see the light; the heathen were so charmed with the pleasure of it, that they worshipped the sun. It is pleasant by it to see other things, the many agreeable prospects this world gives us. The light of life is so. Light is put for life, Job xxxiii. 28, 30. It cannot be denied but that life is sweet. It is sweet to bad men, because they have their portion in this life; it is sweet to good men, because they have this life as the time of their preparation for a better life. It is sweet to all men; nature saith it is so, and there is no disputing against it; our vain death be desired for its own sake, but dreaded, unless as a peril, to prevent evils, or a passage to future good. Life is sweet, and therefore we have need to double a guard upon ourselves, lest we love it too well.

2. A caution to think of death even in the midst of life, and of life, when it is most sweet, and we are most apt to forget death. "If a man live many years, yet let him remember the days of darkness" are counted. Here is, 1st. A summer's day supposed to be enjoyed; that life may sometimes be long, even many years, and that by the goodness of God it may be made comfortable, and a man may rejoice in them all. There are those that live many years in this world, escape many dangers, receive many mercies, and therefore are sure that they shall want no good, and that no evil shall befal them: that the portion which has come so often from the well-safe and sound shall never come home hungry. But who are they that "live many years, and rejoice in them all?" Alas, none! we have but hours of joy for months of sorrow. However, some rejoice in their years, their many years more than others: if these two things meet, a prosperous state, and a cheerful spirit, these two united may do much towards enabling a man to rejoice in them all, and yet the most prosperous state has its allays, and the most cheerful spirit has its damps: pious sinners have their melancholy qualms, and cheerful saints have their gracious sadness, so that it is but a supposition, not a case in fact, that a man should live many years, and rejoice in them all. But, 2nd. Here is a winter's night proposed to be expected after this summer's day; yet to this hearty old man "remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many." Note, First. There are days of darkness coming,—the days of our dying in the grave; there the body will lie in the dark; there the eye sees not, the sun shines not. The darkness of death is opposed to the light of life the grave is a land of darkness, Job x. 21. Secondly. Those days of darkness will be many, the days of our lying underground will be more than the days of our living above ground. They are many, but they are not innumerable, as many as they are, they will be numbered and finished when the heavens be no more, Job xiv. 12. As the longest day will have its night, so the longest night will have its morning. Thirdly. It is good for us often to remember those days of darkness, that we may not be elated or with pride, our hearts aspire to mortal security, or even transported with excessive joy in this world. Fourthly. Notwithstanding the long continuance of life, and the many comforts of it, yet we must remember the days of darkness, because those will certainly come however, and they will come with much the less terror if we have thought of them before.

Secondly, He applies himself to the young, and writes to them as children, to awaken them to think of death, ver. 9, 10: where we have,

1. An ironical intimation of the vanities and pleasures of youth: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth." Some make this to be the counsel which the atheist and epicure gives to the young man, the pernicious suggestion against which Solomon, in the close of the verse, prescribes a powerful antidote. But it is more emphatical, if we take it as it is commonly understood, by way of faculties and their failure; and the other that they constitute parts of a vivid picture. It is not easy to determine which view is correct, but both suggest important lessons.

xii. 9. Whether Coheleth, or the Preacher, in the person of Solomon, is to be regarded as the author of the Book of Proverbs now in our sacred canon, or simply as an author of proverbs, is open to question. The former and more popular view is consistent with 1 Kings iv. 32, nor is there any serious objection to it. With respect to the explanation of Coheleth as one who "is gathered" from his wanderings, there is no doubt that it means one who gathers or collects others. There are various proper names in the Hebrew Scriptures ending in eth, some of them masculine and some feminine—some passive, but others active. Thus, in Neh. vii. 7, we have Mispereth: in 2 Sam. xi. 21, Jerubbesheth, and in 2 Kings xxi. 19, Meshullemeth—the first and second being the names of men and the third that of a woman. Now, as Mispereth may fairly be explained irony, like that of Elijah to the priests of Baal, "Cry aloud, for he is a god!" or of Micaiah to Ahab, "Go to Ramoth-gilead, and prosper;" or of Christ to his disciples, "Sleep on now." "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth," live a merry life, follow thy sports, and take thy pleasures, "let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth;" cheer thee with its fancies and foolish hopes, entertain thyself with thy pleasing dreams; aye, do, "walk in the ways of thy heart," do whatever thou hast a mind to do, and stick at nothing that may gratify the sensual appetite; quicquid libet licet,—'make thy will thy law;' do thou "walk in the ways of thy heart," and let "thine heart walk after thine eyes," a rambling heart after a roving eye; what is pleasing in thine own eyes do it, whether it be pleasing in the eyes of God or no. Solomon speaks thus ironically to the young man, to intimate, 1st. That this is what he would do, and which he would fain have leave to do, in which he placeth his happiness, and on which he sets his heart. 2nd. That he wisheth all about him would give him this counsel, would prophesy to him such smooth things as these, and cannot brook any advice to the contrary, but reckons those his enemies that bid him be sober and serious. 3rd. To expose his folly, and the great absurdity of a voluptuous, vicious course of life. The very description of it, if men would see things entirely, and judge of them impartially, is enough to shew how contrary to reason those act that live such a life. The very opening of the cause is enough to determine it without any argument. 4th. To shew that, if men give themselves to such a course of life as this, it is just with God to give them up to it, to abandon them to their own hearts' lusts, that they may walk in their own counsels, Hos. iv. 17.

2. A powerful check given to these vanities and pleasures; "But know thou, that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment." and duly consider that, and then live such a luxurious life if thou canst, if thou darest. This is a colasterion, or 'corrective,' to the foregoing concession, and plucks in the reins he had laid in the neck of the young man's lusts. Know then for a certainty, that if thou dost take such a liberty as this, it will be thy everlasting ruin; thou hast to do with a God who will not let it go unpunished. Note, 1st. There is a judgment to come. 2nd. We must every one of us be brought into judgment, however we may now put far from us that evil day. 3rd. We shall be reckoned with for all our carnal mirth, and sensual pleasures, in that day. 4th. It is good for all, but especially for young people, to know and consider this, that they may not, by the indulgence of their youthful lusts, "treasure up unto themselves wrath against that day of wrath,"—the wrath of the Lamb.

3. A word of caution and exhortation inferred from all this, ver. 10. Let young people look to themselves, and manage well both their souls and their bodies, their heart and their flesh. 1st. Let them take care that their minds be not lifted up with pride, or disturbed with anger, or any sinful passion. "Remove sorrow," or anger, "from thy heart;" the word signifies, any disorder, or perturbation of the mind. Young people are apt to be impatient of check and control, to vex and fret at any thing that is humbling and mortifying to them, and their proud hearts rise against every thing that crosseth and contradicteth them. They are so set upon that which is pleasing to sense that they cannot bear anything that is displeasing, but it goes with sorrow to their heart. Their pride often disquiets them, and makes them uneasy; put that away, and the love of the world, and lay thine expectations low from the creature, and then disappointments will not be occasions of sorrow and anger to thee. Some by sorrow here understand that carnal mirth described ver. 9, the end of which will be bitterness and sorrow. Let them keep at a distance from every thing which will be sorrow in the reflection. 2nd. Let them take care that their bodies be not defiled by intemperance, uncleanness, or any fleshly lusts. "Put away evil from the flesh," and let not the members of thy body be instruments of unrighteousness. The evil of sin will be the evil of punishment; and that which thou art fond of as good for the flesh, because it gratifies the appetites of it, will prove evil and hurtful to it; and therefore put it far from thee, the farther the better, Thirdly. The preacher, to enforce his admonition both to old and young, urgeth as an effectual argument that which is the great argument of his discourse, the vanity of all present things, their uncertainty and insufficiency.

1. He minds old people of this; ver. 8, "All that cometh is vanity," yea, though a man live many years, and rejoice in them. All that is come already, and all that is yet to come, how much soever men promise themselves from the concluding scenes, it is all vanity. What will be, will do more to make men happy than what has been. All that come into the world are vanity; they are altogether so at their best estate.

2. He minds young people of this; "Childhood and youth are vanity." The dispositions and actions of childhood and youth have in them a great deal of impertinence and iniquity, sinful vanity, which young people have need to watch against and get cured. The pleasures and advantages of childhood and youth have in them no certainty, satisfaction, or continuance; they are passing away; these flowers will soon wither, and these blossoms fall; let them therefore knit them into good fruit, which will continue, and abound to a good account.

CHAPTER XII.

The wise and patient preacher is here closing his sermon, and he closes it, not only like a good orator, but like a good preacher, with that which was likely to make the best impressions, and which he wished might be powerful and lasting upon his hearers. Here is, I. An exhortation to young people to begin betimes to be religious, and not to put it off to old age, ver. 1; enforced with arguments taken from the calamities of old age, ver. 1—5; and the great change that death will make upon us, ver. 6, 7. II. A repetition of the great truth he had undertaken to prove in this discourse, the vanity of the world, ver. 8. III. A confirmation and recommendation of what he had written in this and his other books, as worthy to be duly weighed and considered, ver. 9—12. IV. The whole matter summed up and concluded, with a charge to all to be truly religious in consideration of the judgment to come, ver. 13, 14.

REMEMBER now thy Creator in the days of thy youth,
While the evil days come not,
Nor the years draw nigh,
When thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them;
2 While the sun, or the light,
Or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened,
Nor the clouds return after the rain:
3 In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble,
And the strong men shall bow themselves,
And the grinders cease because they are few,
And those that look out of the windows be darkened
4 And the doors shall be shut in the streets,
When the sound of the grinding is low,
And he shall rise up at the voice of the bird,
And all the daughters of musick shall be brought low;
5 Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high,
And fears shall be in the way,
And the almond tree shall flourish,
And the grasshopper shall be a burden,
And desire shall fail: because man goeth to his long home,
And the mourners go about the streets:

MOURNERS.

6 Or ever the silver cord be loosed,
Or the golden bowl be broken,
Or the pitcher be broken at the fountain,
Or the wheel broken at the cistern.
7 Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was:
And the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

Here is, First. A call to young people to think of God, and mind their duty to him when they are young; "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth." This is, 1. The royal preacher's application of his sermon concerning the vanity of the world, and every thing in it. You that are young flatter yourselves with expectations of great things from it, but believe those that have tried, it yields no solid satisfaction to a soul; therefore, that you may not be deceived by this vanity, nor too much disturbed by it, remember your Creator, and so guard yourselves against the mischiefs that arise from the vanity of the creature. 2. It is the royal physician's antidote against the particular diseases of youth, the love of mirth, and the indulgence of sensual pleasures, the vanity which childhood and youth is subject to; to prevent and cure this, "Remember thy Creator." Here is, 1st. A great duty pressed upon us, to remember God as our Creator. Not only remember that God is our Creator, that he made us, and not we ourselves, and is therefore our rightful Lord and owner, but we must engage ourselves to him with these considerations which his being our Creator lays us under, and pay him the honour and duty which we owe him as our Creator. "Remember thy Creators," the word is plural, as it is Job xxxv. 8, "Where is God my Makers?" for God said, "Let us make man," us, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. 2nd. The proper season for this duty. "In the days of thy youth," the days of thy choice, so some; thy choice days, thy choosing days. Begin in the beginning of thy days to remember him from whom thou hadst thy being, and go on according to that good beginning; call him to mind when thou art young, and keep him in mind throughout all the days of thy youth, and never forget him. Guard thus against the temptations of youth, and thus improve the advantages of it.

Secondly. A reason to enforce this command; "While the evil days come not, and the years of which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." Do it quickly; 1. Before sickness and death comes; Do it while thou livest; for it will be too late to do it when death has removed thee from this state of trial and probation to that of recompence and retribution. The days of sickness and death are the days of evil, terrible to nature; evil days indeed to those that have forgotten their Creator. These evil days will come sooner or later; as yet they come not, for God is long-suffering to usward, and gives us space to repent. The continuing of life is but the deferring of death, and while life is continued and death deferred, it concerns us to prepare and get the property of death altered, that we may die comfortably. 2. Before old age comes, which, if death prevent not, will come; and they will be years of which we shall say, we have no pleasure in them, when we shall not relish the delights of sense, as Barzillai, 2 Sam. xix. 35. When we shall be loaded with bodily infirmities, old and blind, or old and lame; when we shall be taken off from our usefulness, and our strength shall be labour and sorrow; when we shall either have parted with our relations, and all our old friends, or be afflicted in them, and see them weary of us; when we shall feel ourselves die by inches; these years draw nigh, when all that comes will be vanity, the remaining months all months of vanity. And there will be no pleasure but in the reflection of a good life on earth, and the expectation of a better life in heaven. These two arguments he enlargeth upon in the following verses, only inverting the order, and shews,

1st. How many are the calamities of old age; and that, if we should live to be old, our days will be such as we shall have no pleasure in, which is a good reason why we should return to God, and make our peace with him in the days of our youth, and not put it off till we come to be old; for it will be no thanks to us to leave the pleasures of sin when they have left us, nor to return to God when need forceth us. But the greatest absurdity and ingratitude imaginable is, to give the cream and flower of our days to the devil, and reserve the bran, and refuse, and dregs of them for God. This is offering "the torn, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice." And besides, old age being thus clogged with infirmities, it is the greatest folly imaginable to put off that needful work till then which requires the best of our strength, when our faculties are in their prime; and especially to make the work more difficult by a longer continuance in sin, and by laying up treasures of guilt in the conscience to add to the burthens of age, and make them much heavier. If the calamities of age will be such as is here represented, we shall have need of something to support and comfort us then; and nothing will be more effectual to do that than the testimony of our consciences for us, that we began betimes to remember our Creator and one who writes, reckons, or registers, so Coheleth is to be understood of one who collects, convokes, or summons. The word is regularly treated as a masculine, but in Eccles. vii. 27 it is usually considered as a feminine, though not necessarily so, because it becomes masculine by a different division of two words. Thus, Amrah Coheleth is feminine, but Amar hacoheleth is masculine, the change being much less conspicuous in Hebrew, where אמרה קהלת becomes אמר הקהלת. In our opinion, Coheleth is never a feminine word, and, in fact, the very arrangement we propose as a solution of the only difficulty occurs in chap. xii. 8. The reason for inviting special attention to these circumstances is in the apparent determination of some critics to find mysteries where there are none—an evil not less disastrous than the refusal to recognise mysteries where they exist.

xii. 10. "Acceptable words"—literally, "words of desire"—may signify "desirable things," because in Hebrew, as in Greek and some other languages, the same term stands for "word" and "thing."

have not since laid aside the remembrance of him. How can we expect God should help us when we are old, if we will not serve him when we are young? see Ps. lxxi. 17, 18. The decays and infirmities of old age are here elegantly described in figurative expressions, which have some difficulty in them to us now, who are not acquainted with the common phrases and metaphors used in Solomon's age and language; but the general scope is plain, to shew how uncomfortable generally the days of old age are.

1*st*. Then the sun and the light of it, the moon and the stars, and the light which they borrow from it, will be darkened; that is, they look dim to old people, through the decay of their sight. Their countenance is clouded, and the beauty and lustre of it is eclipsed; their intellectual powers and faculties, which are as lights in the soul, are weakened; their understanding and memory fails them, and their apprehension is not so quick, nor their fancy so lively, as it has been. Light is often put for joy and prosperity, the days of their mirth are over, and they have not the pleasure either of the converse of the day or the repose of the night; for both the sun and the moon are darkened to them.

2*nd*. Then "the clouds return after the rain." As when the weather is disposed to wet, no sooner is one cloud blown over but another succeeds it, so it is with old people, when they are got pretty well of one pain or ailment they are seized with another, so that their distempers are like a continual dropping in a very rainy day. The end of one trouble is in this world but the beginning of another, and deep calls unto deep. Old people are often afflicted with defluxions of rheum, like soaking rain, after which still more clouds return, feeding the humour, so that it is continually grievous, and therein the body doth as it were melt away.

3*rd*. Then "the keepers of the house tremble;" the head, which is as the watch-tower, shakes, and the arms and hands, which are ready for the preservation of the body, shake too, and grow feeble upon every sudden approach and attack of danger; that vigour of the animal spirits which used to be exerted for self-defence fails, and cannot do its office Old people are easily dispirited and discouraged.

4*th*. Then "the strong men shall bow themselves:" the legs and thighs, that used to support the body, and bear its weight, bend and buckle, and cannot serve for travel as they have done, but are soon tired. Old men, that have been in their time strong men, are become weak, and "stoop for age," Zec. viii. 4. "God taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man," Ps. cxlvii. 10, for their strength will soon fade, but "in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength;" he has everlasting arms.

5*th*. Then "the grinders cease because they are few." The teeth with which we grind our meat, and prepare it for concoction, cease to do their part, because they are few; they are rotted and broken, and perhaps have been drawn because they ached. Some old people have lost all their teeth, and others have but few left. And this infirmity is the more considerable, because the meat not being well chewed for want of teeth is one great reason why it is not well digested, which has as much an influence as any thing upon the other decays of age.

6*th*. "Those that look out of the windows are darkened," that is, the eyes wax dim, as Isaac's, Gen. xxvii. 1, and Ahijah's, 1 Kin. xiv. 4. Moses was a rare instance of one who at one hundred and twenty years old had good eyesight, but ordinarily the sight decays in old people as soon as any thing; and it is a mercy to them that art helps nature with spectacles. We have need to improve our sight well while we have it, because the light of the eyes may be gone before the light of life.

7*th*. "The doors are shut in the streets." Old people keep within doors, and care not for going abroad to entertainments. The lips, the doors of the mouth, are shut in eating, because the teeth are gone, and the sound of the grinding with them is low, so that they have not that command of their meat in their mouths which they used to have. They cannot digest their meat, and therefore little grist is brought to the mill.

8*th*. Old people "rise up at the voice of the bird." They have no sound sleep as young people have, but a little thing disturbs them, even the chirping of a bird. They cannot rest for coughing, and therefore rise up at cock-crowing, as soon as anybody is stirring. Or, they are apt to be jealous, and timorous, and full of care, which breaks their sleep, and makes them rise early. Or, they are apt to be superstitious, and rise up as in a fright at those voices of birds, as of ravens, or screech-owls, which soothsayers call ominous.

9*th*. With them "all the daughters of music are brought low." They have neither voice nor ear, can neither sing themselves nor take any pleasure as Solomon had done in the days of his youth, in singing men and singing women, and musical instruments, ch. ii. 8. Old people grow thick of hearing, and unapt to distinguish sounds and voices.

10*th*. They are "afraid of that which is high," afraid to go to the top of any high place, either because for want of breath they cannot reach it, or their heads being giddy, or their legs failing them, they dare not venture to it; or they frighten themselves with fancies, that that which is high will fall upon them. Fear is in the way; they can neither ride nor walk with their usual boldness, but are afraid of every thing that lies in their way, lest it throw them down.

11*th*. "The almond-tree flourisheth," that is, the old man's hair is gone white, so that his head looks like an almond-tree in the blossom. The almond-tree blossoms before any other tree, and therefore fitly shews what haste old age makes in seizing upon men; it prevents their expectations, and comes faster upon them than they thought of. "Gray hairs are here and there upon them, and they perceive it not."

12*th*. "The grasshopper is a burthen, and desire fails." Old men can bear nothing; the lightest thing sits heavy upon them, both on their bodies and on their minds; a little thing sinks and breaks them. Perhaps the grasshopper was some food that was looked upon to be very light of digestion. John Baptist's meat was locusts, but even that lies heavy upon an old man's stomach, and therefore desire fails, that is, he has no appetite to his meat: neither shall he "regard the desire of women," as that king, Dan. xi. 37. Old men become mindless and listless, and the pleasures of sense are to them tasteless and sapless.

It is probable, Solomon wrote this when he was himself old, and could speak feelingly of the infirmities of age, which perhaps grew the faster upon him for the indulgence he had given himself in sensual pleasures. Some old people bear up better than others under the decays of age; but more or less the days of old age are, and will be, evil days, and of little pleasure. Great care, therefore, should be taken to pay respect and honour to old people, that they may have something to balance these grievances, and nothing may be done to add to them. And all this put together makes up a good reason why we should remember our Creator in the days of our youth, that he may remember us with favour when these evil days come, and his comforts may delight our souls when the delights of sense are in a manner worn off.

2nd. He shews how great a change death will make with us, which will be either the prevention or the period of the miseries of old age. Nothing else will keep them off, nor any thing else cure them. Therefore, "remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth," because death is certainly before thee,—perhaps it is very near thee; and it is a serious thing to die, and we are concerned with the utmost care and diligence to prepare for it.

First. Death will fix us in an unchangeable state. "Man shall then go to his long home," and all these infirmities and decays of age are harbingers of, and advances towards, that awful remove. At death, man goes from this world, and all the employments and enjoyments of it; he is gone for good and all as to his present state. He is gone home; for here he was a stranger and pilgrim; both soul and body go to the place whence they came, ver. 7. He is gone to his rest, to the place where he is to fix; he is gone to his home, 'to the house of his world,' so some; for this world is not his; he is gone to his long home, for the days of his lying in the grave will be many. He is gone to his house of eternity, not only to his house, whence he shall never return to this world, but to the house where he must be for ever. This should make us willing to die, that at death we must go home; and why should we not long to go to our Father's house? And this should quicken us to get ready to die, that we must then go to our long home, to an everlasting habitation.

Secondly. Death will be an occasion of sorrow to our friends that love us. When "man goes to his long home, the mourners go about the streets;" the real mourners, and those, as now with us, distinguished by their habits as they go along the streets; the mourners for ceremony, that were hired to weep for the dead, both to express and to excite the real mourning. When we die, we not only remove to a melancholy house before us, but we leave a melancholy house behind us. Tears are a tribute due to the dead, and this, among other circumstances, makes it a serious thing to die. But in vain do we go to the house of mourning, and see the mourners go about the streets, if it do not help to make us serious and pious mourners in the closet.

Thirdly. Death will dissolve the frame of nature, and take down the earthly house of this tabernacle, which is elegantly described, ver. 6, "Then shall the silver cord," by which soul and body were wonderfully fastened together, "be loosed,"—that sacred knot untied, and those old friends be forced to part; then shall "the golden bowl," that held the waters of life for us, "be broken;" then shall "the pitcher," with which we used to fetch up water for the constant support of life, and the repair of its decays, "be broken," even "at the fountain," so that it can fetch up no more; and "the wheel," all those organs that serve for the collecting and distributing of nourishment, shall "be broken," and disabled to do their office any more. The body shall become like a watch when the spring is broken, the motion of all the wheels is stopped, and they all stand still; the machine is taken to pieces; the heart beats no more, nor doth the blood circulate. Some apply this to the ornaments and utensils of life; rich people must at death leave behind them their clothing, and furniture, and silver and gold, and poor people their earthern pitchers, and the drawers of water will have their wheel broken.

Fourthly. Death will resolve us into our first principles, ver. 7. Man is a strange sort of creature,—a ray of heaven united to a clod of earth. At death these are separated, and each goes to the place whence it came.

1*st*. The body, that clod of clay, returns to its own earth. It is made of the earth; Adam's body was so, and we are of the same mould. It is a house of clay: at death, it is laid in the earth, and in a little time will be resolved into earth, not to be distinguished from common earth; according to the sentence, Gen. iii. 19, "Dust thou art," and therefore, "to dust thou shalt return." Let us not therefore indulge the appetites of the body, nor pamper it; it will be worm's meat shortly; nor let sin reign in our mortal bodies, because they are mortal, Rom. vi. 12.

2*nd*. The soul, that beam of light, returns to that God who, when he "made man of the dust of the ground, breathed into him the breath of life, to make him a living soul," Gen. ii. 7, and formeth the spirit of every man within him. When the fire consumes the wood, the flame ascends, when the ashes return to the earth out of which the wood grew. The soul doth not die with the body; it is redeemed from the power of the grave, Ps. xlix. 15; it can subsist without it, and will be in a state of separation from it, as the candle burns, and burns brighter, when it is taken out of the dark lantern. It removes to the world of spirits, to which it is allied; it goes to God as a judge, to give account of itself, and to be lodged either with the spirits in prison, 1 Pet. iii. 19, or with the spirits in paradise, Lu. xxiii. 43, according to what was done in the body. This makes death terrible to the wicked, whose souls go to God as an avenger, and comfortable to the godly, whose souls go to God as a Father, into whose hands they cheerfully commit them, through a Mediator, out of whom sinners may justly dread to think of going to God.

8 Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; all is vanity. 9 And moreover, because the preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he gave good heed, and sought out, and set in order many proverbs. 10 The preacher sought to find out acceptable words: and that which was written was upright, even words of truth. 11 The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd. 12 And further, by these, my son, be admonished; of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh.

Solomon is here drawing towards a close, and is loath to part till he has gained his point, and prevailed with his hearers, with his readers, to seek for that satisfaction in God only, and in their duty to him, which they can never find in the creature.

First. He repeats his text, ver. 8. 1. As that which he had fully demonstrated the truth of, and so made good his undertaking in this sermon, wherein he had kept close to his text, and both his reasons and his application were to the purpose. 2. As that which he desired to inculcate both upon others and upon himself, to have it ready, and to make use of it upon all occasions. We see it daily proved; let it therefore be daily improved; "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

Secondly. He recommends what he had written upon this subject by Divine direction and inspiration to our serious consideration. The words of this book are faithful, and well worthy our acceptance; for,

1. They are the words of one that was a convert, a penitent, that could speak by dear-bought experience of the vanity of the world, and the folly of expecting great things from it. He was Coheleth, one gathered in from his wander-

We would render the verse thus: "Coheleth sought to discover desirable words (or things), and to write in uprightness words of truth."

xii. 11. This verse is reckoned among the difficulties of Ecclesiastes, but our translators have made their English as obscure as the Hebrew. The first clause may be thus rendered: "The words of the wise are like ox-goads; and like nails driven in are masters of assemblies." By "the wise" and "the masters of assemblies" some understand the official body of men who sat in council upon religious and political affairs. The concluding member is easy to translate, but hard to understand: "they are given by one shepherd." Are the words given? or are the men who speak them given, i.e., appointed? Who is the shepherd or pastor? Perhaps the sense is that those whose counsels are like goads to stimulate the sluggish, and like nails or tent-pegs to steady the unstable, are under the control and rule of one governor, which is God. That a shepherd is a ruler is recognised in many passages of Scripture.

ings, and gathered home to that God from whom he had revolted. 'Vanity of vanities, saith the penitent.' All true penitents are convinced of the vanity of the world, for they find it can do nothing to ease them of the burden of sin which they complain of.

2. They are the words of one that was wise, wiser than any; endued with extraordinary measures of wisdom; famous for it among his neighbours, who all sought unto him to hear his wisdom; and therefore a competent judge of this matter. Not only wise as a prince, but wise as a preacher, and preachers have need of wisdom to win souls.

3. He was one that made it his business to do good, and to use wisdom aright. Because he was himself wise, but knew he had not his wisdom for himself no more than he had it from himself, he still taught the people that knowledge which he had found useful to himself, and hoped might be so to them too. It is the interest of princes to have their people well taught in religion; and no disparagement to them to teach them themselves the good knowledge of the Lord, but their duty to encourage those whose office it is to teach them, and to speak comfortably to them, 2 Chr. xxx. 22. Let not the people, the common people, be despised, no, not by the wisest and greatest, as either unworthy or incapable of good knowledge. Even those that are well taught have need to be still taught, that they may grow in knowledge.

4. He took a great deal of pains and care to do good, designing to teach the people knowledge. He did not put them off with any thing that came next hand, because they were inferior people, and he a very wise man; but, considering the worth of the souls he preached to, and the weight of the subject he preached on, he gave good heed to what he read and heard from others, that having stocked himself well he might bring out of his treasury things new and old. He gave good heed to what he spoke and wrote himself, and was choice and exact in it; all he did was elaborate. 1st. He chose the most profitable way of preaching, by proverbs or short sentences, which would be more easily apprehended and remembered than long and laboured periods. 2nd. He did not content himself with a few parables or wise sayings, and repeat them again and again; but he furnished himself with many proverbs, a great variety of grave discourses, that he might have something to say on every occasion. 3rd. He did not only give them such observations as were obvious and trite, but he sought out such as were surprising and uncommon; he digged into the mines of knowledge, and did not only pick up what lay on the surface. 4th. He did not deliver his heads and observations at random as they came to mind, but methodised them, and set them in order, that they might appear in more strength and lustre.

5. He put what he had to say in such a dress as he thought would be most pleasing. "He sought to find out acceptable words," words of delight, ver. 10. He took care that good matter might not be spoiled by an ill style, and by the ungratefulness and incongruity of the expression. Ministers should study not for big words, or fine words, but acceptable words, such as are likely to please men for their good to edification, 1 Cor. x. 33. They that would win souls must contrive how to win upon them with words fitly spoken.

6. That which he did write for our instruction is of unquestionable certainty, and what we may rely upon. "That which was written was upright" and sincere, according to the real sentiment of the penman, "even words of truth," the exact representation of the thing as it is. Those are sure not to miss their way that are guided by these words. What good will acceptable words do us if they be not upright, and words of truth? Most are for smooth things that flatter them, rather than right things that direct them, Isa. xxx. 10. But to those that understand themselves and their own interest, words of truth will always be acceptable words.

7. That which this and other holy men wrote will be of great use and advantage to us, especially being inculcated upon us by the exposition of it, ver. 11. Here observe, 1st. A double benefit accruing to us by Divine truths, if duly applied and improved; they are "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness." They are of use, First. To excite us to our duty. They are as goads to the ox that draws the plough, putting him forward when he is dull, and quickening him to mend his pace. The truths of God prick men to the heart, Acts ii. 37, and put them upon bethinking themselves when they trifle and grow remiss, and exerting themselves with more vigour in their work. While our good affections are so apt as they are to grow flat and cool, we have need of these goads. Secondly. To engage us to persevere in our duty. They are as nails to those that are wavering and inconstant, to fix them to that which is good; they are goads to such as are dull and draw back, and nails to such as are desultory and draw aside; a means to establish the heart, and confirm good resolutions, that we may not sit loose to our duty, nor be ever taken off from it, but that what good there is in us may be "as a nail fastened in a sure place," Ezr. ix. 8. 2nd. A double way of communicating Divine truths in order to these benefits. First. By the Scriptures, as the standing rule. "The words of the wise;" that is, of the prophets, who are called wise men, Mat. xxiii. 34. These we have in black and white, and may have recourse to them at any time, and make use of them as goads and as nails. By them we may teach ourselves: let but them come with pungency and power to the soul; let the impressions of them be deep and durable, and they will make us wise to salvation. Secondly. By the ministry. To make the words of the wise more profitable to us it is appointed that they should be impressed and "fastened by the masters of assemblies." Solemn assemblies for religious worship are an ancient Divine institution, intended for the honour of God and the edification of his church; and are not only serviceable but necessary to those ends. There must be masters of these assemblies, who are Christ's ministers, and as such are to preside in them, to be God's mouth to the people, and theirs to God. Their business is to fasten the words of the wise, and drive them as nails to the head, in order to which the word of God is likewise as a hammer, Jer. xxiii. 29.

8. That which is written and thus recommended to us is of Divine original. Though it come to us through various hands, many wise men, and many masters of assemblies, yet it is given by one and the same Shepherd; the great "Shepherd of Israel, that leadeth Joseph like a flock," Ps. lxxx. 1. God is that one Shepherd, whose good Spirit indited the Scriptures, and assists the masters of the assemblies in opening and applying the Scriptures. These words of the wise are the true sayings of God, on which we may rest our souls; from that one Shepherd all ministers must receive what they deliver, and speak according to the light of the written word.

9. The sacred inspired writings, if we will but make use of them, are sufficient to guide us in the way to true happiness; and we need not in the pursuit of that to toil ourselves with the search of other writings; ver. 12, "And farther," nothing now remains but to tell thee that "of making many books there is no end;" that is, 1st. Of writing many books. If what I have written serve not to convince thee of the vanity of the world, and the necessity of being religious, neither wouldst thou be convinced if I should write never so much. If the end be not attained in the use of those books of Scripture which God has blessed us with, neither should we obtain the end if we had twice as many more; nay, if we had so many as that the whole world could not contain them, Jno. xxi. 6. "And much study" of them would but confound us, and would rather be "a weariness to the flesh" than any advantage to the soul; we have as much as God saw fit to give us, saw fit for us, and saw us fit for. Much less can it be expected that those who will not by these be admonished, should be wrought upon by other writings. Let men write never so many books for the conduct of human life, write till they have tired themselves with much study, they cannot give better instructions than those we have from the word of God. Or, 2nd. Of buying many books, making ourselves masters of them, and masters of what is in them by much study. Still the desire of learning would be unsatisfied. It will give a man indeed the best entertainment, and the best accomplishment this world can afford him; but if we be not by these admonished of the vanity of the world, and human learning among other things, and its insufficiency to make us happy without true piety, alas, there is no end of it, nor real benefit by it; it will weary the body, but never give the soul any true satisfaction. The great Mr. Selden subscribed to this when he owned that in all the books he had read he never found that on which he could rest his soul but in the Holy Scripture, especially Tit. ii. 11 12. By these therefore let us be admonished.

13 Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. 14 For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.

The great inquiry which Solomon prosecutes in this book is, "What is that good which the sons of men should do?" ch. ii. 3; what is the true way to true happiness? the certain means to attain our great end? He had in vain sought it among those things which the most of men are eager in the pursuit of, but here at length he has found it, by the help of that discovery which God anciently made to man, Job xxviii. 28, that serious godliness is the only way to true happiness. "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter;" the return entered upon the writ of inquiry, the result of this diligent search, you shall have all I have been driving at in two words. He doth not say, Do you hear it, but, Let us hear it; for preachers must themselves be hearers of that word which they preach to others; must hear it as from God. Those are teachers by the halves who teach others and not themselves, Rom. ii. 21. Every word of God is pure and precious, but some are worthy of more special remark, as this here; the Masorites begin it with a capital letter, as that, Deu. vi. 4. Solomon himself puts a nota bene before it, demanding attention in these words, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter." Observe here,

First. The summary of religion. Setting aside all matters of doubtful disputation, to be religious is to "fear God, and keep his commandments." 1. The root of religion is the fear of God reigning in the heart; a reverence of his majesty, a deference to his authority, and a dread of his wrath. Fear God; that is, worship God, give him the honour due to his name in all the instances of true devotion, inward and outwards: see Rev. xiv. 7. 2. The rule of religion is the law of God, revealed in the Scriptures. Our fear toward God must be taught by his commandments, Isa. xxix. 13; and those we must keep, and carefully observe. Wherever the fear of God is uppermost in the heart there will be a respect to all his commandments, and care to keep them. In vain do we pretend to fear God if we do not make conscience of our duty to him.

Secondly. The vast importance of it. This is the whole of man; it is all his business, and all his blessedness. Our whole duty is summed up in this, and our whole comfort is bound up in this; it is the concern of every man, and ought to be his chief and continual care; it is the common concern of all men, of their whole time. It is nothing to a man whether he be rich or poor, high or low; but it is the main matter, it is all in all to a man, to fear God, and do as he bids him.

Thirdly. A powerful inducement to this, ver. 14. We shall see of what mighty consequence it is to us that we be religious, if we consider the account we must every one of us shortly give of ourselves to God. Thence he argued against a vicious, voluptuous life, ch. xi. 9, and here for a religious life. "God shall bring every work into judgment." Note, 1. There is a judgment to come, in which every man's eternal state will be finally determined. 2. God himself will be the judge, God-man will, not only because he has a right to judge, but because he is perfectly fit for it, infinitely wise and just. 3. Every work will then be brought into judgment, will be inquired into, and called over again. It will be a day to bring to remembrance every thing done in the body. 4. The great thing to be then judged of concerning every work is, whether it be good or evil; conformable to the will of God, or a violation of it. 5. Even secret things, both good and evil, will be brought to light, and brought to account in the judgment of the great day, Rom. ii. 16. There is no good work, no ill work hid, but shall then be made manifest. 6. In consideration of the judgment to come, and the strictness of that judgment, it highly concerns us now to be very strict in our walking with God, that we may give up our account with joy.

xii. 12. "And moreover, my son, be warned: the making of many books is endless, and much study is a weariness of the flesh."

xii. 13. Another disputed verse. Dr. Ginsburg renders it, "In conclusion, everything is noticed; fear God and keep his commandments, for this every man should do." Our own translators put in the margin, "The end of the matter, even all that hath been heard, is, Fear God," &c. It so happens that the same Hebrew form signifies "let us hear" and "hath been heard," or "is heard." No valid objection can be urged against our rendering the opening words, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole discourse."

xii. 14. This conclusion demonstrates that there is something more important than earthly enjoyment, and that there is to be hereafter a difference, not merely between the man and the brute, but between the good man and the bad. Thus, all the sceptical utterances of the early chapters are cancelled by the last strokes of the inspired pen.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES
TO THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES.

CHAP. I.—1. The Preacher. That this book was the composition of Solomon the title bears, universal tradition affirms, and internal evidence concurs to prove, there being many things in it which will apply to no one else. And whilst external and internal evidences establish the genuineness of the treatise, as the production of the prince whose name it bears, the same descriptions of proof assign its composition to a period of his life subsequent to his temporary apostacy from the service and the ways of God. This is the testimony of Jewish tradition; and whilst every right feeling should induce us to wish the testimony true, there is enough in the book itself to vindicate our judgments from the imputation of credulity in believing it. For if it was written by Solomon at all, at what other time of his life could it be written? Not before his apostacy; for then he had not been guilty of the madness and impiety described. Not during his apostacy; for the language of the record is that of past time, and the spirit which it breathes is that of penitence for past misconduct. An apostate, persisting in his apostacy, could not possibly have been its author. It must have been written, therefore, after his return from his wanderings, and the delight which the conviction of this inspires rests on grounds that are not illusory. Ecclesiastes is the Greek title of the book, the title which it bears in the Septuagint. It signifies 'the Preacher.' The Hebrew word for which it is used means, one who assembles or gathers the people together; and the translation of it by the term Ecclesiastes shews that the Greek translators understood the object of the assembling to be the communication of public instruction.—Lectures on the Book of Ecclesiastes, by Ralph Wardlaw, D.D. The remaining notes are, with the author's approval, taken from the same excellent work. 2. VANITY OF VANITIES, SAITH THE PREACHER, VANITY OF VANITIES, ALL IS VANITY. This is the text of the preacher's sermon. In the first place, it is to be considered as the affecting result of Solomon's own experience; the book might with sufficient appropriateness be entitled, 'The Experience of Solomon.' Secondly. We are not to understand it as the language of a mind soured and fretted by disappointment, but as the conclusion come to by one who had felt the bitterness of a course of sin, and the emptiness of this world's joys, and having been reclaimed from "the error of his way," having renounced and wept over his follies, was more than ever satisfied that "the fear of the Lord is wisdom," and that "the ways of wisdom are the only ways of pleasantness, and her paths alone the paths of peace." Thirdly. Neither must we conceive him to affirm, in these words, that there is no good whatever, no kind of enjoyment, no degree of happiness, to be derived from the things of the world, when they are kept in their own place, estimated on right principles, and used in a proper manner. Sentiments widely different from any thing so ascetic and enthusiastic as this, will repeatedly come in our way in the course of the book. The words before us are to be interpreted of every thing in this world when pursued as the portion of him who seeks it,—when considered as constituting the happiness of a rational, immortal, and accountable being. His verdict is, that to such a creature they can yield, by themselves, no genuine and worthy satisfaction; and that, whilst they are in their own nature unsatisfying, even in this world, they are worse, infinitely worse than profitless, for the world to come. On this ground it is that he pronounces them vanity; he had weighed them all in the balances, and had found them wanting. Fourthly. The peculiar emphasis may be remarked with which this verdict is expressed. He does not merely say all things are vain, but "all is vanity," vanity itself, and "vanity of vanities;" that is, the greatest vanity,—sheer, perfect vanity. And he doubles the emphatic asseveration: "Vanity of vanities, vanity of vanities, all is vanity." This shews, 1. The strength of the impression on his own mind. It shews, 2. The earnestness of his desire to produce a similar impression on the minds of others. That is justly denominated "vanity," which yields no substantial profit. It is in this connexion that he adds in ver. 3, "What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?" By "labour" he means not only the labour of the hands, but also the labour of the brain; for of both we shall find him frequently speaking in the sequel. "What profit hath a man of all his labour?" What profit! Much, it will by many be answered. Much present profit, great and manifold benefits, in the estimation of the world, may be the result of human labour. Learning, riches, power, honour, and all the means of sensual and intellectual gratification, may be acquired by labour. But these things, when viewed apart from God as the chief good, (the light in which, we observed, it is Solomon's intention to place them,) are all comprehended in the verdict already pronounced, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

CHAP. II.—11. On all the works—and, behold, all was vanity. Such was the nature, and such the success, of Solomon's experiment for the procuring of happiness. When his labour was ended, he had only to sigh over its results. He very soon tired looking at what was finished, and of hearing what he had heard before. And besides the feeling of immediate unsatisfactoriness, the galling reflection, as he informs us in a subsequent part of this chapter, forced itself upon his mind, and fretted, and mortified, and disgusted him,—that in a very short time all must be left behind him, and left, too, he could not tell to whom, whether to a wise man or a fool. From this passage we may observe, in the first place, It is a radical but very prevalent mistake as to happiness, when men conceive of it as arising from situation. The radical principle of happiness must be carried about within us, else we shall infallibly fail of satisfaction in every trial we can make of earthly good. In the second place, Let it not be supposed that there is no such thing to be found as true satisfaction, real and substantial happiness. This would be a very hasty and a very false conclusion. There is such a thing, blessed be the gracious Author of our being, there is such a thing to be found, as solid and heart-satisfying enjoyment. It is not indeed to be derived from the sources to which Solomon betook himself in "the days of his vanity." Many things may be accessories to happiness, but "one thing is needful." The true secret of it is, living to God. God in all things, and all things in God, is its appropriate definition. This is at once the pure and the sublime of enjoyment.

> 'Live while ye live! the sensualist may say,
> And catch the pleasures of the passing day.
> Live while ye live! the holy man replies,
> And give to God each moment as it flies.
> Lord, in my life let both united be!
> I live in pleasure, when I live to thee!

In the third place, Let this passage repress in every bosom the feelings of envy. Deceive not yourselves with the fancy that Solomon's disappointment might not be yours. Be assured you would fare no better than he. The same experiment would yield to you the same result as it did to him, and as it has done to many more, who have foolishly ventured to repeat it. Be not "envious, then, at the foolish, when you see the prosperity of the wicked.' If you are "rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath provided for them that love him," envy may well be a stranger to your bosoms. 24. From the hand of God. The meaning of this is, not merely that the bounties of providence are from the Divine hand, but that from him proceeds a suitable temper of mind for the true enjoyment of them,—a grateful and contented spirit. This is from God. It is produced and maintained by Divine influence, and it imparts to the things of time a relish which can never be experienced by those who make them their portion. Solomon's doctrine of the necessity of this lesson being taught us by God agrees with the experience of the apostle Paul, as recorded in his epistle to the Philippians, "Not that I speak in respect of want; for I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; every where, and in all things, I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me," Phil. iv. 11—13. He "learned," he was "instructed;" not merely informed of this state of mind being his duty, but effectually taught, by the grace of the Lord Jesus, to maintain it.

CHAP. III.—4. Dancing is put as a general expression for joy and gladness. "Thou hast turned my mourning into dancing," Ps. xxx. 11. 5. A time to cast away stones and to gather stones together, seems to refer to the rearing of memorials of covenants between parties, and of remarkable events. Such were the pillars erected by Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxi. 52; also the heaps of stones over Achan and Absalom. 6. A time to keep—to cast away. A time when particular earthly possessions give us pleasure, and we keep them; and a time when, from satiety or change of taste and character, they cease to please, and we cast them away; a time when the bounties of heaven are retained with gratitude as valuable and useful; and a time when duty may require us to relinquish all that we have, that we may not violate the dictates of conscience, or incur the forfeiture of more precious and more lasting blessings; or when life comes to be in danger, and for its preservation property of every kind will be readily thrown away from us, as, in the comparison, unworthy of a moment's thought. Thus many have made a cheerful sacrifice of things seen and temporal for the sake of things unseen and eternal; and many more have shewn the truth of the proverb, "all that a man hath will he give for his life." Paul "counted all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord;" nay, "suffered for him the loss of all things, and counted them but dung that he might win Christ, and be found in him." The believing Hebrews "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, knowing in themselves that they had in heaven a better and an enduring substance." 11. Set the world in their heart. The word here rendered "world" is translated differently elsewhere. Holden thus paraphrases the verse, 'And I find that although he hath made every thing beautiful in its season, and established the course of nature with transcendent wisdom, yet he hath also put obscurity in the midst of them, his works being intricate and mysterious, so that man, from the beginning to the end, cannot find out and perfectly comprehend the work that God doeth.'—Religious Tract Society's Bible, 2 Cor. i. 12; Gal. vi. 4, 5.

CHAP. V.—6. Neither say thou before the angel that it was an error. I am satisfied, that by "the angel" we are here to understand the priest. "The priest's lips," says God by Malachi, "should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the messenger (angel) of the Lord of hosts," Mal. ii. 7. It is the case of a man who, in order to elude the performance of a vow he has made, comes to the priest, pretending that it was "an error," or a mistake, a thing done rashly, and without consideration of its nature and consequences, a vow which it would, as he has since discovered, be improper for him to fulfil; a sin of ignorance; and who, making this confession, presents, or proposes to present, the appointed offering. This view of the case imparts peculiar force to the words which follow, "Wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thy hands?" Such hypocritical mockery of God would expose him to his merited displeasure. Thus insulted, he would be provoked to frown upon him; and whilst the foolish deceiver might be "blessing himself in his heart" that he had succeeded so well in keeping possession of the substance which he had alienated by his vow, the curse of offended heaven might not only blast what he had feloniously kept, but come down upon all that he had, preventing his prosperity, embittering his sweets, blighting his prospects, and "destroying the work of his hands." This is just the opposite of the promise annexed to the duty of faithful liberality in the service of God, "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the firstfruits of all thine increase; so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine," Pr. iii. 9, 10.

CHAP. VI.—3, 4. I say that an untimely birth—for he, &c. Most commentators understand the fourth verse as referring to the abortion; and, consistently with this view of its subject, translate it, "although it cometh in with vanity and departeth in darkness, and its name shall be covered with darkness." But this seems to me very unnatural. I understand the verse, therefore, of the man described in the preceding context, and as assigning Solomon's reason for giving the preference to an "untimely birth." The man "cometh in" (to the world, namely) "with vanity." He not only enters on a life itself, even at the best, is vanity, being uncertain, unsatisfying, and transitory; but, having "seen no good" in his passage through it, he seems, as far as he himself is concerned, to have been born to no purpose, for no end or use, in vain. 5. The fifth verse, however, is evidently spoken of the abortion, "Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known anything; this hath more rest than the other." The comparison regards the absence of suffering, rather than the proportions of positive enjoyment, "This hath more rest than the other;" or, 'this hath rest rather than the other,' which, in the present case, is much the same in real amount with 'this hath rest, and not the other.' The rest of the grave is meant, where the untimely birth is immediately laid. It has not "seen the sun" indeed, or enjoyed the cheering light of heaven. But what is the cheering light of heaven to the man whose eye it gives "to see no good?" to whom it only discloses, day after day, the same dreary scenes of woe? The abortion has the advantage in "not having known anything," for it is better to know nothing at all than to know nothing but trouble.

CHAP. VII.—1. A good name better—death better. The saying before us must be confined to the wise and the good, to the children of God, those who have believed his word, and walked in his ways, and have had "a good name" in "the Lamb's book of life." Of them it is emphatically true, true in all its extent of meaning; true, not only when this life has been a life of unusual suffering, when they go to heaven "out of great tribulation;" but true, even Supplementary Notes.—Chap. iv. 15. The second clause must be understood of the king who succeeds the one the impoverishment of whom is alluded to in verse 14. The word "second" may also refer to the "solitude" which has already occupied attention, and hence Dr. Ginsburg renders the clause "the sociable youth who standeth up in his place."

iv. 16. Of this obscure verse many explanations have been proposed. Some understand that there will be no end to the disposition of people to grow weary of what they have long enjoyed, and to be pleased with novelty. By others it is understood to refer to the king last spoken of: there is no end to all the people before, or over whom he is a ruler, and yet posterity will take no pleasure in him. By others it is explained to mean that countless numbers were before him, and that those who come after him will not be specially pleased with him. The Chaldee applies the words to Rehoboam, who ruled over many, but followed evil advice, which divided the nation, taking life in its "best estate," freest of evil and fullest of good. This is the language alike of the Old and of the New Testament records. To such death is a salvation, a salvation from sin and from all the evil of which sin is the cause. The day of birth is the day of entrance on a sinful, and therefore a suffering, world; the day of death is the day of entrance on a sinless, and therefore a perfectly happy, world. "To die is" thus "gain." "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." 16, 17. Righteous overmuch—overmuch wicked. The whole passage seems to be an instance of serious and impressive irony, of which the subject is, the line of conduct most prudent to be pursued, supposing the end in view to be the securing of favour, honour and prosperity in the world. If, therefore, your object be to shun the world's enmity, with its possible and probable effects, and to secure the world's favour, with its desirable accompaniments and consequences, take care of these extremes; as "there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, be not righteous overmuch, neither make thyself overwise; why shouldest thou destroy thyself?"—and though a "wicked man" may, and sometimes does, "prolong his life in his wickedness," yet the extreme of wickedness has its hazards, as well as the extreme of righteousness; "be not overmuch wicked, neither be thou foolish; why shouldest thou die before thy time?" All Scripture irony is serious, and intended to impress on the mind important lessons. The passage is, in this respect, similar to that striking one towards the close of the book: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." So here the admonition closes with an impressive recommendation of the fear of the Lord, as the best and only means of inspiring true peace and tranquil security of mind, as a sovereign antidote against the fear of man, and a powerful incentive to the faithful and firm discharge of duty in every situation, ver. 18, "It is good that thou shouldest take hold of this; yea, also from this withdraw not thy hand; for he that feareth God shall come forth of them all."

CHAP. IX.—9. Live joyfully—all the days of thy vanity. The mode of expression in this verse remarkably accords with the apostle's admonition, to remember the shortness of time both in its joys and its woes, 1 Cor. vii. 29—31. 11. Chance. We must not understand Solomon as intending, by the use of this word, to convey the idea that there is or can be any thing absolutely fortuitous. The reign of chance can never be more than imaginary. The very supposition of it is pregnant alike with impiety and absurdity. It is atheism. Chance is a term denoting ignorance, not on God's part, but on ours. It has been happily defined, although by a poet, yet without a poet's fiction, 'direction which we cannot see.' 18. Wisdom is better than weapons of war, but one sinner destroyeth much good. Although there are principles in our nature, as fallen creatures, which render the work of the sinner, in doing evil and destroying good, much more easy than that of the wise man in promoting good and repressing evil, yet let us be encouraged in all our benevolent labours, especially those for the spiritual benefit of others, by considering the extent of possible advantage from success in a single instance. The seduction of one is fearful, both in itself and in the sad train of consequences that may arise from it. But let us not forget how valuable, in itself and in its possible results, is the conversion and salvation of one, Jas. v. 19, 20. Even if the good stopped here, it would be inestimably precious, for "what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" But think of the influence of this individual on others in the family, in the circle of relatives and friends, and in the neighbourhood to which he belongs, and, through them, on successive generations to the end of time, Ps. lxxvii. 5—7. How animating is the thought,—and there is no enthusiastic extravagance in it,—that the good we now do may continue to be felt, and felt in a constantly widening circle, till the last trump shall sound, that one sinner brought back to God may, for aught we can tell, prove, in course of time, the salvation of thousands! The solitary seed that has yielded thirty, sixty, or a hundred fold, stops not there. Each of the grains of its produce may yield the same, and field must be added to field, to receive the accumulating increase. Let parents, let ministers, let sabbath-school teachers, let all in their respective spheres of spiritual influence, be stimulated by such considerations to lively and persevering exertions, and to the seizure of every opportunity on which prudence lays not an evident interdict, of "seeking the profit of others that they may be saved."

CHAP. X.—11. Serpent bite—without enchantment. That is, he will bite unless he be charmed. There is in these words an allusion to a practice, said to prevail in the East, of charming adders by the power of sounds, fascinating them by musical incantations, and rendering them for the time harmless to the persons who handled them, Ps. lviii. 4, 5, (see wood engraving,) Jer. viii. 17. 'In Northern India the serpent charmers are a distinct caste of people, who reside in the Upper Provinces, and speak the Hindooee language. In parties of forty or fifty they itinerate throughout the whole of Hindostan and Bengal, and when they arrive in the vicinity of a populous district, they divide themselves into companies of six and eight, and, going from house to house, amuse the people by causing serpents of all sizes to wind round their bodies, &c. They carry with them baskets containing living serpents of all kinds, and in their hands they hold a small earthen pipe, perforated with holes, in which they blow, and produce from it certain sounds, which, they say, are sure to draw every serpent from its hiding-place. By what means it is accomplished, I cannot say, but certainly their powers of fascination over the serpent tribes are most wonderful.'—Rev. G. Gogerly. A babbler is no better. He who gives to his tongue an unrestrained license, and is guided in the use of it neither by principle nor by prudence, is a man that requires to be managed with peculiar caution. Contradiction and violence may only irritate, and make the venom of his tongue the more virulent and deadly. He must be charmed. We must find out his right side, the way to gain his good graces, to tame him, and keep him gentle. If he be a man of power, the danger of meddling with him becomes the more imminent, and the necessity for cautious management the more imperative.

CHAP. XI.—9. Rejoice, O young man. See Supplementary Note on ch. vii. 16, 17.

CHAP XII.—1. Remember thy Creator. Remember him as the great Author of your being, and spend not the existence which he has given, and which he every moment sustains, in forgetfulness of him and rebellion against him. Remember your unceasing dependence upon him for "life, and breath, and all things," and cherish the humility that becomes dependent creatures. Remember him as your all-bountiful benefactor, both in providence and in redemption, the Father of mercies, the God of salvation. Remember him in all the characters in which he has been pleased to make himself known to his creatures; especially that in which it is the principal design of the Bible to reveal him, as "by Jesus Christ reconciling the world unto himself," just in justifying the ungodly, displaying in the redemption of sinners by the work of his Son, his infinite wisdom, his spotless purity, his inviolable righteousness, and his unbounded mercy, in that inseparable harmony, in which, by the necessity of his nature, they exist in his perfect character. This view of God has been given to men from the beginning, with various degrees of progressive light; salvation having, since the entrance of sin and the giving of the first promise, been the leading subject and end of Divine revelation. Remember him with the dispositions, the worship, the obedience, the service, that are due to him. It is affectionate, reverential, practical remembrance that is here recommended. Think how awful it is that God should be so generally forgotten by his intelligent offspring, that he should have so few of their thoughts, so little of their regards! Dare ye to be singular, by devoting yourselves to God in a world where he is so grievously dishonoured, where there are so few hearts that give him a welcome residence. Choose ye his service as your employment, his fear as your principle, his word as your rule, his love as your motive, his glory as your end, and his blessing as your portion. 6. Pitcher broken at the fountain. In the verse before us we may suppose the heart to be the "fountain;" the great artery which receives the blood immediately from it, to be distributed through all the rest, may be intended by the "pitcher;" and when, at death, this vessel loses its elastic propelling power, ceases to act, collapses, and lies empty and useless, the "pitcher is broken at the fountain." The wheel. The wheel was a power by which the water was drawn from the cistern, or pit. It may be understood to represent the lungs, the organ of respiration. And this indeed seems to be the great impelling power of the whole living system, on which depend all the effective movements of the heart itself, and consequently of every other part of the animal frame. The discovery of this most wonderful and beautiful process (the circulation of the blood) being attributed to an anatomist of our own country, at a period comparatively very recent, it may be reckoned extravagant to suppose the knowledge of it to have been possessed by Solomon in so remote an age of antiquity. It is not at all impossible, however, that this knowledge might then have existed, and, like some other branches of science, have been subsequently lost, which does not in the least detract from the praise due to the modern discoverer. It seems exceedingly unlikely that the circulation of the blood should have been an entire secret till so late as the beginning of the seventeenth century. Passages have been quoted from different writers, which seem to prove that it was not unknown to the ancients, whatever uses they made of their acquaintance with it, and in whatever ways they might account for its curious and astonishing phenomena. See Supplementary Note, Lev. xvii. 14. 11. Are given from one shepherd. And these words of the wise "are given from one shepherd." Can there be any hesitation about the meaning of this? The "Shepherd of Israel, who guided Joseph like a flock, he that dwelt between the cherubim," is the original giver of all the words of inspired wisdom The subordinate shepherds, the divinely-commissioned teachers and guides, were many; but they received all their communications from him. The designation is most frequently applied in the Scriptures to the Lord Jesus Christ, the Divine Messiah: compare Ps. xxiii. 1; Isa. xl. 10, 11; Eze. xxxiv. 28; Jno. x. 11; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Pet. v. 4. And as he, the second person of the blessed Trinity, is represented as having, from the beginning, had the immediate conduct of the whole scheme of redemption, it is likely that we should understand the words before us of him. The prophets, who prophesied of the grace that was to come unto the church in the fulness of time, "inquired and investigated diligently, searching what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. Unto whom," (says the apostle Peter,) "it was revealed that not unto themselves, but unto us, they did minister the things which are now reported unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," 1 Pet. i. 10—12. Thus the Spirit that spoke by the prophets and by the apostles is the same. The words of the wise are "the true sayings of God," to be received by us as such, with humble reverence, lively gratitude, constant remembrance, and prompt and universal obedience. 13. Fear God, and keep his commandments. The fear of God is, in Scripture, generally put for the whole of true religion in the heart, and is, not unfrequently, inclusive also of its practical results in the life. Those who "fear God," and those who have "no fear of God before their eyes," are the two great descriptions of mankind. Wherever the fear of God exists in the heart, there will follow the keeping of his commandments in the life, and it is from the latter that we are to judge of the former. God's name is not feared when his commandments are not obeyed. Practice is the test of principle, the only sure criterion of all profession. It is the two together that constitute true religion. The heart must be "right with God," and the life must prove its rectitude. "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding;" "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all they that do his commandments," Job xxviii. 28; Ps. cxi. 10. It is necessary, however, to remind you, that the true fear of God, and the obedience thence resulting, must be founded in the faith of that testimony concerning himself which he has given us in his word. Before man had sinned it was the law, or authoritative appointment of God, that he should hold his life of original blessedness, on the condition of his continued innocence. But the moment man fell, and became a sinner, his case was necessarily altered; and it is now equally the law, or authoritative appointment of God, that, as a sinner, he must owe his forgiveness and happiness to sovereign grace and mercy, through faith in a Mediator. The reception given to the offers of a free salvation is now the test of loyalty or of rebellion. That man retains in his bosom the spirit of a rebel, who persists in attempting what God has declared impossible, and in flattering himself he can do without what God has pronounced indispensable; who flies in the face of his most explicit assurances, that "by the works of the law no flesh living shall be justified," and still "goes about to establish his own righteousness;" who puts in his claim for right, when he should present his petition for favour; who, openly or secretly, in words or in heart, introduces his own name into that plea, from which the Most High has excluded every name in or under heaven but the name of his Son; who professes to seek the favour of God by "keeping his commandments," and forgets that "this is his commandment,"—and, to a sinful creature, necessarily the first of all his commandments,—"that he believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ." The whole duty of man. The word duty is, in this translation, supplementary. The expression in the original, "This is the whole of man," has not, that I am aware of, any parallels by which it might be illustrated. The supplement of the word duty destroys its evidently designed comprehensiveness. True religion,—the fear and service of God,—is the honour and the happiness of man in the present life; and what is infinitely more, it embraces his entire existence as an immortal being, and secures his honour and happiness for the life to come. The honour and the happiness of such a being can never be truly estimated without viewing him in his relation to eternity. A life of true religion is the only life that yields present enjoyment worthy of his spiritual and deathless nature; and it is the only life that can ever END WELL. "Fear God, and keep his commandments, for THIS IS ALL THAT CONCERNETH MAN," is a sentiment that will be seen and felt in all its truth and importance, in that solemn day that shall wind up and close the eventful history of our world, and fix, by an irrepealable sentence, the eternal destiny of every child of Adam.

and caused those who survived or came after him not to rejoice in him. The idea seems to be that however great a man may be in his time, he may be succeeded by generations who will hold him in small esteem.

v. 1. This verse is often made the closing verse of chap. iv. Its sense is disputed. It may be closely rendered, "Keep thy feet when thou goest to the house of God, and be nearer to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools: for they do not know that they do evil." The ancient versions vary from each other and from the Hebrew text. Dr. Ginsburg, as often, is very arbitrary in the latter clause: "for it is nearer to obey than to offer the sacrifice of the disobedient, as they who obey know not to do evil." We think the last clause means that fools or imprudent people do evil in their very acts of religion, though without noticing or reflecting upon it. As elsewhere, the "prayer of the wicked is an abomination." Outward acts of worship, without corresponding disposition and life, are worse than worthless.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

ALL Scripture, we are sure, is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for the support and advancement of the interests of his kingdom among men; and it is never the less so for there being found in it some things dark, "and hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest to their own destruction." In our belief, both of the Divine extraction and of the spiritual exposition of this book, we are confirmed by the ancient, constant, and concurring testimony, both of the church of the Jews, (to whom were committed the oracles of God, and who never made any doubt of the authority of this book,) and of the Christian church, which happily succeeds them in that trust of honour. I. It must be confessed, on the one hand, that if he that barely reads this book be asked, as the eunuch was, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" he will have more reason than he had to say, "How can I, except some man shall guide me?" The books of Scripture history and prophecy are very like one another, but this Song of Solomon's is very unlike the songs of his father David. Here is not the name of God in it, it is never quoted in the New Testament; we find not in it any expressions of natural religion or pious devotion, no, nor is it introduced by vision, or any of the marks of immediate revelation. It seems as hard as any part of Scripture to be made "a savour of life unto life," nay, and to those who come to the reading of it with carnal minds and corrupt affections, it is in danger of being made "a savour of death unto death." It is a flower out of which they extract poison, and therefore the Jewish doctors advised their young people not to read it till they were thirty years old, lest, by the abuse of that which is most pure and sacred, (horrendum dictu!—'horrible to say!') the flames of lust should be kindled with fire from heaven, which is intended for the altar only. But, II. It must be confessed, on the other hand, that, with the help of the many faithful guides we have for the understanding of this book, it appears to be a very bright and powerful ray of heavenly light, admirably fitted to excite pious and devout affections in holy souls, to draw out their desires towards God, to increase their delight in him, and improve their acquaintance and communion with him. It is an allegory, the letter of which kills those who rest in that, and look no farther, but the spirit of which giveth life, 2 Cor. iii. 6; Jno. vi. 63. It is a parable, which makes Divine things more difficult to those who do not love them, but more plain and pleasant to those that do, Mat. xiii. 14, 16. Experienced Christians here find a counterpart of their experiences, and to them it is intelligible, while they neither understand it nor relish it who have no part or lot in the matter. It is a song, an epithalamium or nuptial song, wherein, by the expressions of love between a bridegroom and his bride, is set forth and illustrated the mutual affections that pass between God and a distinguished remnant of mankind. It is a pastoral; the bride and bridegroom, for the more lively representation of humility and innocence, are brought in as a shepherd and his shepherdess. Now, 1. This song might easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Jewish church, for whose use it was first composed, and was so taken, as appears by the Chaldee paraphrase and the most ancient Jewish expositors. God betrothed the people of Israel to himself, he entered into covenant with them, and it was a marriage covenant. He had given abundant proofs of his love to them, and required of them that they should love him with all their heart and soul. Idolatry was often spoken of as spiritual adultery, and doting upon idols, to prevent which this song was penned, representing the complacency which God took in Israel, and which Israel ought to take in God, and encouraging them to continue faithful to him, though he might seem sometimes to withdraw and hide himself from them, and to wait for the farther manifestation of himself in the promised Messiah. 2. It may more easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Christian church, because the condescensions and communications of Divine love appear more rich and free under the Gospel than they did under the law, and the communion between heaven and earth more familiar. God sometimes spoke of himself as the husband of the Jewish church, Isa. lxiv. 5; Hos. ii. 16, 19, and rejoiced in it as his bride, Isa. lxii. 4, 5; but more frequently is Christ represented as the bridegroom of his church, Mat. xxv. 1; Rom. vii. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 32; and the church as the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. xix. 7; xxi. 2, 9. Pursuant to this metaphor, Christ and the church in general, Christ and particular believers, are here discoursing with abundance of mutual esteem and endearment. The best key to this book is the 45th psalm, which we find applied to Christ in the New Testament, and therefore this ought to be so too. It requires some pains to find out what may probably be the meaning of the Holy Spirit in the several parts of this book; as David's songs are many of them level to the capacity of the meanest, and there are shallows in them in which a lamb may wade, so this of Solomon's will exercise the capacities of the most learned, and there are depths in it in which an elephant may swim. But when the meaning is found out, it will be of admirable use to excite pious and devout affections in us; and the same truths which are plainly laid down in other scriptures, when they are extracted out of this, come to the soul with a more pleasing power. When we apply ourselves to the study of this book we must not only, with Moses and Joshua, put off our shoe from off our foot, and even forget that we have bodies, because the place where we stand is holy ground; but we must, with John, come up hither, must spread our wings, take a noble flight, and soar upwards, till, by faith and holy love, we enter into the holiest, for this is no other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.

A.M. 2990. B.C. 1014.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter, after the title of the book, ver. 1, we have Christ and his church, Christ and a believer, expressing their esteem for each other. I. The bride, the church, speaks to the bridegroom, ver. 2—4; to the daughters of Jerusalem, ver. 5, 6; and then to the bridegroom, ver. 7. II. Christ, the bridegroom, speaks in answer to the complaints and requests of his spouse, ver. 8—11. III. The church expresseth the great value she has for Christ, and the delights she takes in communion with him, ver. 12—14. IV. Christ commends the church's beauty, ver. 15; And, V. The church returns the commendation, ver. 16, 17. Where there is a fire of true love to Christ in the heart, this will be of use to blow it up into a flame.

THE song of songs, which is Solomon's

We have here the title of this book, shewing,

First. The nature of it. It is a song, that it might the better answer the intention, which is to stir up the affections, and to heat them, which poetry will be very instrumental to do. The subject is pleasing, and therefore fit to be treated of in a song, in singing of which we may make melody with our hearts unto the Lord. It is evangelical, and gospel times should be times of joy, for gospel grace puts a new song into our mouths, Ps. xcviii. 1.

Secondly. The dignity of it. It is the song of songs, that is, a most excellent song, not only above any human composure, or above all the other songs which Solomon penned, but even above any other of the Scripture songs, as having more of Christ in it.

Thirdly. The penman of it. It is Solomon's; it is not the song of fools, as many of the songs of love are, but the song of the wisest of men. Nor can any man give a better proof of his wisdom than to celebrate the love of God to mankind, and to excite his own and others' love to God. Solomon's songs were a thousand and five, 1 Kin. iv. 32. Those that were of other subjects are lost, but this of seraphic love remains, and will to the end of time. Solomon, like his father, was addicted to poetry, and which way soever a man's genius lies, he should endeavour to honour God and edify the church with it. One of Solomon's names was Jedidiah, 'Beloved of the Lord,' 2 Sam. xii. 25. And none so fit to write of the Lord's love as he that had himself so great an interest in it; none of all the apostles wrote so much of love as he that was himself the beloved disciple, and lay in Christ's bosom. Solomon, as a king, had great affairs to mind and manage, which took up much of his thoughts and time, yet he found heart and leisure for this and other religious exercises. Men of business ought to be devout men, and not think their business will excuse them from that which is every man's great business, to keep up communion with God. It is not certain when Solomon penned this sacred song; some think he penned it after he recovered himself by the grace of God from his backslidings, as a farther proof of his repentance; and as if by doing good to many with this song, he would atone for the hurt he had perhaps done, with loose, vain, amorous songs when he loved many strange wives; now he turned his wit the right way. It is more probable he penned it in the beginning of his time, while he kept close to God, and kept up his communion with him; and perhaps he put this song with his father's psalms into the hands of the chief musician, for the service of the temple, not without a key to it for the right understanding of it. Some think it was penned upon occasion of his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, but that is uncertain. The tower of Lebanon, which i. 1. This verse is, undoubtedly, the title of the book, and is intended to ascribe the authorship to Solomon. There is, nevertheless, much difference of opinion on the subject. Some believe the verse neither original nor correct, while others regard it as an authoritative statement that Solomon was the author. In recent times not a few of the most orthodox critics agree with Mr. Thrupp, who candidly says, "The internal evidence of the Song itself does not, when fairly weighed, confirm us in the conclusion that Solomon should be viewed as the author; but of those who question the Solomonic authorship many assign an antiquity to the book almost as great." The earliest evidence on the subject is that of the Septuagint, which refers the book to Solomon, and that is still the more popular opinion. Equally divided are critics respecting the plan and intention of the book. The Sinaitic MS. exhibits an early and peculiar arrangement in four parts, as follows:—1. chap. i. 1—14; 2. chap. i. 15—iii. 5; 3. chap. iii. 6—vi. 3; 4. chap. vi. 4—viii. 14.

is mentioned in this book, ch. vii. 4. was not built, as is supposed, till long after that marriage. We may reasonably think, when in the height of his prosperity, he loved the Lord, 1 Kin. iii. 3, he thus "served him with joyfulness and gladness of heart in the abundance of all things." It may be rendered, 'The song of songs which is concerning Solomon,' who, as the son and successor of David, on whom the covenant of royalty was entailed as the founder of the temple, and one that excelled in wisdom and wealth, was a type of Christ, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and yet is a greater than Solomon; it is a song concerning him. It is here fitly placed after Ecclesiastes, for when by that book we are thoroughly convinced of the vanity of the creature and its insufficiency to satisfy us, and make a happiness for us, we shall be quickened to seek for happiness in the love of Christ, and that true transcendent pleasure which is to be found only in communion with God through him. The voice in the wilderness, that was to prepare Christ's way, cried, "All flesh is grass."

2 Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth:
For thy love is better than wine.
3 Because of the savour of thy good ointments
Thy name is as ointment poured forth,
Therefore do the virgins love thee.
4 Draw me, we will run after thee:
The king hath brought me into his chambers:
We will be glad and rejoice in thee,
We will remember thy love more than wine:
The upright love thee.
5 I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem,
As the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.
6 Look not upon me, because I am black
Because the sun hath looked upon me:
My mother's children were angry with me;
They made me the keeper of the vineyards;
But mine own vineyard have I not kept.

BLACK TENTS OF KEDAR.

The spouse of this dramatic poem is here first introduced addressing herself to the bridegroom, and then to the daughters of Jerusalem.

First. To the bridegroom; not giving him any name or title, but beginning abruptly, "Let him kiss me;" like Mary Magdalene to the supposed gardener, Jno. xx. 25, "If thou have borne him hence," meaning Christ, but not naming him. The heart had been before taken up with the thoughts of him, and to this relative those thoughts were the antecedent, that good matter which the heart was inditing. Ps. xlv. 1. And they that are full of Christ themselves are ready to think others should be so too.

Two things the spouse desires, and pleaseth herself with the thoughts of:

1. The bridegroom's friendship; ver. 2, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth;" that is, be reconciled to me, and let me know that he is so; let me have the tokens of his favour. Thus the Old Testament church desired Christ's manifesting himself in the flesh, to be no longer under the law as a schoolmaster, and that dispensation of bondage and terror, but to receive the communications of Divine grace in the Gospel, in which God is reconciling the world unto himself, binding up and healing what by the law was torn and smitten, as the mother kisseth the child that she has chidden. Let him no longer send to me, but come himself; no longer speak by angels and prophets, but let me have the words of his own mouth, those gracious words, Lu. iv. 22, which will be to me as the kisses of his mouth, sure tokens of reconciliation, as Esau's kissing Jacob was. All gospel duty is summed up in our kissing the Son, Ps. ii. 12. So all gospel grace is summed up in his kissing us, as the father of the prodigal's kissing him when he returned a penitent. It is a kiss of peace. Kisses are opposed to wounds, Pr. xxvii. 6; so are the kisses of grace to the wounds of the law. Thus all true believers earnestly desire the manifestations of Christ's love to their souls; they desire no more to make them happy but the assurances of his favour, the lifting up of the light of his countenance upon them, Ps. iv. 4, 6, 7; and the knowledge of that love of his which passeth knowledge; this is the one thing they desire, Ps. xxvii. 4. They are ready to welcome the manifestation of Christ's love to their souls by his Spirit, and to return them in the humble professions of love to him and complacency in him above all. 'The fruit of his lips is peace, Isa. lvii. 19. Let him give me ten thousand kisses, whose very fruition makes us desire him the more, and whereas all other pleasures sour and wither by using, those of his Spirit become more delightful,' so Bishop Reynolds.

She gives several reasons for this desire:

1st. Because of the great esteem she had for his love; "Thy love is better than wine." "Wine makes glad the heart, revives the drooping spirits, and exhilarates them, but gracious souls take more pleasure in loving Christ and being loved of him, in the fruits and gifts of his love, and in the pledges and assurances of it, than any man ever took in the most exquisite delights of sense; and it is more reviving to them than ever the richest cordial was to one ready to faint. Note, First. Christ's love is in itself, and in the account of all the saints, more valuable and desirable than the best entertainments this world can give. Secondly. Those only may expect the kisses of Christ's mouth, and the comfortable tokens of his favour, who prefer his love before all the delights of the children of men; would rather forego those delights than forfeit his favour, and take more pleasure in spiritual joys than in any bodily refreshments whatsoever. Observe here the change of the person, "Let him kiss me;" there she speaks of him as absent, or as if she were afraid to speak to him; but in the next words she sees him near at hand, and therefore directs her speech to him: Thy love, thy loves, (so the word is,) I so earnestly desire, because I highly esteem it.

2nd. Because of the diffusive fragrancy of his love, and the fruits of it; ver. 3, "Because of the savour of thy good ointments," that is, the agreeableness and acceptableness of thy graces and comforts to all that rightly understand both them and themselves, "thy name is as ointment poured forth," that is, thou art so, and all that whereby thou hast made thyself known; thy very name is precious to all the saints; it is an ointment and perfume which rejoice the heart. The unfolding of Christ's name is as the opening of a box of precious ointment which the room is filled with the odour of; the preaching of his Gospel was the manifesting of the savour of his knowledge in every place, 2 Cor. ii. 14. The Spirit was the oil of gladness wherewith Christ was anointed, Heb. i. 9; and all true believers have that unction, 1 Jno. ii. 27; so that he is precious to them, and they to him, and one to another. A good name is as precious ointment, but Christ's name is more fragrant than any other. Wisdom, like oil, makes the face to shine, but the Redeemer outshines in beauty all others. The name of Christ is not now like ointment sealed up, as it had been long, ("Ask not after my name, for it is secret,") but like ointment poured forth, which notes both the freeness and fulness of the communications of his grace by the Gospel.

3rd. Because of the general affection that all holy souls have to him; "Therefore do the virgins love thee." It is Christ's love shed abroad in our hearts that draws them out in love to him; all that are pure from the corruptions of sin, that preserve the chastity of their own spirits, and are true to the vows by which they have devoted themselves unto God, that not only suffer not their affections to be violated, but cannot bear so much as to be solicited by the world and the flesh; those are the virgins that love Jesus Christ, and follow him whithersoever he goes, Rev. xiv. 3. And because Christ is the darling of all the pure in heart, let him be ours, and let our desire be towards him and towards the kisses of his mouth.

2. The bridegroom's fellowship, ver. 4. Observe here,

1st. Her petition for Divine grace; "Draw me." This implies sense of distance from him, desire of union with him; draw me to thyself, draw me nearer, draw me home to thee. She had prayed that he would draw nigh to her, ver. 2; in order to that she prays that he would draw her nigh to him. "Draw me," not only with the moral suasion which there is in the fragrancy of the good ointments, not only with the attractives of that name which is as ointment poured forth, but with supernatural grace, with the cords of a man and the bands of love, Hos. xi. 4. Christ has told us that none come to him but such as the Father draws, Jno. vi. 44. We are not only weak, and cannot come of ourselves any farther than we are helped, but we are naturally backward and averse to come, and therefore must pray for those influences and operations of the Spirit, by the power of which we are of unwilling made willing, Ps. cx. 3. "Draw me," else I move not; overpower the world and the flesh that would draw me from thee. We are not driven to Christ, but drawn in such a way as is agreeable to rational creatures.

2nd. Her promise to improve that grace; "Draw me, and" then "we will run after thee." See how the doctrine of special and effectual grace consists with our duty, and is a powerful engagement and encouragement to it, and yet reserves all the glory of all the good that is in us to God only. Observe, First. The flowing forth of the soul after Christ, and its ready compliance with him, is the effect of his grace; we could not run after him if he did not draw us, 2 Cor. iii. 5; Phil. iv. 13. Secondly. The grace which God gives us we must diligently improve. When Christ, by his Spirit, draws us, we must, with our spirits, run after him; as God saith, I will, and you shall, Eze. xxxvi. 27, so we must say, Thou shalt, and we will; thou shalt work in us both to will and to do, and therefore we will work out our own salvation, Phil. ii. 12, 13. Not only we will walk, but we will run after thee, which notes eagerness of desire, readiness of affection, vigour of pursuit, and swiftness of motion. "When thou shalt enlarge my heart, then I will run the way of thy commandments," Ps. cxix. 32; when thy right hand upholds me, then my soul follows hard after thee, Ps. lxiii. 8; when with lovingkindness to us he draws us, Jer. xxxi. 3, we with lovingkindness to him must run after him, Isa. xl. 31. Observe the difference between the petition and the promise; Draw me, and then we will run. When Christ pours out his Spirit upon the church in general, which is his bride, all the members of it do from thence receive enlivening, quickening influences, and are made to run to him with the more cheerfulness, Isa. lv. 5. Or, Draw me, saith the believing soul, and then I will not only follow thee myself as fast as I can, but will bring all mine along with me, we will run after thee, I and the virgins that love thee, ver. 3; I and all that I have any interest in, or influence upon, I and my house, Josh. xxiv. 15; I and the transgressors whom I will teach thy ways, Ps. li. 13. Those that put themselves forth in compliance with Divine grace, their zeal will provoke many, 2 Cor. ix. 2. Those that are lively will be active, (when Philip was

The respective sections are broken up into smaller portions, which are ascribed to different speakers, under different circumstances. According to this, the form was, in a certain sense, dramatic, and the intention allegorical, the bridegroom being Christ. A vast number of expositors have treated it as a mysterious allegory, representing the love of Christ and the Church. Especially in modern times, however, the literal interpretation has been advocated by scholars of eminence. The idea that the historical basis is the marriage of Solomon with an Egyptian princess has always been popular, but there are internal objections to it which are not easily removed. Expositors have exhausted their powers of imagination in attempts to develop and apply the throng of bold Oriental images which crowd the composition from first to last. No wonder that opinions on the subject are so extremely diverse.

i. 2. This is the language of the bride, whether that word is to be understood literally, or of Wisdom, as some old writers have drawn to Christ, he drew Nathanael,) and they will be exemplary, and so will win those that would not be won by the word.

3rd. The immediate answer that was given to this prayer; "The king hath" drawn me, hath "brought me into his chambers." It is not so much an answer fetched by faith from the word of Christ's grace as an answer fetched by experience from the workings of his grace. If we observe as we ought the returns of prayer, we may find that sometimes, while we are yet speaking, Christ hears, Isa. lxv. 24. The bridegroom is a king; so much the more wonderful is his condescension in the invitations and entertainments that he gives us, and so much the greater reason have we to accept of them and to run after him. God is the king that has made the marriage supper for his Son, Mat. xxii. 2, and brings in even the poor and the maimed, and even the most shy and bashful are compelled to come in. They that are drawn to Christ are brought not only into his courts, into his palaces, Ps. xlv. 15, but into his presence-chamber, where his secret is with them, Ps. xxv. 14; where he is free with them, Job xiv. 21; and where they are safe in his pavilion, Ps. xxvii. 5; Isa. xxvi. 20. Those that wait at wisdom's gates shall be made to come (so the word is) into her chambers, they shall be led into truth and comfort.

4th. The wonderful complacency which the spouse takes in the honour which the king put upon her. Being brought into the chamber, First. We have what we would have; our desires are crowned with unspeakable delights; all our griefs vanish, and we will be glad and rejoice. If a day in the courts, much more an hour in the chambers, is better than a thousand, than ten thousand elsewhere. They that are through grace brought into covenant and communion with God have reason to go on their way rejoicing, as the eunuch, Acts viii. 39, and that joy will enlarge our heart and be our strength, Neh. viii. 9. Secondly. All our joy shall centre in God. "We will rejoice," not in the ointments, or the chambers, but "in thee;" it is God only that is our exceeding joy, Ps. xliii. 4. We have no joy but in Christ, and which we are indebted to him for. Gaudium in Domino,—'Joy in the Lord,'—was the ancient salutation, and Salus in Domine sempiterna,—'Eternal salvation in the Lord.' Thirdly. We will retain the relish and savour of this kindness of thine, and never forget it. "We will remember thy loves more than wine;" not only thy love itself, ver. 2, but the very remembrance of it, shall be more grateful to us than the strongest cordial to the spirits, or the most palatable liquor to the taste. We will remember to give thanks for thy love, and it shall make more durable impressions upon us than any thing in this world.

5th. The communion which a gracious soul hath with all the saints in this communion with Christ. In the chambers to which we are brought we not only meet with him, but meet with one another, 1 Jno. i. 7, for "the upright love thee;" the congregation, the generation of the upright love thee. Whatever others do, all that are Israelites indeed, and faithful to God, will love Jesus Christ. Whatever differences of apprehension and affection there may be among Christians in other things, this they are all agreed in, Jesus Christ is precious to them. The upright here are the same with the virgins, ver. 3. All that remember his love more than wine will love him with a superlative love. Nor is any love acceptable to Christ but the love of the upright, love in sincerity, Eph. vi. 24.

Secondly. The spouse applies herself to the daughters of Jerusalem, ver. 5, 6. The church in general, being in distress, speaks to particular churches to guard them against the danger they were in, of being offended at the church's sufferings, 1 Thes. iii. 3. Or, the believer speaks to those that were professors at large in the church, but not of it, or to weak Christians, babes in Christ, that labour under much ignorance, infirmity, and mistake, not perfectly instructed, and yet willing to be taught in the things of God. She observed these bystanders look disdainfully upon her, because of her blackness, in respect both of sins and sufferings, upon the account of which they thought she had little reason to expect the kisses she wished for, ver. 2; or to expect that they should join with her in her joys, ver. 4. She therefore endeavours to remove this offence; she owns she is black. Guilt blackens; the heresies, scandals, and offences that happen in the church make her black; and the best saints have their failings. Sorrow blackens; that seems to be especially meant. The church is often in a low condition, mean and poor, and appearing despicable; her beauty sullied, and her face foul with weeping. She is in mourning weeds, clothed with sackcloth, as the Nazarites that were become blacker than a coal, Lam. iv. 8 Now, to take off this offence,

1. She asserts her own comeliness notwithstanding; ver. 5, "I am black, but comely;" black as the tents of Kedar, in which the shepherds lived, which were very coarse, and never whitened, weather-beaten, and discoloured, by long use; but comely "as the curtains of Solomon," the furniture of whose rooms, no doubt, was sumptuous, and rich in proportion to the stateliness of his houses. The church is sometimes black with persecution, but comely in patience, constancy, and consolation, and nevertheless amiable in the eyes of Christ; black in the account of men, but comely in God's esteem; black in some that are a scandal to her, but comely in others that are sincere and are an honour to her. True believers are black in themselves, but comely in Christ, with the comeliness that he puts upon them; black outwardly, for the world knows them not, but all glorious within, Ps. xlv. 13. St. Paul was weak, and yet strong, 2 Cor. xii. 10; and so the church, black and yet comely; a believer, a sinner, and yet a saint. His own righteousnesses are as filthy rags, but he is clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness. The Chaldee paraphrase applies it to the people of Israel's blackness, when they made the golden calf, and their comeliness when they repented of it.

2. She gives an account how she came to be so black. The blackness was not natural, but contracted, and was owing to the hard usage that had been given her; "Look not upon me," so scornfully "because I am black." We must take heed with what eye we look upon the church, especially when she is in black; "Thou shouldst not have looked upon the day of thy brother," the day of his affliction, Obad. 12. Be not offended, for

1st. I am black by reason of my sufferings; "The sun hath looked upon me." She was fair and comely; whiteness was her proper colour, but she got this blackness by the burthen and heat of the day, which she was forced to bear. She was sunburnt, scorched with tribulation and persecution, Mat. xiii. 6, 21. And the greatest beauties, if exposed to the weather, are soonest tanned. Observe how she mitigates her troubles. She doth not say as Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 40, "in the day the drought consumed me," only "the sun has looked upon me," for it becomes not God's suffering people to make the worst of their sufferings. But what was the matter? First. She fell under the displeasure of those of her own house: "My mother's children were angry with me." She was in perils by false brethren; her foes were those of her own house, Mat. x. 21. Brethren by nature, as men; by profession, members of the same sacred corporation; the children of the church her mother, but not of God her father. They were angry with her; the Samaritans that claimed kindred to the Jews were vexed at any thing that tended to the prosperity of Jerusalem, Neh. ii. 10. Note, It is no new thing for the people of God to fall under the anger of their own mother's children; "It was thou, a man, mine equal," Ps. lv. 12, 13. This makes the trouble the more irksome and grievous; from such it is taken unkindly, and the anger of such is implacable; "a brother offended is hard to be won," Secondly. They dealt very hardly with her; "They made me the keeper of the vineyards;" that is, 1st. They seduced me to sin, drew me into false worships, to serve their gods, which was like dressing their vineyards, keeping the vine of Sodom. And they would not let me keep my own vineyard, serve my own God, and observe those pure worships which he gave me in charge, and which I do and ever will own for mine. These are the grievances which good people complain most of in a time of persecution, that their consciences are forced, and those that rule them with rigour say to their souls, "Bow down, that we may go over," Isa. li. 23. Or, 2nd. They brought me into trouble, imposed that upon me which was toilsome, and burthensome, and very disgraceful. Keeping the vineyards was base servile work, and very laborious, Isa. lxi. 5. Her mother's children made her the drudge of the family; "Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce, and their wrath, for it was cruel." The spouse of Christ has met with a great deal of hard usage.

2nd. My sufferings are such as I have deserved; for "my own vineyard have I not kept." How unrighteous soever my brethren are in persecuting me, God is righteous in permitting them to do so; I am justly made a slavish keeper of men's vineyards, because I have been a careless keeper of the vineyards God hath intrusted me with. Slothful servants of God are justly made to serve their enemies, "that they may know my service and the service of the kings of the countries," 2 Chr. xii. 8; Deu. xxviii. 47, 48; Eze. xx. 24. Think not the worse of the ways of God for my sufferings, for I smart for my own folly. Note, When God's people are oppressed and persecuted, it becomes them to acknowledge their own sin to be the procuring cause of their troubles, especially their carelessness in keeping their vineyard, so that it has been like the field of the slothful.

7 Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest,
Where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon:
For why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?
8 If thou know not, O thou fairest among women,
Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock,
And feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.
9 I have compared thee, O my love,
To a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots
10 Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels,
Thy neck with chains of gold.
11 We will make thee borders of gold
With studs of silver.

BRIDE'S DRESS.

Here is, First. The humble petition which the spouse presents to her beloved, the shepherdess to the shepherd, the church and every believer to Christ, for a more free and intimate communion with him. She turns from the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom she had complained both of her sins and of her troubles, and looks up to heaven for relief and succour against both, ver. 7. Where observe, 1. The title she gives to Christ; "O thou whom my soul loveth." Note, It is the undoubted character of all true believers, that their souls love Jesus Christ, which intimates both the sincerity and the strength of their love; they love him with all their hearts; and they that do so may come to him boldly, and may humbly plead it with him. 2. The opinion she has of him as the good shepherd of the sheep. She doubts not but he feeds his flock, and makes them rest at noon. Jesus Christ graciously provides both repast and repose for his sheep. They are not starved, but well fed; not scattered upon the mountains, but fed together, fed in green pastures; and in the hot time of the day led by the still waters, and made to lie down under a cool, refreshing shade. Is it with God's people a noontime of outward troubles, inward conflicts? Christ hath rest for them; he carries them in his arms, Isa. xl. 11. 3. Her request to him that she might be admitted into his society; "Tell me where thou feedest." Those that would be told, that would be taught what they are concerned to know and do, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ, and beg of him to teach them, to tell them. Tell me where to find thee, where I may have conversation with thee, where thou feedest and tendest thy flock, that there I may have some of thy company. Observe by the way, We should not, in love to our friends and their company, tempt them or urge them to neglect their business, but desire such an enjoyment of them as will consist with it, and rather, if we can, to join with them in their business, and help to forward it. "Tell me where thou feedest," and there I will sit with thee, walk with thee, feed my flocks with thine, and not hinder thee nor myself neither, but bring my work with me. Note, They whose souls love Jesus Christ earnestly desire to have communion with him, by his word in which he speaks to us, and by prayer in which we speak to him; and to share in the privileges of his flock. And we may learn, from the care he takes of his church, to provide convenient food and rest for it, how to take care of our own souls, which are our charge. 4. The plea she useth for the enforcing this request; "For why should I be as one that turneth aside by" or after "the flocks of thy companions," that pretend to be so, but thought, or of the Church, as generally believed. The abrupt change of person from the third to the second is possibly explained by the sudden appearance of the bridegroom upon the scene. The second clause is literally, "for better are thy loves than wine."

i. 5. Render, "I am swarthy and beautiful." "Daughters of Jerusalem" can here mean literally nothing but "women of Jerusalem," although the phrase "daughter of Jerusalem" denotes Jerusalem. "Tents of Kedar" are mentioned in Psa. cxx. 5. Reference is supposed to be made to a nomadic Arab tribe, so prominent that in the Targum all Arabians are so called. The word Kedar means dark, swarthy, or black, and probably the tents of Kedar were of black goats' or camels' hair cloth. "The curtains of Solomon" must be some beautiful embroidered or ornamented hangings, but whether in the Temple or in the palace is not indicated. The comparison is, "I am black as the tents of Kedar; I am beautiful as the curtains of Solomon."

are really thy competitors and rivals with thee. Note, Turning aside from Christ after other lovers is that which gracious souls dread and deprecate more than any thing else. Thou wouldst not have me to turn aside, no, nor to be as one that turneth aside. Tell me then, O tell me, where I may be near thee, and I will never leave thee. 1st. Why should I lie under suspicion, and look as if I belonged to some other, and not to thee? Why should I be thought by the flocks of our companions to be a deserter from thee, and a retainer to some other shepherd? Good Christians will be afraid of giving any occasion to those about them to question their faith in Christ and their love to him. They would not do any thing that looks like unconcernedness about their souls or uncharitableness towards their brethren, or that savours of indifferency and disaffection to holy ordinances. And we should pray to God to direct us into and keep us in the way of our duty, that we may not so much as seem to come short, Heb. iv. 1. 2nd. Why should I lie in temptation to turn aside, as I do while I am absent from thee? We should be earnest with God for a settled peace in communion with God through Christ, that we may not be as waifs and strays, ready to be picked up by him that next passeth by.

Secondly. The gracious answer which the bridegroom gives to this request, ver. 8. See how ready God is to answer prayer, especially prayers for instruction; even while she is yet speaking he hears. Observe, 1. How affectionately he speaks to her; "O thou fairest among women." Note, Believing souls are fair in the eyes of the Lord Jesus above any other. Christ sees a beauty in holiness, whether we do or no. The spouse had called herself black, but Christ calls her fair. Those that are low in their own eyes are so much the more amiable in the eyes of Jesus Christ. Blushing at their own deformity (saith Mr. Durham) is a chief part of their beauty. 2. How mildly he checks her for her ignorance, in these words, "If thou know not," intimating that she might have known it, if it had not been her own fault. What! dost thou not know me and my flock? Compare Christ's answer to a like address of Philip's, Jno. xiv. 9, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" But, 3. With what tenderness he acquaints her where she might find him. If men say, "Lo here is Christ, or Lo he is there, believe them not, go not after them," Mat. xxiv. 23, 26. But, 1st. Walk in the way of good men, Pr. ii. 20, follow the track, ask for the good old way, observe the footsteps of the flock, and go forth by them. It will not serve to sit still and cry, Lord, shew me the way, but we must bestir ourselves to inquire out the way; and we may find it by looking which way the footsteps of the flock lead, what has been the practice of godly people all along, and let that be your practice, Heb. vi. 12; 1 Cor. xi. 1. 2nd. Sit under the conduct of good ministers. Feed thyself and thy kids beside the tents of the under-shepherds; bring thy charge with thee, (and it is probable the custom was to commit the lambs and kids to the custody of the women, the shepherdesses,) they shall all be welcome, the shepherds will be no hindrance to thee, as they were to Reuel's daughters, Ex. ii. 17, but helpers rather, and therefore abide by their tents. Note, Those that would have acquaintance and communion with Christ must closely and conscientiously adhere to holy ordinances, must join themselves to his people, and attend his ministers. Those that have the charge of families must bring them with them to religious assemblies; let their kids, their children, their servants, have the benefit of the shepherds' tents.

Thirdly. The high encomiums which the bridegroom gives of his spouse. To be given in marriage, in the Hebrew dialect, is to be praised, Ps. lxxviii. 63, margin; so this spouse is here. Her husband praiseth this virtuous woman, Pr. xxxi. 28; he praiseth her, as is usual in poems, by similitudes. 1. He calls her his love, ver. 9; it is an endearing compellation often used in this book; My friend, my companion, my familiar. 2. He compares her to a set of strong and stately horses in Pharaoh's chariot. Egypt was famous for the best horses; Solomon had his from thence; and Pharaoh no doubt had the choicest the country afforded for his own chariots. The church had complained of her own weakness, and the danger she was in of being made a prey of by her enemies. Fear not, saith Christ, "I have made thee like a company of horses;" I have put strength into thee, as I have done into the horse, Job xxxix. 19, so that thou shalt with a gracious boldness mock at fear, and not be affrighted, like the lion, Pr. xxviii. 1; "The Lord has made thee as his goodly horse in the day of battle," Zec. x. 3. I have compared thee to my company of horses which triumphed over Pharaoh's chariots, the holy angels, horses of fire; Hab. iii. 15, "Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses;" and see Isa. lxiii. 13. We are weak in ourselves; but if Christ make us as horses, strong and bold, we need not fear what all the powers of darkness can do against us. 3. He admires the beauty and ornaments of her countenance; ver. 10, "Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels," the attire of the head, curls of hair, or favourites, (so some,) or knots of ribbons; "Thy neck also with chains," such as persons of the first rank wear, "chains of gold." The ordinances of Christ are the ornaments of the church; the graces, and gifts, and comforts of the Spirit, are the adorning of every believing soul, and beautify it; these render it in the sight of God of great price. The ornaments of the saints are many, but all orderly disposed in rows and chains, in which there is a mutual connexion with, and dependence upon, each other. The beauty is not from any thing in themselves, from the neck or from the cheeks, but from the ornaments with which they are set off. It was comeliness which I put upon thee, saith the Lord God, for we were born not only naked but polluted, Eze. xvi. 14.

Fourthly. His gracious purpose to add to her ornaments; for where God has given true grace he will give more grace; to him that hath shall be given. Is the church courageous in her resistance of sin, as the horses in Pharaoh's chariots? Is she comely in the exercise of grace, as with the rows of jewels and chains of gold? She shall be yet farther beautified; ver. 11, "We will make thee borders of gold," inlaid or enamelled "with studs of silver." Whatever is wanting shall be made up, till the church and every true believer comes to be perfect in beauty: see Eze. xvi. 14. This is here undertaken to be done by the concurring power of the three persons in the Godhead; We will do it; like that, Gen. i. 26, "Let us make man;" so let us new-make him, and perfect his beauty. The same that is the Author will be the Finisher of the good work, and it cannot miscarry.

12 While the king sitteth at his table,
My spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof
13 A bundle of myrrh is my wellbeloved unto me;
He shall lie all night betwixt my breasts.
My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire
In the vineyards of En-gedi.
Behold, thou art fair, my love;
Behold, thou art fair; thou hast doves' eyes
Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant:
Also our bed is green
17 The beams of our house are cedar,
And our rafters of fir.

CAMPHOR.

Here the conference is carried on between Christ and his spouse, and endearments mutually exchanged.

First. Believers take a great complacency in Christ, and in communion with him: "To you that believe he is precious" above any thing in this world, 1 Pet. ii. 7. Observe,

1. The humble reverence believers have for Christ as their sovereign, ver. 12. He is a king, in respect both of dignity and dominion, he wears the crown of honour, he bears the sceptre of power, both which are the unspeakable satisfaction of all his people. This king has his royal table spread in the Gospel, in which is made for all nations a feast of fat things, Isa. xxv. 6. Wisdom hath furnished her table, Pr. ix. 1. He sits at this table to see his guests, Mat. xxii. 11, to see that nothing be wanting that is fit for them; he sups with them, and they with him, Rev. iii. 20; he hath fellowship with them, and rejoiceth in them. He sits at his table to bid them welcome, and to carve to them, as Christ brake the five loaves, and gave to his disciples that they might distribute to the multitude. He sits there to receive petitions, as Ahasuerus admitted Esther's petition at the banquet of wine. He has promised to be present with his people in his ordinances always. Then believers do him all the honour they can, and study how to express their esteem of him and gratitude to him, as Mary did when she anointed his head with the ointment of spikenard that was very costly, one pound of it worth three hundred pence, and so fragrant that "the house was filled with the" pleasing "odour of it," Jno. xii. 3; which story seems as if it were designed to refer to this passage, for Christ was then sitting at table. When good Christians, in any religious duty, especially in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, where the king is pleased as it were to sit with us at his own table, have their graces exercised, their hearts broken by repentance, healed by faith, and inflamed with holy love and desire towards Christ, with joyful expectations of the glory to be revealed, then the "spikenard sends forth the smell thereof." Christ is pleased to reckon himself honoured by it, and to accept of it as an instance of respect to him, as it was in the wise men of the East, who paid their homage to the newborn king of the Jews, by presenting to him frankincense and myrrh. The graces of God's Spirit in the hearts of believers are exceeding precious in themselves, and pleasing to Christ, and his presence in ordinances draws them out into act and exercise. If he withdraw, graces wither and languish, as plants in the absence of the sun. If he approach, the face of the soul is renewed, as of the earth in the spring; and then it is time to bestir ourselves, that we may not lose the gleam, not lose the gale; for nothing is done acceptably but what grace doth, Heb. xii. 28.

2. The strong affection they have for Christ as their beloved, their well-beloved, ver. 13. Christ is not only beloved by all believing souls, but is their well-beloved, their best beloved, their only beloved; he has that place in their hearts which no rival can be admitted to, the innermost and uppermost place. Observe, 1st. How Christ is accounted of by all believers; he is a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire, something, we may be sure, nay, every thing, that is pleasant and delightful. The doctrine of his Gospel, and the comforts of his Spirit, are very refreshing to them, and they rest in his love. None of all the delights of sense are comparable to the spiritual pleasure they have in meditating on Christ, and enjoying him. There is a complicated sweetness in Christ, and an abundance of it; there is a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire: we are not straitened in him in whom there is all fulness. The word translated camphire is copher, the same word that signifies an atonement or propitiation. Christ is a cluster of merit and righteousness to all believers; therefore he is dear to them, because is the propitiation for their sins. Observe what a stress the spouse lays upon the application; he is unto me, and again unto me, all that is sweet; whatever he is to others, he is so to me; he loved me, and gave himself for me; is my Lord, and my God. 2nd. How he is accepted; "he shall lie all night between my breasts," near my heart. Christ lays the beloved disciples in his bosom: Why then should not they lay their beloved Saviour in their bosoms? why should not they embrace him with both arms, and hold him fast with a resolution never to let him go? Christ must dwell in the heart, Eph. iii. 17; and in order to that, the adulteries must be put from between the breasts, Hos. ii. 2. No pretender must have his place in the soul; he shall be as a bundle of myrrh, or perfumed bag between my breasts, always sweet to me; or his effigies in miniature, his love-tokens, shall be hung between my breasts, according to the custom of those that are dear to each other. He shall not only be laid there for a while, but shall lie there, shall abide there.

Secondly. Jesus Christ has a great complacency in his church, and in every true believer. They are amiable in his eyes; ver. 15, "Behold, thou art fair, my love," and again, "Behold, thou art fair." He saith this not to make her proud, humility is one principal ingredient in spiritual beauty; but, 1. To shew that there is a real beauty in holiness; that all that are sanctified are thereby beautified; they are truly fair. 2. That he takes a great delight in that good work which his grace hath wrought on the souls of believers; so that, though they have their infirmities, whatever they think of themselves and the world thinks of them, he thinks them fair. He calls them friends. "The hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, is in the sight of God of great price," 1 Pet. iii. 4. 3. To comfort weak believers that are discouraged by their own blackness, let them be told again and again that they are fair. 4. To engage

i. 6. The sense is, "Do not notice that I am swarthy, that (or for) the sun hath darkened me; my brothers were incensed with me, they made me a vineyard-keeper, but the vineyard I had I did not keep (or have not kept)."

i. 7. To feed here is to pasture, to make a flock feed. In the former verse the bride is introduced as the keeper of a vineyard who has deserted her charge, and incurred the anger of her brothers. In this verse the bridegroom appears as a shepherd addressed by the truant vineyard-keeper, with a request to abide with him, and not be forced to go to others.

i. 8. The sense is, "If thou knowest not, follow in the track of the flock, and pasture thy kids near the tents of the shepherds."

i. 9—11. Here the shepherd breaks out into a poetical encomium of the maiden, whom he first compares with a mare in Pharaoh's chariot, a comparison not in accordance with Western ideas, but certainly not offensive to an Oriental taste. That a mare, and not a all that are sanctified to be very thankful for that grace which has made them fair who by nature were deformed, and changed the Ethiopian's skin. One instance of the beauty of the spouse is here mentioned, that she hath doves' eyes, as ch. iv. 1. Those are fair in Christ's account that have not the piercing eye of the eagle, but the pure and chaste eye of the dove; not like the hawk, who when he soars upward still has his eye upon the prey on earth; but an humble modest eye, such an eye as discovers a simplicity and godly sincerity, and a dove-like innocency; eyes enlightened and guided by the Holy Spirit, that blessed dove; weeping eyes: I did "mourn as a dove," Eze. vii. 16.

Thirdly. The church expresseth her value for Christ, and returns esteem for esteem; ver. 15; "Behold, thou art fair." See how Christ and believers praise one another; Israel saith of God, "Who is like thee?" Ex. xv. 11; and God saith of Israel, "Who is like thee?" Deu. xxxiii. 29. Lord, saith the church, Dost thou call me fair? Nay, we speak of strength, thou art strong, Job ix. 19; so if of beauty, thou art fair; I am fair no otherwise than as I have thine image stamped upon me; thou art the great original, I am but a faint and imperfect copy. I am but thine umbra, Jno. i. 16; iii. 34. Thou art fair in thyself, and (which is more) pleasant to all that are thine. Many are fair enough to look at, and yet the sourness of their temper renders them unpleasant, but thou art fair, yea, pleasant. Christ is pleasant as he is ours, in covenant with us, in relation to us. Thou art pleasant now, when the king sits at his table. Christ is always precious to believers, but in a special manner pleasant, when they are admitted into communion with him, when they hear his voice, and see his face, and taste his love; "it is good to be here." Having expressed her esteem of her husband's person, she next (like a loving spouse, that is transported with joy for having disposed of herself so well,) applauds the accommodations he had for her entertainment; his bed, his house, his rafters or galleries, ver. 16, which may be fitly applied to those holy ordinances in which believers have fellowship with Jesus Christ, receive the tokens of his love, and return their pious and devout affections to him, increase their acquaintance with him, and improve their advantages by him. Now, 1. These she calls ours, Christ and believers having a joint interest in them. As husband and wife are heirs together, 1 Pet. iii. 7, so believers are joint heirs with Christ, Rom. viii. 17. They are his institutions, and their privileges; in them Christ and believers meet. She doth not call them mine, for a believer will own nothing as his but what Christ shall have an interest in; nor thine, for Christ hath said, "All that I have is thine," Lu. xv. 31; all is ours, if we are Christ's. They that can by faith lay claim to Christ may lay claim to all that is his. 2. These are the best of the kind. Doth the colour of the bed, and the furniture belonging to it, help to set it off? "Our bed is green," a colour which in a pastoral is preferred before any other, because it is the colour of the fields and groves, where the shepherd's business and delight is. It is a refreshing colour, good for the eyes, and it notes fruitfulness; "I am like a green olive tree," Ps. lii. 8. We are married to Christ, that we should bring forth fruit unto God, Rom. vii. 4. "The beams of our house are cedar," ver. 17, which probably refers to the temple Solomon had lately built for communion between God and Israel, which was of cedar, a strong sort of wood, sweet, durable, and which will never rot; typifying the firmness and continuance of the church, the Gospel temple. The galleries for walking are of fir, or cypress; some sort of wood that was pleasing both to the sight and to the smell, intimating the delight which the saints take in walking with Christ, and conversing with him. Everything in the covenant of grace (on which foot all their treaties are carried on) is very firm, very fine, and very fragrant.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter, I. Christ speaks both concerning himself and concerning his church, ver. 1, 2. II. The church speaks, 1. Remembering the pleasure and satisfaction she had in communion with Christ, ver. 3, 4; 2. Entertaining herself with the present tokens of his favour, and taking care that nothing happen to intercept them, ver. 5—7; 3. Triumphing in his approaches towards her, ver. 8, 9; 4. Repeating the gracious calls he had given her to go along with him a walking, invited by the pleasures of the returning spring, ver. 10—13, out of her obscurity, ver. 14; and the charge he had given to the servants to destroy that which would be hurtful to his vineyard, ver. 15; 5. Rejoicing in her interest in him, ver. 16; 6. Longing for his arrival, ver. 17. They whose hearts are filled with love to Christ, and hope of heaven, know best what these things mean.

I AM the rose of Sharon,
And the lily of the valleys.
2 As the lily among thorns,
So is my love among the daughters.

See here, First. What Christ is pleased to compare himself to; and he condescends very much in the comparison. He that is the Son of the Highest, the bright and morning star, calls and owns himself "the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys," to express his presence with his people in this world, the easiness of their access to him, and the beauty and sweetness which they find in him: and to teach them to adorn themselves with him, as shepherds and shepherdesses, when they appeared gay, were decked with roses and lilies, garlands, and chaplets of flowers. The rose, for beauty and fragrancy, is the chief of flowers; and our Saviour prefers the clothing of the lily before that of Solomon in all his glory. Christ is the rose of Sharon, where probably the best roses grew, and in most plenty. The rose of the field, so some, noting that the gospel salvation is a common salvation, it lies open to all, whoever will may come and gather the rosebuds of privileges and comforts that grow in the covenant of grace. He is not a rose locked up in a garden, but all may come and receive benefit by him, and comfort in him. He is a lily for whiteness, a lily of the valleys for sweetness, for those we call so have a strong perfume; he is a lily of the valleys, or low places, in his humiliation, exposed to injury. Humble souls see most beauty in him; whatever he is to others, to them that are in the valleys he is a lily. He is the rose, the lily; there is none but he. Whatever excellency is in Christ, it is in him singularly, and in the highest degree.

Secondly. What he is pleased to compare his church to, ver. 2. 1. She is as a lily. He himself is the lily, ver. 1; she is "as the lily." The beauty of believers consists in their conformity to Jesus Christ, and resembling him; they are his love, and so they are his lilies, for those are made like Christ, in whose hearts his love is shed abroad. "As a lily among thorns," as a lily compared with thorns. The church of Christ doth as far excel all other societies as a bed of roses doth a bush of thorns. As a lily compassed with thorns. The wicked, the daughters of this world, such as have no love to Christ, are as thorns, worthless and useless, good for nothing but to stop a gap; nay, they are noxious and hurtful, they came in with sin, and are a fruit of the curse, they choke good seed, and hinder good fruit, and their end is to be burned. God's people are as lilies among them, scratched and torn, shaded and obscured by them. They are dear to Christ, and yet exposed to hardships and troubles in the world; they must expect it, for they are planted among thorns, Ezz. ii. 6; but they are never the less dear to him for that. He doth not overlook or undervalue any of his lilies for their being among thorns; when they are among thorns, they must still be as lilies, must maintain their innocency and purity; and, though they are among thorns, must not be turned into thorns, must not render railing for railing; and if they thus preserve their character they shall be still owned as conformable to Christ. Grace in the soul is a lily among thorns; corruptions are thorns in the flesh, 2 Cor. xii. 7; are as Canaanites to God's Israel, Jos. xxiii. 13; but the lily that is now among thorns shall shortly be transplanted out of this wilderness, into that paradise where there is no pricking briar, or grieving thorn, Eze. xxviii. 24.

3 As the apple tree among the trees of the wood,
So is my beloved among the sons.
I sat down under his shadow with great delight,
And his fruit was sweet to my taste.
4 He brought me to the banqueting house,
And his banner over me was love.
5 Stay me with flagons,
Comfort me with apples:
For I am sick of love.
6 His left hand is under my head,
And his right hand doth embrace me
7 I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem,
By the roes, and by the hinds of the field,
That ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

Here, First. The spouse commends her beloved, and prefers him before all others. "As the apple tree among the trees of the wood," which perhaps doth not grow so high, nor spread so wide, as some other trees, yet is useful and serviceable to man, yielding pleasant and profitable fruit, while the other trees are of little use, no, not the cedars themselves, till they are cut down, "so is my beloved among the sons," so far doth he excel them all, all the sons of God, the angels, (that honour was put upon him, which was never designed for them, Heb. i. 4;)—all the sons of men; he is fairer than them all, than the choicest of them, Ps. xlv. 3. Name what creature you will, and you will find Christ has the preeminence above them all. The world is a barren tree to a soul; Christ is a fruitful one.

Secondly. She remembers the abundant comfort she has had in communion with him. She sat down by him with great delight, as shepherds sometimes repose themselves, sometimes converse with one another under a tree. A double advantage she found in sitting down so near the Lord Jesus. 1. A refreshing shade; "I sat down under his shadow," to be sheltered by him from the scorching heat of the sun,—to be cooled, and so to take some rest. Christ is to believers "as the shadow of" a great tree, nay, of "a great rock in a weary land," Isa. xxxii. 2; xxv. 4. When a poor soul is parched with convictions of sin, and the terrors of the law, as David, Ps. xxxii. 4, when fatigued with the troubles of this world, as Elijah, when he sat down under the juniper-tree, 1 Kin. xix. 4, they find that in Christ, in his name, his graces, his comforts, and his undertaking for poor sinners, which revives them, and keeps them from fainting; they that are weary and heavy laden in Christ may find rest. It is not enough to pass by this shadow, but we must sit down under it; here will I dwell, for I have desired it; and we shall find it not like Jonah's gourd, that soon withered, and left him in a heat, both inward and outward, but like the tree of life, the leaves whereof were not only for shelter but for the healing of the nations. We must sit down under this shadow with delight, must put an entire confidence in the protection of it, as Jud. ix. 15, and take an entire complacency in the refreshment of it. But that is not all: 2. Here is pleasing nourishing food. This tree drops its fruits to those that sit under its shadow, and they are welcome to them, and will find them sweet unto their taste, whatever they are to others. Believers have tasted that the Lord Jesus is gracious, 1 Pet. ii. 3. His fruits are all the precious privileges of the new covenant, purchased by his blood, and communicated by his Spirit. Promises are sweet to a believer, yea, and precepts too; "I delight in the law of God after the inward man." Pardons are sweet, and peace of conscience sweet, assurances of God's love, joys of the Holy Ghost, the hopes of eternal life, and the present earnests and foretastes of it, are sweet, all sweet to those that have their spiritual senses exercised. If our mouths be put out of taste to the pleasures of sin, Divine consolations will be sweet to our taste, sweeter than honey and the honeycomb.

Thirdly. She owns herself obliged to Jesus Christ for all the benefit and comfort she had had in communion with him, ver. 4. I sat down under the apple-tree, glad to be there, but he admitted me, nay, he pressed me, to a more intimate communion with him; "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord, why standest thou without?" He brought me to the house of wine, the place where he used to entertain his special friends; from lower to higher measures and degree of comfort, from the fruit of the apple-tree to the more generous fruit of the vine. To him that values the Divine joys he hath, more shall be given. One of the rabbins, by the banqueting house understands 'the tabernacle of the congregation, where the interpretation of the law is given;' sure then we may apply it to Christian assemblies, where the Gospel is preached, and gospel ordinances are administered, particularly the Lord's supper, that banquet of wine, especially to the inside of those ordinances, communion with God in them. Observe, 1. How she was introduced; "He brought me," wrought in me an inclination to draw nigh to God, helped me over my discouragements, took me by the hand, guided and led me, and gave me an access with boldness to God as a Father, Eph. ii. 18. We had never come into the banqueting house had never been acquainted with spiritual pleasures, if Christ had not brought us, by opening for us a new and living way, and opening in us a new and living fountain. 2. How she was entertained; "His banner over me was love." He brought me in with a banner displayed over my head, not as one he triumphed over, but as one he triumphed in, and whom he always caused to triumph with him, and in him, 2 Cor. ii. 14. The Gospel is compared to a banner, or ensign, Isa. xi. 12; and that which is represented in this banner, written in it in letters of gold, letters of blood, is love,—love; and this is the entertainment in the banqueting house. Christ is the captain of our salvation, and he lists all his soldiers under the banner of love; in that they centre, to that they must continually have an eye, and be animated by it; the love of Christ must constrain them to fight manfully. When a city was taken the conqueror set up his standard in it. He has conquered me with his love, overcome me with kindness; that is the banner over me. This she speaks of as what she had formerly had experience of, and she remembers it with delight Eaten company of horses, is meant, will not now be doubted by any philologist. In verse 10 the comparison is continued by introducing the ornaments of the damsel, which are likened to those of the royal steed. The "rows of jewels" and "chains of gold" are rather strings of pearls and other beads decorating the face and neck. To the ornaments she has he promises to add more, viz., gold chains, or strings of gold beads, with silver points or pendants.

i. 12. "While the king is at his table, my spikenard gives its scent."

i. 13. Although the verb rendered "he shall lie all night" strictly means to pass the night, it often, as here, may be rendered to abide — "he shall abide in my bosom."

i. 14. A cluster of henna flowers, not of camphire, nor of cypress, as the margin reads, is here meant. Engedi was near the west coast of the Dead Sea.

i. 17. Cypress wood, rather than fir, is here intended.

ii. 1. What is called the rose of Sharon is generally thought to bread must not be forgotten, but remembered with thankfulness to that God who has fed us with manna in this wilderness.

Fourthly. She professeth her strong affection, and most passionate love to Jesus Christ; ver. 5, "I am sick of love," overcome, overpowered by it. David explains this when he saith, Ps. cxix. 20, "My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments;" and ver. 81, "My soul fainteth for thy salvation." Languishing with care to make it sure, and fear of coming short of it. The spouse was now absent perhaps from her beloved, waiting for his return, and cannot bear the grief of distance and delay. Oh, how much better is it with the soul when it is sick of love to Christ than when it is surfeited with the love of this world! She cries out for cordials; "O stay me with flagons," or ointments, or flowers, any thing that is reviving; "Comfort me with apples," with the fruits of that apple tree, Christ, ver. 3; with the merit and mediation of Christ, and the sense of his love to my soul. Note, They that are sick of love to Christ shall not want spiritual supports, while they are yet waiting for spiritual comforts.

Fifthly. She experienceth the power and tenderness of Divine grace, relieving her in her present faintings, ver. 6. Though he seemed to have withdrawn, yet he was even then a very present help, 1. To sustain the lovesick soul, and to keep it from fainting away; "His left hand is under my head," to bear it up, nay, as a pillow to lay it easy. David experienced God's hand upholding him, then when his soul was following hard after God, Ps. lxiii. 8; and Job, in a state of desertion, yet found that God put strength into him, Job xxiii. 6. "All his saints are in his hand," which tenderly holds their aching heads. 2. To encourage the lovesick soul to continue waiting till he returns; for in the meantime "his right hand doth embrace me;" and thereby gives me an unquestionable assurance of his love. Believers owe all their strength and comfort to the supporting left hand and embracing right hand of the Lord Jesus.

Sixthly. Finding her beloved thus nigh unto her, she is in great care that her communion with him be not interrupted; ver. 7, "I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem." Jerusalem, the mother of us all, chargeth all her daughters, the church chargeth all her members, the believing soul chargeth all its powers and faculties, the spouse chargeth herself, and all about her, "not to stir up, or awake her love until he please," now he is asleep in her arms, as she was borne up in his, ver. 6. She gives them this charge, "by the roes, and the hinds of the field," that is, by every thing that is amiable in their eyes, and dear to them, "as the loving hind, and the pleasant roe;" thy love is to me dearer than those can be to you, and will be disturbed like them with a very little noise. Note, 1. Those that experience the sweetness of communion with Christ, and the sensible manifestations of his love, cannot but desire the continuance of these blessed views, those blessed visits; Peter would make tabernacles upon the holy mount, Mat. xvii. 4. 2. Yet Christ will, when he pleaseth, withdraw those extraordinary communications of himself, for he is a free agent; and the Spirit, as the wind, blows where and when it listeth, and in his pleasure it becomes us to acquiesce. But, 3. Our care must be, that we do nothing to provoke him to withdraw, and to hide his face; that we carefully watch over our own hearts, and suppress every thought that may grieve his good Spirit. Let those that have comfort be afraid of sinning it away.

8 The voice of my beloved!
Behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains,
Skipping upon the hills.
9 My beloved is like a roe or a young hart:
Behold, he standeth behind our wall, [the lattice.
He looketh forth at the windows, shewing himself through 10 My beloved spake, and said unto me,
Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away.
11 For, lo, the winter is past,
The rain is over and gone;
12 The flowers appear on the earth;
The time of the singing of birds is come,
And the voice of the turtle is heard in our land;
13 The fig tree putteth forth her green figs,
And the vines with the tender grape give a good smell
Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away.

The church is here pleasing herself exceedingly with the thoughts of her farther communion with Christ after she is recovered from her fainting fit.

First. She rejoiceth in his approach, ver. 8. 1. She hears him speak; It is "the voice of my beloved," calling to me to tell me he is coming. Like one of his own sheep she knows his voice before she sees him, and can easily distinguish it from the voice of a stranger, Jno. x. 4, 5; and like a faithful friend of the bridegroom she "rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice," Jno. iii. 29. With what an air of triumph and exultation doth she cry out, "It is the voice of my beloved!" it can be the voice of no other, for none but he can speak to the heart, and make that burn. 2. She seeth him come, sees the goings of our God, our King, Ps. lxviii. 24, "Behold, he comes." This may very well be applied to the prospect which the Old Testament saints had of Christ's coming in the flesh; Abraham saw his day at a distance, and was glad. The nearer the time came, the clearer discoveries were made of it; and they that waited for the consolation of Israel with an eye of faith saw him come, and triumphed in the sight. "Behold, he comes," for they had heard him say, Ps. xl. 7, Lo, I come; to which their faith here affixeth its seal; "Behold, he comes" as he has promised. 1st. He comes cheerfully, and with great alacrity; he comes leaping and skipping like a roe and like a young hart, ver. 9; as one pleased with his own undertaking, and that had his heart upon it, and his delights with the sons of men. When he came to be baptized with the baptism of blood, how was he straitened till it was accomplished! Lu. xii. 50. 2nd. He comes slighting and surmounting all the difficulties that lay in his way; "he comes leaping over the mountains, skipping over the hills," so some read it, making nothing of the discouragements he was to break through. The curse of the law, the death of the cross, must be undergone, all the powers of darkness must be grappled with, but before the resolutions of his love these great mountains become plains. Whatever opposition is given at any time to the deliverances of God's church, Christ will break through it, will get over it. 3rd. He comes speedily, "like a roe, or a young hart." They thought the time long, every day a year, but really he hastened; as now, so then, surely he comes quickly; "He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." When he comes for the deliverance of his people he flies upon a cloud, and never stays beyond his time, which is the best time. We may apply it to particular believers, who find that, even when Christ has withdrawn sensible comforts, and seems to forsake, yet it is but for a small moment, and he will soon return with everlasting lovingkindnesses.

Secondly. She pleaseth herself with the glimpses she has of him, and the glances she has of his favour. "He stands behind our wall;" I know he is there, for sometimes he looks forth at the window, or looks in at it, and flourisheth himself through the lattice. Such was the state of the Old Testament church, while it was in expectation of the coming of the Messiah; the ceremonial law is called a wall of partition, Eph. ii. 14; a vail, 2 Cor. iii. 13; but Christ stood behind that wall, they had him near them, they had him with them, though they could not see him clearly; he that was the substance was not far off from the shadows, Col. ii. 17. They saw him looking through the windows of the ceremonial institutions, and blossoming through those lattices; in their sacrifices and purifications Christ discovered himself to them, and gave them intimations and earnests of his grace, both to engage and to encourage their longings for his coming. Such is our present state in comparison with what it will be at Christ's second coming; we now see him through a glass darkly, the body is a wall between us and him, through the windows of which we now and then get a sight of him, but not face to face, as we hope to see him shortly. In the sacraments Christ is near us, but it is behind the wall of external signs, through those lattices he manifests himself to us; but we shall shortly see him as he is. Some understand this of the state of a believer when he is under a cloud; Christ is out of sight, and yet not far off: see Job xxxv. 14; and compare Job xxiii. 8—10. She calls the wall that interposed between her and her beloved, our wall, because it is sin, and nothing else, that separates between us and God, and that is a wall of our own erecting, Isa. lix. 1. Behind that he stands, as waiting to be gracious, and ready to be reconciled upon our repentance. Then he looks in at the window, observes the frame of our hearts, and the working of our souls; he looks forth at the window, and shews himself in giving them some comfort, that they may continue hoping for his return.

Thirdly. She repeats the gracious invitation he had given her to come a walking with him, ver. 10—13. She remembers what her beloved said to her, for it had made a very pleasing and powerful impression upon her; and the word that quickens us we shall never forget. She relates it for the encouragement of others, telling them what he had said to her soul, and done for her soul, Ps. lxvi. 16.

1. He called her his love, and his fair one; whatever she is to others, to him she is acceptable, and in his eyes she is amiable. Those that take Christ for their beloved, he will own them as his; never was any love lost that was bestowed upon Christ. Christ, by expressing his love to believers, invites and encourages them to follow him.

2. He called to her to rise and come away, ver. 10; and again, ver. 13. The repetition notes backwardness in her; we have need to be often called to come away with Jesus Christ, "precept must be upon precept, and line upon line." But it notes earnestness in him; so much is his heart set upon the welfare of precious souls, that he importunes them most pressingly to that which is for their own good.

3. He gave for a reason the return of the spring, and the pleasantness of the weather; which is elegantly described in a great variety of expressions. 1st. "The winter is past," the dark, and cold, and barren winter; long winters, and hard ones, pass away at last, they do not endure always. And the spring would not be so pleasant as it is if it did not succeed the winter, which is a foil to its beauty, Eccl. vii. 14. The face neither of the heavens nor of the earth is always the same, but subject to continual vicissitudes, diurnal and annual. "The winter is past," but not passed away for ever; it will come again, and we must provide for it in summer, Pr. vi. 6, 8. We must weep in winter, and rejoice in summer, as though we wept and rejoiced not, for both are passing. 2nd. "The rain is over and gone;" the winter rain, the cold, stormy rain, it is over now, and the dew is as the dew of herbs. Even the rain that drowned the world was over and gone at last, Gen. viii. 1—3; and God promised to drown the world no more, which was a type and figure of the covenant of grace, Isa. liv. 9. 3rd. "The flowers appear on the earth;" all winter they are dead and buried in their roots, and there is no sign of them, but in the spring they revive, and shew themselves in a wonderful variety and verdure, and, like the dew that produceth them, tarry not for man, Mic. v. 7. They appear, but they will soon disappear again, and man is herein like the flower of the field, Job xiv. 2. 4th. "The time of the singing of birds is come." The little birds that all the winter lie hid in their retirements, and scarce live, when the spring returns forget all the calamities of the winter, and to the best of their capacity chant forth the praises of their Creator. And he that understands the birds that cry for want, Ps. cxlvii. 9, no doubt takes notice of those that sing for joy, Ps. civ. 12. The singing of the birds may shame our silence in God's praises, who are better fed, Mat. vi. 26; and better taught, Job xxxv. 11, and are of more value than many sparrows. They live without inordinate care, Mat. vi. 26; and therefore they sing while we murmur. 5th. "The voice of the turtle is heard in our land," which is one of the season birds mentioned, Jer. viii. 7, that observe the time of their coming, and the time of their singing, and so shame us who know not the judgment of the Lord, understand not the times, nor do that which is beautiful in its season; do not sing in singing-time. 6th. "The fig tree putteth forth her green figs," by which we know that summer is nigh, Mat. xxiv. 32, when the green figs will be ripe figs, and fit for use. And "the vines with the tender grape give a good smell;" the earth produceth not only flowers, ver. 12, but fruits; and the smell of the fruits which are profitable is to be preferred far before that of the flowers, which are only for show and pleasure. Serpents, they say, are driven away by the smell of vines; and who is the old serpent, and who the true vine, we know very well.

4. Now this description of the returning spring, as a reason for coming away with Christ, is applicable, 1st. To the introducing of the Gospel in the room of the Old Testament dispensation, during which it had been winter-time with the church. Christ's Gospel warms that which was cold, makes that fruitful which before was dead and barren; when it comes to any place it puts a beauty and glory upon that place, 2 Cor. iii. 7, 8; and ministers occasion for joy. Spring-time is pleasant time, and so is gospel time. Aspice venturo lætentur ut omnia seclo,—'Behold, what joy the dawning age inspires!' said Virgil, from the sibyls, perhaps, with more reference to the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom at that time, than he himself thought of: see Ps. xcvi. 11. Arise, then, and improve this spring-time; come away from the world and the flesh, come into fellowship with Christ, 1 Cor. i. 9. 2nd. To the delivering of the church from the power of persecuting enemies, and the restoring of liberty and peace to it, after a severe winter of suffering and restraint. When the storms of trouble are over and gone, when the voice of the turtle, the joyful sound of the Gospel of Christ, is again heard, and ordinances enjoyed with freedom; then arise and come away to improve the happy juncture. Walk in the light of the Lord, sing in the ways of the Lord; when the churches had rest, then they were edified, Acts ix. 31. 3rd. To the conversion of sinners from a state of nature to a state of grace. That blessed change is like the return of the spring, a universal change, and a very comfortable one; it is a new creation, it is being have been a plant with a bulbous root, and probably the meadow saffron; but some still maintain that a rose is meant.

ii. 5. Render, "Sustain me with cakes, refresh me with apples," &c.

ii. 9. The Septuagint has "on the mountains of Bethel" after the word for "young hart." There is, however, no such allusion in either the Latin Vulgate or the Syriac; but see verse 17. The Chaldee Targum is a loose paraphrase of the book, the character of which may be inferred from the portion representing this verse: "Silence! the congregation of Israel said in the time when the glory of the Lord was revealed in Egypt on the night of the passover, and slew every firstborn; he rode upon a swift cloud and ran like a roe and like a young hart, and sheltered the houses wherein we were, and stood behind our walls, and looked through our windows, and looked through our lattices, and saw the blood of the sacrifice of the passover, and the blood of circumcision that was marked upon our doors; and looked from heaven on high, and saw his people born again. The soul that was hard, and cold, and frozen, and unprofitable like the earth in winter, becomes fruitful like the earth in spring, and by degrees like it brings its fruits to perfection. This blessed change is owing purely to the approaches and influences of the Sun of righteousness, who calls to us from heaven to arise and come away; come, gather in summer. 4th. To the consolation of the saints, after a state of inward dejection and despondency. A child of God, under doubts and fears, is like the earth in winter; its nights long, its days dark, good affections chilled, nothing done, nothing got, the hand sealed up. But comfort will return, the birds shall sing again, and the flowers appear; arise, therefore, poor drooping soul, and come away with thy beloved. "Arise, and shake thyself from the dust." Isa. lii. 2; "Arise, shine, for thy light is come," Isa. lx. 1; "walk in that light," Isa. ii. 5. 5th. To the resurrection of the body at the last day, and the glory to be revealed. The bones that lay in the grave, as the roots of plants in the ground during the winter, shall then flourish as an herb, Isa. lxvi. 14; xxvi. 19. That will be an eternal farewell to winter, and a joyful entrance upon an everlasting spring.

14 O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock,
In the secret places of the stairs,
Let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice;
For sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely.
15 Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines:
For our vines have tender grapes.
16 My beloved is mine, and I am his:
He feedeth among the lilies.
17 Until the day break, and the shadows flee away,
Turn, my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart
Upon the mountains of Bether.

Here is, First. The encouraging invitation which Christ gives to the church, and to every believing soul, to come into communion with him, ver. 14. 1. His love is now his dove; David had called the church God's turtle dove, Ps. lxxiv. 19; and so she is here called; a dove for beauty, her wings covered with silver, Ps. lxviii. 13. For innocency and inoffensiveness; a gracious spirit is a dovelike spirit, galless and harmless, loving quietness and cleanliness, and faithful to Christ, as the turtle to her mate. The Spirit descended like a dove on Christ, and so he doth on all Christians, making them of a meek and quiet spirit. She is Christ's dove; for he owns her, and delights in her, she can find no rest but in him, and his ark, and therefore to him as her Noah she returns. 2. This dove is "in the clefts of the rock, and in the secret places of the stairs." This speaks either, 1st. Her praise. Christ is the Rock to whom she flees for shelter, and in whom alone she can think herself safe, and find herself easy, as the dove in a hole of the rock, when struck at by the birds of prey, Jer. xlviii. 28. Moses was hid in a cleft of the rock, that he might behold something of God's glory, which otherwise he could not have borne the brightness of. She retires into the secret places of the stairs, where she may be alone, undisturbed, and may the better commune with her own heart. Good Christians will find time to be private. Christ often withdrew to a mountain himself alone to pray. Or, 2nd. Her blame. She crept into the clefts of the rock, and the secret places, for fear, and shame; any where to hide her head, being heartless and discouraged, and shunning even the sight of her beloved. Being conscious to herself of her own unfitness and unworthiness to come into his presence, and speak to him, she drew back, and was like a silly dove without heart, Hos. vii. 11. 3. Christ graciously calls her out of her retirements; Come, "let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice." She was mourning like a dove, Isa. xxxviii. 14; bemoaning herself, like the doves of the valleys, where they are near the clefts of the impending rocks, mourning for her iniquities, Eze. vii. 16; and refusing to be comforted. But Christ calls her to lift up her face without spot, being purged from an evil conscience, Job xi. 15; xxii. 26; to come boldly to the throne of grace, having a great high priest there, Heb. iv. 16; to tell what her petition is, and what her request; Let me hear thy voice, hear what thou hast to say; what would ye that I should do unto you? Speak freely, speak up, and fear not a slight or repulse. 4. For her encouragement, he tells her the good thoughts he had of her, whatever she thought of herself; "Sweet is thy voice," thy praying voice; though thou canst but chatter like a crane, or a swallow, Isa. xxxviii. 14, it is music in God's ears. He hath assured us, that the prayer of the upright is his delight; he smelled a sweet savour from Noah's sacrifice, and the spiritual sacrifices are no less acceptable, 1 Pet. ii. 5. This doth not so much commend our services as God's gracious condescension in making the best of them, and the efficacy of the much incense which is offered with the prayers of saints, Rev. viii. 3. That countenance of thine which thou art ashamed of is comely, though now mournful; much more will it be so when it becomes cheerful. Then the voice of prayer is sweet and acceptable to God, when the countenance, that is, the conversation in which we shew ourselves before men, is holy, and so comely and agreeable to our profession. Those that are sanctified have the best comeliness.

Secondly. The charge which Christ gives to his servants to oppose and suppress that which is a terror to his church, and drives her like a poor frightened dove into the clefts of the rock, and which is an obstruction and prejudice to the interests of his kingdom in the world, and in the heart, ver. 15. "Take us the foxes," (take them for us, for it is good service both to Christ and the church,) "the little foxes, that" creep in insensibly, for though they are little, they do great mischief, they "spoil the vines," which they must by no means be suffered to do at any time, especially now when "our vines have tender grapes," that must be preserved, or the vintage will fail. Believers are as vines, weak, but useful plants; their fruits are as tender grapes at first, which must have time to come to maturity. This charge to take the foxes is, 1. A charge to particular believers to mortify their own corruptions, their sinful appetites and passions, which are as foxes, little foxes, that destroy their graces and comforts, quash good motions, crush good beginnings, and prevent their coming to perfection. Seize the little foxes, the first risings of sin, the little ones of Babylon, Ps. cxxxvii. 9, those sins that seem little, for they often prove very dangerous. Whatever we find a hindrance to us in that which is good, we must put it away. 2. A charge to all in their places to oppose and prevent the spreading of all such opinions and practices as tend to corrupt men's judgments, debauch their consciences, perplex their minds, and discourage their inclinations to virtue and piety. Persecutors are foxes, Lu. xiii. 32; false prophets are foxes, Eze. xiii. 4. Those that sow the tares of heresy or schism, and, like Diotrephes, trouble the peace of the church, and obstruct the progress of the Gospel, they are the foxes, the little foxes, which must not be knocked in the head,—Christ came not to destroy men's lives,—but taken, that they may be tamed, or else restrained from doing mischief.

Thirdly. The believing profession which the church makes of her relation to Christ, and the satisfaction she takes in her interest in him, and communion with him, ver. 16. He had called her to rise and come away with him, to let him see her face, and hear her voice. Now this is her answer to that call, in which, though at present in the dark, and at a distance, 1. She comforts herself with the thoughts of the mutual interest and relation that was between her and her beloved. 'My beloved to me, and I to him,' so the original reads it very emphatically. The conciseness of the language speaks the largeness of her affection; what he is to me, and I to him, may better be conceived than expressed. Note, 1st. It is the unspeakable privilege of all true believers that Christ is theirs; "My beloved is mine;" that notes not only propriety, I have a title to him, but possession and tenure, I receive from his fulness. Believers are partakers of Christ, they have not only an interest in him, but the enjoyment of him; are taken not only into covenant but into communion with him. All the benefits of his glorious undertaking as Mediator are made over to them. He is that to them which the world neither is, nor can be; all that which they need and desire, and which will make a complete happiness for them. All he is is theirs, and all he has, all he has done, and all he is doing, all he has promised in the Gospel, all he hath prepared in heaven, all is yours. 2nd. It is the undoubted character of all true believers that they are Christ's, and then, and then only, he is theirs. They have given their ownselves to him, 2 Cor. viii. 5, they receive his doctrine and obey his laws, they bear his image and espouse his interest; they belong to Christ. If we be his, his wholly, his only, his for ever, we may take the comfort of his being ours. 2. She comforts herself with the thoughts of the communications of his grace to his people. "He feedeth among the lilies." When she wants the tokens of his favour to her in particular, she rejoiceth in the assurance of his presence with all believers in general, who are as lilies in his eye; he feeds among them, that is, he takes as much pleasure in them and their assemblies as a man doth at his table, or in his garden, for "he walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks," he delights to converse with them, and to do them good.

Fourthly. The church's hope and expectation of Christ's coming, and her prayer grounded thereupon. 1. She doubts not but that the day will break, and the shadows will flee away. The gospel day will dawn, and the shadows of the ceremonial law will flee away. This was the comfort of the Old Testament church, that, after the long night of that dark dispensation, the dayspring from on high would at length visit them, to give light to them that sit in darkness. When the sun riseth the shadows of the night vanish, so do the shadows of the day when the substance comes. The day of comfort will come after a night of desertion. Or, it may refer to the second coming of Christ, and the eternal happiness of the saints. The shadows of our present state will flee away, our darkness and doubts, our griefs and all our grievances, and a glorious day shall dawn, a morning when the upright shall have dominion; a day that shall have no night after it. 2. She begs the presence of her beloved in the meantime to support and comfort her; "Turn, my beloved," turn to me, come and visit me, come and relieve me, be with me always to the end of the age. In the day of my extremity make haste to help me, make no long tarrying. Come over even the mountains of division, interposing time and days, with some gracious anticipations of that light and love. 3. She begs that he would not only turn to her for the present, but hasten his coming to fetch her to himself. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Though there be mountains in the way, thou canst, "like a roe, or a young hart," step over them with ease. 'O shew thyself to me, or take me up to thee.'

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter, I. The church gives an account of a sore trial wherewith she was exercised through the withdrawing of her beloved from her, the pains she was at ere she recovered the comfortable sense of his favour again, and the resolution she took when she did recover it, not to lose it again, as she had done, through her own carelessness, ver. 1—5. II. The daughters of Jerusalem admire the excellences of the church, ver. 6. III. The church admires Jesus Christ under the person of Solomon, his bed, and the life-guards about it, ver. 7, 8; his chariot, ver. 9, 10; and calls upon the daughters of Zion, who were admiring her, to admire him rather, especially as he appeared on his coronation day, and the day of his nuptials, ver. 11.

BY night on my bed
I sought him whom my soul loveth:
I sought him, but I found him not.
2 I will rise now, and go about the city
In the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth:
I sought him, but I found him not.
3 The watchmen that go about the city found me:
To whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?
4 It was but a little that I passed from them,
But I found him whom my soul loveth:
I held him, and would not let him go,
Until I had brought him into my mother's house,
And into the chamber of her that conceived me.
5 I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem,
By the roes, and by the hinds of the field,
That ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

God useth not to say to the seed of Jacob, "Seek ye me in vain," and yet here we have the spouse for a great while seeking her beloved in vain, but finding him at last to her unspeakable satisfaction. It was hard to the Old Testament church to find Christ in the ceremonial law, and the types and figures which then were of good things to come. Long was the consolation of Israel looked for before it came; the watchmen of that church gave little assistance to those who inquired after him, but at length Simeon had him in his arms whom his soul loved. It is applicable to the case of particular believers, who often walk in darkness a great while; but at eventime it shall be light, and they that seek Christ to the end shall find him at length. Observe,

First. How the spouse sought him in vain upon her bed, ver. 1, when she was up, and looking about her, grace in act and exercise. Though her beloved was withdrawn, yet she could see him at a distance, ch. ii. 8; but now it was otherwise. She still continued her affection to him, still it was he whom who ate the sacrifice of the feast, roasted with fire, with the inwards and wild lettuces, and unleavened bread, and he spared us, and gave not power to the destroying angel to destroy us."

ii. 12. The nightingale and other singing birds are said to be numerous in some parts of Palestine. They "throng the trees that fringe the Jordan, and abound in all the wooded valleys, filling the air in early spring with the rich cadence of their notes." The turtle, or turtle-dove, is a migratory bird, and that feature of its character is alluded to here. Dr. Tristram says, "Search the glades and valleys, even by sultry Jordan, at the end of March, and not a turtle-dove is to be seen. Return in the second week in April, and clouds of doves are feeding on the clovers of the plain; they stock every tree and thicket. At every step they flutter up from the herbage in front; they perch on every tree and bush, they overspread the whole face of the land. . . . While other songsters are heard chiefly in the morning, or only at intervals, the turtle immediately on its her soul loved; that bond of the covenant still continued firm. Though he slay me, I will trust in him, though he leave me, I will love him. When I have him not in my arms, I have him in my heart. But she wanted the communion she used to have with him, as David, when he thirsted for God, for the living God. She sought him, but, 1. It was by night on her bed. It was late and lazy seeking. Her understanding was clouded, it was by night, in the dark; her affections were chilled, it was on her bed, half asleep. The wise virgins slumbered in the absence of the bridgroom. It was a dark time with the believer, she saw not her signs, and yet she sought them. They whose souls love Jesus Christ will continue to seek him, even in silence and solitude. Their reins instruct them to do so, even in the night season. 2. She missed of finding him. Sometimes he is found of them that seek him not, Isa. lxv. 1, but here he is not found of one that sought him; either for the punishment of her corruptions, her slothfulness, and security, (we miss of comfort because we do not seek it aright,) or for the exercise of her graces, her faith, and patience, to try whether she will continue seeking. The woman of Canaan sought Christ, and found him not at first, that she might find him at length so much the more to her honour and comfort.

Secondly. How she sought him in vain abroad, ver. 2. She had made trial of secret worship, and gone through the duties of the closet, had remembered him on her bed, and meditated on him in the night-watches, Ps. lxiii. 6, but she did not meet with comfort; "My sore ran in the night," and then "I remembered God and was troubled," Ps. lxxvii. 2, 3. And yet she is not driven off by the disappointment from the use of farther means. She resolves, "I will rise now," I will not lie here if I cannot find my beloved here, nor be content if he be withdrawn. I will rise now without delay, and seek him presently, lest he withdraw farther from me. Those that would seek Christ so as to find him must lose no time. I will rise out of a warm bed, and go out in a cold, dark night, in quest of my beloved. Those that seek Christ must not stick or startle at difficulties. "I will rise and go about the city," the holy city, "in the streets, and the broadways," for she knew he was not to be found in any blind byways. We must seek in the city, in Jerusalem, which was a type of the gospel church. The likeliest place to find Christ is in the temple, Lu. ii. 46, in the streets of the gospel church, in holy ordinances, where the children of Zion pass and repass at all hours. She had a good purpose when she said, "I will arise now;" but the good performance was all in all. She arose and sought him, (those that are in pursuit of Christ, the knowledge of him, and communion with him, must turn every stone, seek everywhere,) and yet she found him not; she was still unsatisfied, uneasy, as Job, when he looked on all sides, but could not perceive any tokens of the Divine favour, Job xxiv. 8, 9; and the psalmist often, when he complained that God hid his face from him, Ps. lxxxviii. 14. We may be in the way of our duty, and yet may miss of comfort, for "the wind blows where it listeth." How heavy is the accent on this repeated complaint, "I sought him, but I found him not;" like that of Mary Magdalene, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him," Jno. xx. 13.

Thirdly. How she inquired of the watchmen concerning him, ver. 3. In the night the watchmen go about the city, for the preservation of its peace and safety, to guide and assist the honest and quiet, as well as to be a check upon those that are disorderly; these met her in her walks, and she asked them if they could give her any tidings of her beloved. In the streets and broadways of Jerusalem she might meet with enough to divert her from her pursuit, and to entertain her, though she could not meet her beloved; but she regards none in comparison with him. Gracious souls press through crowds of other delights and contentments in pursuit of Christ, whom they prefer before their chief joy. Mary Magdalene sees angels in the sepulchre, but that will not do unless she see Jesus. "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?" Note, We must evidence the sincerity of our love to Christ by our solicitous inquiries after him. "The children of the bridechamber will mourn when the bridegroom is taken away," Mat. ix. 15, especially for the sin which provoked him to withdraw. And if we do so, we will be in care to recover the sense of his favour, and diligent and constant in the use of proper means in order thereunto; we must search the Scriptures, be much in prayer, keep close to ordinances, and all with this upon our heart, "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?" Those only who have seen Christ themselves are likely to direct others to a sight of him. When the Greeks came to worship at the feast, they applied themselves to Philip with such an address as this of the spouse to the watchmen, "Sir, we would see Jesus," Jno. xii. 21.

Fourthly. How she found him at last, ver. 4. She passed from the watchmen as soon as she perceived they could give her no tidings of her beloved; she would not stay with them because he was not among them, but went on seeking; for (as Ainsworth observes) neither the society of brethren, nor church, nor ministers, can comfort the afflicted conscience, unless Christ himself be apprehended by faith. But presently after she parted from the watchmen she found him whom she sought, and then called him, "him whom my soul loveth," with as much delight as before with desire. Note, Those that continue seeking Christ shall find him at last, and when perhaps they were almost ready to despair of finding him: see Ps. xlii. 7, 8; lxxvii. 9, 10; Isa. liv. 7, 8. Disappointments must not drive us off from gracious pursuits. Hold out faith and patience; the vision is for an appointed time, and, though the watchmen can give us no account of it, at the end it shall itself speak and not lie; and the comfort that comes in after long waiting in the use of means will be so much the sweeter at last.

Fifthly. How close she kept to him when she had found him. She is now as much in fear of losing him as before she was in care to find him. "I held him," held him fast, as the women when they met with Christ after his resurrection, "held him by the feet and worshipped him," Mat. xxviii. 9. "I would not let him go." Not only I would never do any thing to provoke him to depart, but I would by faith and prayer prevail with him to stay, and by the exercise of grace preserve inward peace. Those that know how hard comfort is come by, and how dear it is bought, will be afraid of forfeiting it, and playing it away, and will think nothing too much to do to keep it safe. Non minor est virtus quam quærere parta tueri,—'As much is implied in securing our acquisitions as in making them.' They that have laid hold on wisdom must retain her, Pr. iii. 18. Those that hold Christ fast in the arms of faith and love shall not let him go, he will abide with them.

Sixthly. How desirous she was to bring others acquainted with him. "I brought him to my mother's house," that all my relations, all that are dear to me, might have the benefit of communion with him. When Zaccheus found Christ, or rather was found of him, salvation came to his house, Lu. xix. 9. Wherever we find Christ we must take him home with us to our houses, especially to our hearts. The church is our mother, and we should be concerned for her interests, that she may have Christ present with her, and be earnest in prayer for his presence with his people and ministers always. They that enjoy the tokens of Christ's favour to their own souls should desire that the church, and all religious assemblies in their public capacity, might likewise enjoy the tokens of his favour.

Seventhly. What care she was in that no disturbance might be given him, ver. 5. She repeats the charge she had before given, ch. ii. 7, to the daughters of Jerusalem, not to stir up, or awake her love. When she had brought him into her mother's house among her sisters, she gives them a strict charge to keep all quiet, and in good order, to be very observant of him, careful to please him, and afraid of offending him. The charge given to the church in the wilderness concerning the angel of the covenant that was among them explains this, Ex. xxiii. 21, "Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not." See that none of you stir out of your places, lest you disturb him, but with quietness work and mind your own business; make no noise, let all clamour and bitterness be put far from you, for that grieves the holy Spirit of God, Eph. iv. 30, 31. Some think this here to be Christ's charge to the daughters of Jerusalem, not to disturb or disquiet his church, nor trouble the minds of his disciples; for Christ is very tender of the peace of his church, and all the members of it, even the little ones, and those that trouble them shall bear their judgment, Gal. v. 10.

6 Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness
Like pillars of smoke,
Perfumed with myrrh and frankincense,
With all powders of the merchant?

These are the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom the charge was given, ver. 5. They had looked shily upon the bride, because she was black, ch. i. 6; but now they admire her, and speak of her with great respect. "Who is this?" How beautiful doth she look? Who would have expected such a comely and magnificent person to come out of the wilderness? As when Christ rode in triumph into Jerusalem, they said, "Who is this?" And of the accession of strangers to the church, she herself saith with wonder, Isa. xlix. 21, "Who has begotten me these?"

First. This is applicable to the Jewish church, when, after forty years wandering in the wilderness, they came out of it to take a glorious possession of the land of promise; and this may very well be illustrated by what Balaam said of them at that time, when they ascended "out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke," and he stood admiring them: "From the top of the rocks I see him." "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob," Num. xxiii. 9; xxiv. 5.

Secondly. It is applicable to any public deliverance of the church of God, as particularly out of Babylon, the Old Testament and the New Testament Babylon. Then the church is "like pillars of smoke," ascending upwards in devout affections, and the incense of praise to God, from which, as from Noah's sacrifice, he smells a sweet savour. Then she is amiable in the eyes of her friends; and her enemies too cannot but have a veneration for her, and worship at her feet, knowing that God has loved her, Rev. iii. 9. Sometimes the fear of the Jews was upon their neighbours, when they saw that God was with them of a truth, Est. viii. 17.

Thirdly. It is applicable to the recovery of a gracious soul out of a state of desertion and despondency. 1. She ascends "out of the wilderness," the dry and barren land, where there is no way, where there is no water, where travellers are still in want, and ever at a loss; here a poor soul may long be left to wander, but shall come up at last, under the conduct of the Comforter. 2. She comes up "like pillars of smoke," like a cloud of incense ascending from the altar, or the smoke of the burnt offerings. This intimates a fire of pious and devout affections in the soul, from whence this smoke ariseth, and the mounting of the soul heavenwards in this smoke, as Jud. xiii. 20. The heart lifted up to God in the heavens, as the sparks fly upwards; Christ's return to the soul gives life to its devotion, and its communion with God is most reviving when it ascends out of a wilderness. 3. She is "perfumed with myrrh and frankincense," she is replenished with the graces of God's Spirit, which are as sweet spices, or as the holy incense, which, being now kindled, by his gracious returns sends forth a very fragrant smell. Her devotions are now more than ordinary lively; she is not only acceptable to God, but amiable in the eyes of others also, who are ready to cry out with admiration, "Who is this?" What a monument of mercy is this? The graces and comforts with which she is perfumed are called the "powders of the merchant," for they are far-fetched, and dear-bought by our Lord Jesus, that blessed merchant, who took a long voyage, and was at a vast expense, no less than that of his own blood, to purchase them for us. They are not the products of our own soil, nor the growth of our own country; no, they are imported from the heavenly Canaan, the better country.

arrival pours forth, from every garden, grove, and wooded hill, its melancholy yet soothing ditty unceasingly from early dawn till sunset."

ii. 13. The fig-tree puts out its first green figs before the leaves appear. Some, however, render this, "The fig-tree ripens its green figs." The next clause rather means, "The vines in blossom emit fragrance," which is said to be very true of Oriental vines.

ii 14. This is doubtless an allusion to the rock dove, which is found in Palestine, which haunts the crevices and ledges of cliffs and ravines in solitary places. The so-called "secret places of the stairs" are rather the hiding-places or covert of the steep cliffs. The stairs are, of course, the ledges and successive stages in the rocky haunts of the bird.

ii. 15. "Foxes" may here include "jackals," which are well-known enemies to Eastern vineyards. Similar charges were brought against foxes by the ancient Greeks, and are still laid against them

COVERED PALANQUIN.

The daughters of Jerusalem stood admiring the sponse, and commending her; but she overlooks their praises, is not puffed up with them, but transfers all the glory to Christ, and directs them to look off her, to him; recommends him to their esteem, and sets herself to applaud him. Here he is three times called Solomon, and we have that name but three times besides in all this song, ch. i. 5; viii. 11, 12. It is Christ that is here meant, who is greater than Solomon; and of whom Solomon was an illustrious type, for his wisdom and wealth, and especially his building the temple. Three things she admires him for:

First. The safety of his bed; ver. 7, "Behold his bed, even Solomon's," very rich and fine; for so the curtains of Solomon were. 'His bed, which is above Solomon's,' so some read it. Christ's bed, though he had not where to lay his head, is better than Solomon's best bed. The church is his bed, for he hath said of it, "This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell." The hearts of believers are his bed, for he lies all night between their breasts, Eph. iii. 17; heaven is his bed, the rest into which he entered when he had done his work. Or, it may be meant of that sweet repose and satisfaction which gracious souls enjoy in communion with him; it is called his bed, because, though we are admitted to it, and therefore it is called our bed, ch. i. 16, yet it is his peace that is our rest, Jno. xiv. 27; I will give you rest, Mat. xi. 28. It is Solomon's bed, whose name signifies peace, because in his days Judah and Israel dwell safely under their vines and fig trees.

That which she admires his bed for, is the guard that surrounded it. They that rest in Christ not only dwell at ease,—many do so who yet are in the greatest danger,—but they dwell in safety. Their holy serenity is under the protection of a holy security; this bed had "threescore valiant men about it," as yeomen of the guard, or the band of gentlemen pensioners. They are of the valiant of Israel; and a great many bold and brave men David's reign had produced; the life-guard men are well armed, they all hold swords, and know how to hold them, they are expert in war, well skilled in all the arts of it; they are posted about the bed, at a convenient distance; they are in a posture of defence, "every man with his sword upon his thigh," and his hand upon his sword, ready to draw upon the first alarm, and this "because of fear in the night," because of the danger feared, for the lives of princes, even the wisest and best, as they are more precious, so they are more exposed, and require to be more guarded, than the lives of common persons. Or, because of the fear of it, and the apprehension which the spouse may have of danger, these guards are set for her satisfaction, that she may be quiet from the fear of evil, which believers themselves are subject to, especially in the night, when they are under a cloud as to their spiritual state, or in any outward trouble more than ordinary. Christ himself was under the special protection of his Father in his whole undertaking; "In the shadow of his hand has he hid me," Isa. xlix. 2. He had legions of angels at his command. The church is well guarded; more are with her than are against her; lest any hurt this vineyard, God himself keeps it night and day, Isa. xxvii. 2, 3. Particular believers, when they repose themselves in Christ, and with him, though it may be night time with them, and they may have their fears in the night, yet they are safe, as safe as Solomon himself in the midst of his guards. The angels have a charge concerning them; ministers are appointed to watch for their souls, and they ought to be valiant men, expert in the spiritual warfare, holding the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and having that girt upon their thigh, always ready to them, for the silencing of the fears of God's people in the night. All the attributes of God are engaged for the safety of believers; they are kept as in a strong hold by his power, 1 Pet. i. 5; are safe in his name, Pr. xviii. 10; his peace protects those in whom it rules, Phil. iv. 7; and the effect of righteousness in them is quietness and assurance, Isa. xxxii. 17. Our danger is from the rulers of the darkness of this world, but we are safe in the armour of light.

Secondly. The splendour of his chariot, ver. 9, 10. As Christ and believers rest in safety under a sufficient guard, so, when they appear publicly, as kings in their coaches of state, they appear in great magnificence. This chariot was of Solomon's own contriving and making, the materials very rich, silver, and gold, and cedar, and purple; he made it for himself, and yet made it for the daughters of Jerusalem, to oblige them. Some by this chariot, or coach, or chaise, (the word is nowhere else used in Scripture,) understand the human nature of Christ, in which the Divine nature rode as in a chariot; it was a Divine workmanship, "A body hast thou prepared me." The structure was very fine, but that which was at the bottom of it was love, pure love to the children of men. Others make it to represent the everlasting Gospel, in which, as in an open chariot, Christ shews himself; and, as in a chariot of war, rides forth triumphantly, conquering, and to conquer. The pillars, the seven pillars, Pr. ix. 1, are of silver, for the words of the Lord are as silver tried, Ps. xii. 7, nay, they are better than thousands of gold and silver; it is hung with purple, a princely colour; all the adornings of it are dyed in the precious blood of Christ, and that gives them this colour. But that which completes the glory of it is love, it is paved with love, it is lined with love; not love of strangers, as Solomon's was in the days of his defection, but love of the daughters of Jerusalem, a holy love. Silver is better than cedar, gold than silver; but love is better than gold, better than all, and it is put last, for nothing can be better than that. The Gospel is all love.

Mr. Durham applies it to the covenant of redemption, the way of our salvation, as it is contrived in the eternal counsel of God, and manifested to us in the Scripture. This is that work of Christ himself, wherein the glory of his grace and love to sinners doth most eminently appear, and which makes him amiable and admirable in the eyes of believers; in this covenant love is conveyed to them, and they are carried in it to the perfection of love, and, as it were, ride in triumph. It is admirably framed and contrived, both for the glory of Christ, and for the comfort of believers; it is well ordered in all things, and sure, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. It has pillars that cannot be shaken, it is made of the wood of Lebanon, which can never rot; the basis of it is gold, the most lasting metal. The blood of the covenant, that rich purple, is the cover of this chariot, by which believers are sheltered from the wind and storms of Divine wrath, and the troubles of this world. But the midst of it, and that which is all in all in it, is love, that love of Christ which passeth knowledge, and the dimensions of which are immeasurable.

Thirdly. The lustre of his royal person when he appears in his greatest pomp, ver. 11. Here observe,

1. The call that is given to the daughters of Zion to acquaint themselves with the glories of king Solomon: "Go forth, and behold him." The multitude of the spectators adds to the beauty of a splendid cavalcade; Christ in his Gospel manifests himself, let each of us add to the number of those that give honour to him, by giving themselves the satisfaction of looking upon him. Who should pay respects to Zion's King but Zion's daughters? They have reason to rejoice greatly when he comes, Zec. ix. 9. 1st. Behold him then; look with pleasure upon Christ in his glory, look upon him with an eye of faith, with a fixed eye. Here is a sight worth seeing; behold and admire him, behold and love him; look upon him and know him again. 2nd. Go forth and behold him, go off from the world, as those that see no beauty and excellency in it, in comparison with what is to be seen in the Lord Jesus. Go out of yourselves, and let the sight of his transcendent beauty put you out of conceit with yourselves. Go forth to the place where he is to be seen, to the street through which he passeth, as Zaccheus.

2. The direction that is given them what they should take special notice of, as that which they would not see every day, and that was his crown. Either the crown of gold, adorned with jewels, which he wore on his coronation day, (Solomon's mother, Bathsheba, though she did not procure that for him, yet by her seasonable interposal she helped to secure it to him, when Adonijah was catching at it,) or, the garland, or crown of flowers and green tied with ribands, which his mother made for him, to adorn the solemnity of his nuptials. Perhaps Solomon's coronation day was his marriage day, the day of his espousals, when the garland his mother crowned him with was added to the crown his people crowned him with. Applying this to Christ, it speaks, 1st. The many honours put upon him, and the power and dominion he is intrusted with. Go forth, and see King Jesus, with the crown wherewith his Father crowned him, when he declared him his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased; when he set him as king upon his holy hill of Zion; when he advanced him to his own right hand, and invested him with a sovereign authority, both in heaven and in earth, and put all things under his feet. 2nd. The dishonour put upon him by his persecutors. Some apply it to the crown of thorns, with which his mother, the Jewish church, crowned him on the day of his death, which was the day of his espousals to his church, when he loved it, and gave himself for it, Eph. v. 25. And it is observable that, when he was brought forth wearing the crown of thorns, Pilate said, and said it to the daughters of Zion, "Behold the man." 3rd. It seems especially to mean the honour done him by his church, as his mother, and by all true believers, in whose hearts he is formed, and of whom he has said, "These are my mother, and sister, and brother," Mat. xii. 50. They give him the glory of his undertaking, to him is glory in the church, Eph. iii. 21. When believers accept of him as theirs, and join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant, First. It is his coronation day in their souls. Before conversion they were crowning themselves, but then they begin to crown Christ, and continue to do so from that day forward; they appoint him their head; they bring every thought into obedience to him; they set up his throne in their hearts, and cast all their crowns at his feet. Secondly. It is the day of his espousals, in which he betrothes them to him for ever, in loving-kindness and in mercies, joins them to himself in faith and love, and gives himself to them in the promises, and all he hath to be theirs. "Thou shalt not be for another, so will I also be for thee," Hos. iii. 3; and to him they are presented as chaste virgins. Thirdly. It is "the day of the gladness of his heart." He is pleased with the honour that his people do him, pleased with the progress of his interest among them. Doth Satan fall before them? In that hour Jesus rejoiceth in spirit, Lu. x. 18, 21. There is joy in heaven over repenting sinners; the family is glad when the prodigal son returns. Go forth, and behold Christ's grace towards sinners, as his crown, his brightest glory.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter, I. Jesus Christ, having espoused the church to himself, (ch. iii. 11,) highly commends her beauty in the several instances of it, concluding her fair, all fair, ver. 1—5; and again, ver. 7. II. He retires himself, and invites her with him from the mountains of terror to those of delight, ver. 6—8. III. He professeth his love to her, and his delight in her affection to him, ver. 9—14. IV. She ascribes all she had that was valuable in her to him, and depends upon the continued influence of his grace to make her more and more acceptable to him, ver. 15, 16.

BEHOLD, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair:
Thou hast doves' eyes within thy locks:
Thy hair is as a flock of goats,
That appear from mount Gilead.
2 Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn,
Which came up from the washing;
Whereof every one bear twins,
And none is barren among them.
3 Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet,
And thy speech is comely: [locks
Thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate within thy 4 Thy neck is like the tower of David builded for an armoury
Whereon there hang a thousand bucklers,
All shields of mighty men.
5 Thy two breasts are like two young roes
That are twins, which feed among the lilies.

in the East. Dr. Tristram taxes both foxes and jackals with eating the grapes, and as the Hebrew word is applied to both, the passage must be understood accordingly.

ii. 17. "The mountains of Bether" is a phrase hard to explain, and our translators have put "or, of division" in the margin (see note on verse 9). It may refer to the ease and agility with which certain animals bound over the ravines and crags of mountain heights. If so, it is not simply the mountains which are interposed between the lovers, but which are riven and divided by clefts. There is no need to regard Bether as a proper name, which our version adopts apparently out of deference to the Vulgate, though not favoured by either the Targum or the Syriac, the Greek, the Arabic, or the Ethiopic. Still, Aquila and Symmachus appear to have had Bether.

iii. 2. The words "I said" are implied at the beginning of this verse, which, however, the poet omits, as in the next verse.

6 Until the day break, and the shadows flee away,
I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill
7 Thou art all fair, my love; [of frankincense.
There is no spot in thee.

Here is, First. A large and particular account of the beauties of the church, and of gracious souls, on whom the image of God is renewed, consisting in the beauty of holiness. In general, he that is a competent judge of beauty, whose judgment we are sure is according to truth, and what all must subscribe to, he hath said, "Behold, thou art fair." She had commended him, and called all about her to take notice of his glories, and hereby she recommends herself to him, gains his favour, and, in return for her respects, he calls to all about him to take notice of her graces. Those that honour Christ he will honour, 1 Sam. ii. 30. He doth not flatter her, nor design hereby either to make her proud of herself or to court her praises of him. But, 1. It is to encourage her under her present dejections; whatever others thought of her, she was amiable in his eyes. 2. It is to teach her what to value herself by; not any external advantages which would add nothing to her, nor the want of them deprive her of any thing that was really excellent, but by the comeliness of grace which he had put upon her. 3. It is to invite others to think well of her too, and to join themselves to her. Thou art my love, thou lovest me, and art loved of me, and therefore thou art fair. All the beauty of the saints is derived from him, and they shine by reflecting his light. It is "the beauty of the Lord our God" that is upon us, Ps. xc. 17. She was espoused to him, and that made her beautiful. Uxor fulget radiis mariti,—'The spouse shines in her husband's rays.' It is repeated, "Thou art fair," and again, "thou art fair;" noting not only the certainty of it, but the pleasure he took in speaking of it. As to the representation here made of the beauty of the church, the images are certainly very bright, the shades strong, and the comparisons bold; not proper, indeed, to represent any external beauty, for they were not designed to do so, but the beauty of holiness, the new man, the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible. Seven particulars are instanced in, a number of perfection; for the church is enriched with manifold graces, by the seven spirits that are before the throne, Rev. i. 4; 1 Cor. i. 5, 7.

1. Her eyes. A good eye contributes much to a beauty. "Thou hast doves' eyes," clear and chaste, and often cast up towards heaven. It is not the eagle's eye, that can face the sun, but the doves' eye, an humble, modest, mournful eye, that is the praise of those whom Christ loves. Ministers are the church's eyes; Isa lii. 9, "Thy watchmen shall see eye to eye:" they must be like doves' eyes, harmless and inoffensive, Mat. x. 16, having their conversation in the world in simplicity and godly sincerity. Wisdom and knowledge are the eyes of the new man, they must be clear, but not haughty, not exercised in things too high for us. When our aims and intentions are sincere and honest, then we have doves' eyes; when we look not unto idols, Eze. xviii. 6, but have our eyes ever towards the Lord, Ps. xxv. 15. The doves' eyes are within the locks, which are as a shade upon them, so that, 1st. They cannot fully see. As long as we are here in this world, we know but in part, for our hair hangs in our eyes; "we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness." Death will shortly cut those locks, and then we shall see all things clearly. 2nd. They cannot be fully seen, but as the stars through the thin clouds. Some make it to intimate the bashfulness of her looks; she suffers not her eyes to wander, but limits them with her locks.

2. Her hair. It is compared to a flock of goats, which looked white, and were on the top of the mountains like a fine head of hair, and the sight was the more pleasant to the spectator, because the goats have not only gravity from their beards, but they are comely in going, Pr. xxx. 31; but it was most pleasant of all to the owner, much of whose riches consisted in his flocks. Christ puts a value upon that in the church, and in believers, which others make no more account of than of their hair; he told his disciples, the very hairs of their head were all numbered, as carefully as men number their flocks, Mat. x. 30, and that not a hair of their head should perish, Lu. xxi. 18. Some by the hair here understand the outward conversation of a believer, which ought to be comely, and decent, and agreeable to the holiness of the heart. The apostle opposeth good works, such as become the professors of godliness, to the plaiting of the hair, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Mary Magdalene's hair was beautiful when she wiped the feet of Christ with it.

3. Her teeth. ver. 2. Ministers are the church's teeth, that, as nurses, chew the meat for the babes of Christ. The Chaldee paraphrase applies it to the priests and Levites, who fed upon the sacrifices, as the representatives of the people. Faith, by which we feed upon Christ, meditation, by which we ruminate on the word, and chew the cud upon what we have heard, in order to the digesting of it, are the teeth of the new man. These are here compared to a flock of sheep; Christ called his disciples and ministers a little flock. It is the praise of teeth to be even, to be white, and kept clean, like sheep from the washing; and to be firm, and well fixed in the gums, and not like sheep that cast their young, for so the word signifies which we translate 'barren.' It is the praise of ministers to be even in mutual love and concord, to be pure, and clean from all moral pollutions, and to be fruitful, bringing forth souls to Christ, and nursing his lambs.

4. Her lips. These are compared to a thread of scarlet, ver. 3. Red lips are comely, and a sign of health, as the paleness of the lips is a sign of faintness and weakness. Her lips were of the colour of scarlet, but thin lips, like a thread of scarlet. The next words explain it; "Thy speech is comely," always with grace, good, and to the use of edifying, which adds much to the beauty of a Christian. When we praise God with our lips, and with the mouth make confession of him to salvation, then they are as a thread of scarlet. All our good works and good words must be washed in the blood of Christ, died like the scarlet thread, and then, and not till then, they are acceptable to God. The Chaldee applies it to the chief priest, and his prayers for Israel on the day of atonement.

5. Her temples, or cheeks, which are here compared to a piece of a pomegranate, fruits which, when cut in two, have red veins, or specks in them, like a blush in the face. Humility and modesty, blushing to lift up our faces before God, blushing at the remembrance of sin, and in a sense of our unworthiness of the honour put upon us, will beautify us very much in the eyes of Christ. The blushes of Christ's bride are within her locks, which intimates, saith Mr. Durham, that she blushes when no other sees, and for that which none sees but God and conscience; also, that she seeks not to proclaim her humility, but modestly covers that too; yet the evidences of all these in a tender walk appear and are comely.

6. Her neck. This is here compared to the tower of David, ver. 4. This is generally applied to the grace of faith, by which we are united to Christ, as the body is united to the head by the neck. This is like the tower of David, furnishing us with weapons of war, especially bucklers and shields, as the soldiers were supplied with them out of that tower; for faith is our shield, Eph. vi. 16; they that have it never want a buckler, for God will compass them with his favour as with a shield. When this neck is like a tower, straight, and stately, and strong, a Christian goes on in his way, and works with courage and magnanimity, and doth not hang a drooping head, as he doth when faith fails. Some make the shields of the mighty men, that are here said to hang up in the tower of David, to be the monuments of the valour of David's worthies; their shields were preserved to keep in remembrance them and their heroic acts, intimating that it is a great encouragement to the saints to hold up their heads, to see what great things the saints in all ages have done and won by faith. In Heb. xi. we have the shields of the mighty men hung up, the exploits of believers, and the trophies of their victories.

7. Her breasts. These are like "two young roes that are twins," ver. 5. The church's breasts are both for ornament, Eze. xvi. 7, and for use; they are the breasts of her consolation, Isa. lxvi. 11, as she is said to suck the breast of kings, Isa. lx. 16. Some apply these to the two testaments, others to the two sacraments, the seals of the covenant of grace, others to the ministers, who are to be spiritual nurses to the children of God, and to give out to them the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby; and in order to that are themselves to feed among the lilies, where Christ feeds, ch. ii. 16, that they may be to the babes of the church as full breasts. Or, the breasts of a believer are his love to Christ, which he is pleased with, as the tender husband is with the affections of his wife, who is therefore said to be to him as the loving hind and the pleasant roe, because her breasts satisfy him at all times, Pr. v. 19. This includes also his edifying others, and communicating grace to them, which adds much to a Christian's beauty.

Secondly. The bridegroom's resolution hereupon to retire to the mountain of myrrh, ver. 6, and there to make his residence. This mountain of myrrh is supposed to signify the mount Moriah, on which the temple was built, where incense was daily burnt to the honour of God. Christ was so pleased with the beauty of his church, that he chooseth this to be his rest for ever; here he will dwell "till the day break, and the shadows flee away." Christ's parting promise to his disciples, as the representatives of the church, answers to this, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." Where the ordinances of God are duly administered, there Christ will be, and there we must meet him, at the door of the tabernacle of meeting. Some make these to be the words of the spouse, either modestly ashamed of the praises given her, and willing to get out of the hearing of them, or desirous to be constant to the holy hill, not doubting but there to find suitable and sufficient succour and relief in all her straits, and there to cast anchor, and wish for the day, which at the time appointed would break, and the shadows flee away. The holy hill, as some observe, is here called both a mountain of myrrh, which is bitter, and a hill of frankincense, which is sweet, for there we have occasion both to mourn and rejoice. Repentance is a bitter sweet; but in heaven it will be all frankincense, and no myrrh. Prayer is compared to incense, and Christ will meet his praying people and will bless them.

Thirdly. His repeated commendation of the beauty of his spouse; ver. 7, "Thou art all fair, my love." He had said, ver. 1, "Thou art fair," but here he goes farther, and in review of the particulars, as of those of the creation, he pronounceth all very good, "Thou art all fair, my love," that is, thou art all over beautiful, and there is nothing amiss in thee, and thou hast all beauties in thee; thou art sanctified wholly in every part, all things are become new, 2 Cor. v. 17. There is not only a new face and a new name, but a new man, a new nature; "there is no spot in thee," as far as thou art renewed. The spiritual sacrifices must be without blemish. There is no spot but such as is often the spot of God's children, none of the leopard's spots. The church, when Christ shall present it to himself a glorious church, will be altogether without spot or wrinkle, Eph. v. 25.

8 Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse,
With me from Lebanon:
Look from the top of Amana,
From the top of Shenir and Hermon,
From the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards.
9 Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse;
Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes,
With one chain of thy neck.
10 How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse!
How much better is thy love than wine!
And the smell of thine ointments than all spices!
11 Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb:
Honey and milk are under thy tongue;
And the smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon.
12 A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse;
A spring shut up, a fountain sealed. [fruits;
13 Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant
Camphire, with spikenard,
14 Spikenard and saffron;
Calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense;
Myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices:

These are still the words of Christ to his church, expressing his great esteem of her, and affection to her, the opinion he had of her beauty and excellency, the desire he had of, and the delight he had in, her converse and society. And so ought men to love their wives as Christ loveth the church, and takes pleasure in it, as if it were spotless, and had no fault, when yet it is compassed with infirmity. Now observe here,

First. The endearing names and titles by which he calls her; to express his love to her, to assure her of it, and to engage and excite her love to him. Twice here he calls her "my spouse," ver. 8, 11, and three times, "my sister, my spouse," ver. 9, 10, 12. Mention was made, ch. iii. 11, of the day of his espousals, and after that she is called his spouse, not before. Note, There is a marriage-covenant between Christ and his church, between Christ and every true believer. Christ calls his church his spouse, and his calling her so makes her so. "I have betrothed thee unto me for ever;" and "as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." He is not ashamed to own the relation, but, as becomes a kind and tender husband, he speaks lovingly to her, and calls her his spouse, which cannot but strongly engage her iii. 6. The words "like pillars of smoke" are supposed by some to allude to the palanquin or litter in which an Oriental prince is carried. The same application is made of the word rendered "bed" in the next verse. From the closing words, "every aromatic powder of the merchant," it would appear that some foreign perfumes were imported in the form of powder, as is now the case. The love of the Orientals for perfumes is well known.

iii. 7, 8. These verses describe the progress of the prince in his palanquin, accompanied by an armed guard. The Assyrians seem usually to have worn their swords at their sides, just above the hip, and a similar position may be implied by the word here translated "thigh." The guard was armed because danger might arise from travelling by night,—"fear" meaning risk or peril.

iii. 9, 10. The word for "chariot" is another term descriptive of a palanquin or litter. It is only once found in the Bible, and that is here. The "pillars" were for the support of the canopy. The to be faithful to him. Nay, because no one relation among men is sufficient to set forth Christ's love to his church, and to shew that all this must be understood spiritually, he owns her in two relations, which among men are incompatible, "my sister, my spouse." Abraham's saying of Sarah, "she is my sister," was interpreted a denying of her to be his wife; but Christ's church is to him both a sister and a spouse, as Mat. xii. 50, a sister and mother. His calling her sister is grounded upon his taking our nature upon him in his incarnation, and his making us partakers of his nature in our sanctification. He clothed himself with a body, Heb. ii. 14, and he clothes believers with his Spirit, 1 Cor. vi. 17, and so they become his sisters. They are children of God his Father, 2 Cor. vi. 18, and so they become his sisters. "He that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one," Heb. ii. 11; and he owns them and loves them as his sisters.

Secondly. The gracious call he gives her to come along with him as a faithful bride, that must forget her own people and her father's house, and leave all to cleave to him. Ubi tu Caius, ibi ego Caia,—'Where thou Caius art, I Caia will be.' "Come with me from Lebanon," ver. 8.

It is, 1. A precept; so we take it, like that, ch. ii. 10, 13, "Rise up, and come away." All that are by faith come to Christ must come with Christ, in holy obedience to him, and compliance with him. Being joined to him, we must walk with him. This is his command to us daily: "Come with me, my spouse," come with me to God as a father, come with me onwards, heavenwards, come forward with me, come up with me. "Come with me from Lebanon, from the top of Amana, from the lions' dens." These mountains are to be considered, 1st. As seemingly delightful places; Lebanon is called that goodly mountain, Deu. iii. 25. We read of the glory of Lebanon, Isa. xxxv. 2, and its goodly smell, Hos. xiv. 6. We read of the pleasant dew of Hermon, Ps. cxxxiii. 3, and the joy of Hermon, Ps. lxxxix. 12. And we may suppose the other mountains here mentioned to be pleasant ones; and so this is Christ's call to his spouse to come off from the world, all its products, and all its pleasures; to sit loose to all the delights of sense. All those must do so that would come with Christ; they must take their affections off from all present things, yea, though they be placed at the upper end of the world, on the top of Amana and the top of Shenir, though they enjoy the highest satisfactions the creature can propose to give, yet they must come away from them all and live above the tops of the highest hills on earth, that they may have their conversation in heaven. Come from those mountains to go along with Christ to the holy mountain, the mountain of myrrh, ver. 6. Even while we have our residence on these mountains, yet we must look from them, look above them; "Shall we lift up our eyes to the hills?" No, "our help cometh from the Lord," Ps. cxxi. 1, 2. We must look beyond them to the things that are not seen, as these high hills are, that are eternal. From the tops of Shenir and Hermon, which were on the other side Jordan, as from Pisgah, they could see the land of Canaan: from this world we must look forward to the better country. 2nd. They are to be considered as really dangerous. These hills, indeed, are pleasant enough, but there are in them lions' dens; they are mountains of the leopards, mountains of prey, though they seem glorious and excellent, Ps. lxxvi. 4. Satan, that roaring lion, is the prince of this world, in the things of it he lies in wait to devour. On the tops of these mountains there are many dangerous temptations to those that take up their residence in them; and, therefore, come with me from them. Let us not set our hearts upon the things of this world, and then they can do us no hurt. Come with me from the temples of idolaters, and the societies of wicked people, so some understand it; "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." Come from under the dominion of your own lusts, which are as lions and leopards, fierce upon us, and making us fierce.

2. It may be taken as a promise Thou shalt come with me from Lebanon, from the lions' dens; that is, 1st. Many shall be brought home to me, as living members of the church, from every point, from Lebanon in the north, Amana in the west, Hermon in the east, Shenir in the south, from all parts, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Mat. viii. 11: see Isa. xlix. 11, 12. Some from the tops of these mountains, some of the great and topping men of this world, shall give themselves to Christ. 2nd. The church shall be delivered from her persecutors in due time. Though now she dwells among lions, Ps. lvii. 4, Christ will take her with himself from among their dens.

Thirdly. The great delight Christ takes in his church, and in all believers. He delights in them,

1. As in an agreeable bride, adorned for her husband, Rev. xxi. 2, who greatly desires her beauty, Ps. xlv. 11. No expressions of love can be more passionate than these here in which Christ manifests his affection to his church, and yet that great proof of his love, his dying for it, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, goes far beyond them all. A spouse so dearly bought and paid for could not but be dearly loved; such a price being given for her, a high value must needs be put upon her accordingly; and both together may well set us a wondering at the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of the love of Christ which passeth knowledge; that love in which he gave himself for us, and gives himself to us. Observe,

1st. How he is affected towards his spouse; "Thou hast ravished my heart." The word is used only here, 'Thou hast hearted me,' or, 'thou hast unhearted me.' New words are coined to express the inexpressibleness of Christ's surprising love to his church; and the strength of that love is set forth by that which is a weakness in men, being so much in love with one object as to be heartless to every thing else. This may refer to that love which Christ had to the chosen remnant before the worlds were, when his "delights were with the sons of men," Pr. viii. 31. That first love which brought him from heaven to earth to seek and save them at such vast expense; yet including the complacency he takes in them when he brought them to himself. Note, Christ's heart is upon his church; so it has appeared all along. His treasure is in it, it is his peculiar treasure, Ex. xix. 5, and therefore there his heart is also. 'Never was love like unto the love of Christ, which made him even mindless of himself when he emptied himself of his glory, and despised all shame and pain for our sakes. The wound of love towards us, which he had from eternity in himself, made him neglect all the wounds and reproaches of the cross.' So Bishop Reynolds here. Thus let us love him.

2nd. What it is that thus affects him with delight. First. The regard she has to him; "Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes," those dove's eyes, clear and chaste, which were commended, ver. 11; with one glance of those eyes. Christ is wonderfully pleased with those that look unto him as their Saviour, and through the eye of faith dart their affections to him above any rival whatsoever, and whose eyes are ever towards him. He is soon aware of the first look of a soul towards him, and meets it with his favours. Secondly. The ornaments she has from him; that is, the obedience she yields to him; for that is the chain of her neck; the graces that enrich her soul, which are connected as links in a chain. The exercise of these graces in a conversation which adorns both herself and the doctrine of Jesus Christ, which she professeth to believe, (as a gold chain is an ornament to persons of quality,) and an entire submission to the commanding power of his law, and the constraining power of his love. Having shaken off the bands of our neck, by which we were tied to this world, Isa. lii. 2, and the yoke of our transgressions, we are bound with the cords of love as chains of gold, to Jesus Christ and our necks brought under his sweet and easy yoke to draw in it. This recommends us to Jesus Christ, for this is that true wisdom which, in his account, is "an ornament of grace unto the head, and chains about the neck," Pr. i. 9 Thirdly. The affection she has for him. "How fair is thy love," how beautiful is it; not only thy love itself, but all the fruits and products of it, its workings in the heart, its works in the life. How well doth it become a believer thus to love Christ, and what a pleasure doth Christ take in it! Nothing recommends us to Christ so as this doth. "How much better is thy love than wine!" then all the wine that was poured out to the Lord in the drink offerings; hence the fruit of the vine is said to cheer God and man, Jud. ix 13. She had said of Christ's love, it is better than wine, ch. i. 2; and now Christ saith so of hers. There is nothing lost by praising Christ, nor will he be behindhand with his friends in kindness. Fourthly. The ointments, the odours, wherewith she is perfumed, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, her good works, which are "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God," Phil. iv. 18. "The smell of thine ointments is better than all spices," such as the queen of Sheba presented to Solomon, camel-loads of them, 1 Kin. x. 2. Or, rather, than all the spices that were used in compounding the holy incense which was burned daily on the golden altar. Love and obedience to God are more pleasing to Christ than sacrifice or incense. The smell of her garments too, the visible profession she makes of religion, and relation to Christ before men, and wherein she appears to the world, this is very grateful to Christ, as the smell of Lebanon. Christ having put upon his spouse the white raiment of his own righteousness, Rev. iii. 18, and the righteousness of saints, Rev. xix. 8, and this perfumed with holy joy and comfort, he is well-pleased with it. Fifthly. Her words, both in her devotions to God, and her discourses with men: ver. 11, "Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb," drop that which is very sweet, and drop it freely and plentifully. If what God speaks to us be sweeter to us than the honey, and the honeycomb, Ps. xix. 10, what we say to him in prayer and praise shall also be pleasing to him; "Sweet is thy voice." And if out of a good treasure in the heart we bring forth good things, if our speech be always with grace, if our lips use knowledge aright, if they disperse knowledge, they then in Christ's account even drop the honeycomb, outdrop it. "Honey and milk," the two staple commodities of Canaan, "are under thy tongue," that is, in thy heart; not only reserved there for thy own use, as a sweet morsel for thyself, but ready there for the use of others. In the word of God there is sweet and wholesome nourishment,—milk for babes, honey for those that are grown up. Christ is well-pleased with those that are full of his word.

2. As in a pleasant garden. And well may a very great delight be compared to the delight taken in a garden, when the happiness of Adam in innocency was represented by the putting of him in a garden, a garden of pleasure. This comparison is pursued, ver. 12—14. The church is fitly compared to a garden, to a garden which, as usual, had a fountain in it. Where Solomon made him gardens and orchards, he made him pools of water, Eccl. ii. 5, 6, not only for curiosity and diversion in water-works, but for use to water the gardens. Eden was well watered, Gen. ii. 10; xiii. 10. Observe,

1st. The peculiarity of this garden. It is "a garden inclosed," a paradise separated from the common earth; it is appropriated to God, he hath set it apart for himself. Israel is God's portion, the lot of his inheritance. It is inclosed for secrecy; the saints are God's hidden ones; therefore, the world knows them not. Christ walks in his garden unseen. It is inclosed for safety; a hedge of protection is made about it, which all the powers of darkness cannot either find or make a gap in. God's vineyard is fenced, Isa. v. 2. There is a wall about it, a wall of fire. It hath a spring in it, and a fountain; but it is "a spring shut up, and a fountain sealed," which sends its streams abroad, Pr. v. 16; but is itself carefully locked up, that it may not by any injurious hand be muddied or polluted. The souls of believers are as gardens enclosed; grace in them is as a spring shut up there in the hidden man of the heart, where the water that Christ gives is a well of living water, Jno. iv. 14; vii. 38. The Old Testament church was a garden inclosed by the partition-wall of the ceremonial law; the Bible was then a spring shut up, and a fountain sealed; it was confined to one nation; but now the wall of separation is removed, the Gospel preached to every nation; in Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew.

2nd. The products of this garden. It is as the garden of Eden, where "the Lord made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food," Gen. ii. 9. "Thy plants," or plantation, "are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits," ver. 13. It is not like the vineyard of the man void of understanding, that was all grown over with thorns and nettles; but here are fruits, pleasant fruits, all trees of frankincense, and all the chief spices, ver. 14. Here is great plenty of fruits and great variety, nothing wanting which might either beautify or enrich this garden, might make it either delightful or serviceable to its great Lord; every thing here is the best of the kind; their chief spices were much more valuable, because much more durable than the choicest of our flowers. Solomon was a great master in botany, as well as other parts of natural philosophy; he treated largely of trees, 1 Kin. iv. 33, and perhaps had reference to some specific qualities of the fruits here instanced in, which made them very fit for the purpose for which he alludes to them; but we must be content to observe in general, that saints in the church, and graces in the saints, are very fitly compared to these fruits and spices; for, First. They are planted, and do not grow of themselves; the trees of righteousness are the planting of the Lord, Isa. lxi. 3. Grace springs from an incorruptible seed. Secondly. They are precious, and of high value. Hence we read of the precious sons of Zion, and their precious faith; they are plants of renown. Thirdly. They are pleasant, and of a sweet savour to God and man, and, as strong aromatics, diffuse their fragrancy. Fourthly. They are profitable, and of great use. Saints are the blessings of this earth, and their graces are their riches, with which they trade as the merchants of the east with their spices. Fifthly. They are permanent, and will be preserved to good purpose, when flowers are withered and good for nothing. Grace, ripened into glory, will last for ever.

15 A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters,
And streams from Lebanon.
16 Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south;
Blow upon my garden,
That the spices thereof may flow out.
Let my beloved come into his garden,
And eat his pleasant fruits.

These seem to be the words of the spouse, the church, in answer to the commendations which Christ the bridegroom had given of her as a pleasant fruitful garden. Is she a garden?

First. She owns her dependence upon Christ himself to make this garden fruitful; to him she has an eye, ver. 15, as the fountain of gardens, not only the founder of them, by whom they are planted, and to whom they owe their

"bottom" may be the visible part of the lower frame, and the "covering" the couch to rest upon. The interior was laid out, or prepared, with love, not "for" the daughters of Jerusalem, but "by" them, because in their zeal they had embroidered the furniture.

iii. 11. The crown here spoken of is the bridal or marriage crown, which has always been a feature of Eastern weddings.

iv. 1—5. "Within thy locks" rather signifies "within thy veil." The word rendered "appear" is only found in this book, and has been variously explained. Gesenius renders the clause "that lie down on Mount Gilead." The comparisons which occur in these verses only seem to require one remark, which is, that they are strongly expressive of the Oriental love of hyperbole. In verse 4 the true idea seems to be that as the tower of David was adorned with the shields of warriors, so her neck was decorated with precious ornaments.

being, but the fountain of them, by whom they are watered, and to whom they owe their continuance and well-being; and without whose constant supplies they would soon become like the dry and barren wilderness. To him she gives all the glory of her fruitfulness, as being nothing without him; "O fountain of gardens," fountain of all good, of all grace, do not thou fail me. Doth a believer say to the church, "All my springs are in thee," in thee, O Zion, Ps. lxxxvii. 7; the church transmits the praise to Christ, and saith to him, "All my springs are in thee;" thou art the well of living waters, Jer. ii. 13, out of which flow the streams from Lebanon, the river Jordan, that had its rise at the foot of mount Lebanon, and the waters of the sanctuary which issued out from under the threshold of the house, Eze. xlvii. 1. They that are gardens to Christ must acknowledge him a fountain to them, from whose fulness they receive, and to whom it is owing that their souls are as a watered garden, Jer. xxxi. 12. The city of God on earth is made glad with the river that flows from this fountain, Ps. xlvi. 4; and the new Jerusalem has its "pure river of water of life proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," Rev. xxii. 1.

Secondly. She implores the influences of the blessed Spirit to make this garden fragrant; ver. 16, "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south." This is a prayer, 1. For the church in general, that there may be a plentiful effusion of the Spirit upon it, in order to its flourishing estate. Ministers' gifts are the spices; when the Spirit is poured out these flow forth, and then the wilderness becomes a fruitful field, Isa. xxxii. 15. This prayer was answered in the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of pentecost, Acts ii. 1, ushered in by a mighty wind; then the apostles, who were bound up before, flowed forth, and were a sweet savour to God, 2 Cor. ii. 15. 2. For particular believers. Note, 1st. Sanctified souls are as gardens, gardens of the Lord, inclosed for him. 2nd. Graces in the soul are as spices in these gardens, that in them which is valuable and useful. 3rd. It is very desirable that the spices of grace should flow forth both in pious and devout affections, and in holy, gracious actions, that with them we may honour God, adorn our profession, and do that which will be grateful to good men. 4th. The blessed Spirit in his operations upon the soul is as the north and the south wind, which blows where it listeth, and from several points, Jno. iii. 8. There is the north wind of convictions, and the south wind of comforts; but all, like the wind, brought out of God's treasuries, and fulfilling his word. 5th. The flowing forth of the spices of grace depends upon the gales of the Spirit; he stirs up good affections, and works in us both to will and to do that which is good; it is he that makes manifest the savour of his knowledge by us. 6th. We ought therefore to wait upon the Spirit of grace for his quickening influences, to pray for them, and to lay our souls under them. God has promised to give us his Spirit, but he will for this be inquired of.

Thirdly. She invites Christ to the best entertainment the garden affords. "Let my beloved then come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits;" let him have the honour of all the products of the garden, it is fit he should, and let me have the comfort of his acceptance of them; for that is the best account they can be made to turn to. Observe, 1. She calls it his garden; for those that are espoused to Christ call nothing their own but what they have devoted to him, and desire may be used for him. When the spices flow forth, then it is fit to be called his garden, and not till then. The fruits of the garden are his pleasant fruits; for he both planted them and watered them, and gave the increase. What can we pretend to merit at Christ's hands when we can invite him to nothing but what is his own already? 2. She begs he would visit it, and accept of what it produced. The believer can take little pleasure in his garden unless Christ, the beloved of his soul, come to him, nor have any joy of the fruits of it unless they redound some way or other to the glory of Christ; and he will think all he has well bestowed upon him.

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's gracious acceptance of the invitation which his church had given him, and the kind visit which he made to her, ver. 1. II. The account which the spouse gives of her own folly in putting a slight upon her beloved, and the plunge she was at by reason of his withdrawings, ver. 2—8. III. The inquiry of the daughters of Jerusalem concerning the amiable perfections of her beloved, ver. 9; and her particular answer to that inquiry, ver. 10—16. "Unto you that believe he is thus precious."

I AM come into my garden, my sister, my spouse:
I have gathered my myrrh with my spice;
I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey;
I have drunk my wine with my milk:
Eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved.

These words are Christ's answer to the church's prayer in the close of the foregoing chapter, "Let my beloved come into his garden;" here he is come, and lets her know it. See how ready God is to hear prayer, how ready Christ is to accept the invitations that his people give him, though we are backward to hear his calls and accept his invitations. He is free in condescending to us, while we are shy of ascending to him. Observe how the return answered the request, and outdid it.

First. She called him her beloved, and really he was so; and she therefore invited him because she loved him. In return to this he called her his sister and spouse, as several times before, ch. iv. Those that make Christ their best beloved shall be owned by him in the nearest and dearest relations.

Secondly. She called the garden his, and the pleasant fruits of it his; and he acknowledgeth them to be so: It is my garden, it is my spice. When God was displeased with Israel, he turned them off to Moses, They are thy people, Ex. xxxii. 7; and he called the appointed feasts of the Lord their appointed feasts, Isa. i. 14. But now they are in his favour he owns them for his garden; though of small account, yet it is mine. They that in sincerity give up themselves, and all they have and can do, to Jesus Christ, he will do them the honour to stamp them and what they have and do for him with his own mark, and say, It is mine.

Thirdly. She invited him to come into his garden, and he saith, I am come; Isa. lviii. 9, "Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am." When Solomon prayed that God would come and take possession of the house he had built for him, he did come, his glory filled the house, 2 Chr. vii. 2; and, ver 16, he let him know that he had chosen and sanctified this house, that his name might be there for ever. They that throw open the door of their souls to Jesus Christ shall find him ready to come into them; and in every place where he records his name he will meet his people and bless them, Ex. xx. 24.

Fourthly. She desired him to eat his pleasant fruits, to accept of the sacrifices offered in his temple, which were as the fruits of his garden, and he doth so; but finds they were not ready for eating, therefore he doth himself gather them. As the fruits are his, so is the preparation of them; he finds the heart unready for his entertainment, but doth himself draw out into exercise those gracious habits which he had planted there. What little good there is in us would be shed and lost if he did not gather it, and preserve it to himself.

Fifthly. She only desired him to eat the fruits of the garden, but he brought along with him something more, honey, and wine, and milk, which yield substantial nourishment, and which were the products of Canaan, Emmanuel's land. Christ delights himself greatly in that which he hath both conferred upon his people and wrought in them. Or we may suppose this to have been prepared by the spouse herself, as Esther prepared for the king her husband a banquet of wine. It is but plain fare, and what is natural, honey and milk; but being kindly designed it is kindly accepted; imperfections are overlooked, the honeycomb is eaten with the honey, and the weakness of the flesh passed by and pardoned because the spirit is willing. When Christ appeared to his disciples after his resurrection he did eat with them a piece of a honeycomb, Lu. xxiv. 42, 43, in which the Scripture was fulfilled. He did not drink the wine only, which is liquor for men, for great men, but the milk too, which is liquor for children, little children; for he was to be the holy child Jesus, that had need of milk.

Sixthly. She only invited him to come himself; but he, bringing his own entertainment along with him, brings his friends too, and invites them to share in the provisions. The more the merrier, we say, and here where there was so much plenty there was not the worse fare. When our Lord Jesus fed five thousand at once, "they did all eat, and were filled." Christ invites all his friends to the wine and milk which he himself drinks of, Isa. lv. 1; to the feast of fat things, and wines on the lees, Isa. xxv. 6. The great work of man's redemption, and the riches of the covenant of grace, are a feast to the Lord Jesus, and they ought to be so to us. The invitation is very free, and hearty, and loving; "Eat, O friends!" If Christ comes in to sup with us, it is we that sup with him, Rev. iii. 20; "Eat, O friends!" Those only that are Christ's friends are welcome to his table; his enemies, that will not have him to reign over them, have no part or lot in the matter. "Drink, yea, drink abundantly." Christ in his Gospel has made plentiful provision for poor souls; he filleth the hungry with good things; there is enough for all, there is enough for each. We are not straitened in him or in his grace, let us not therefore be straitened in our own bosoms; open thy mouth wide, and Christ will fill it. "Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit," Eph. v. 18. Those that entertain Christ must bid his friends welcome with him; Jesus and his disciples were called together to the marriage, Jno. ii. 1. And Christ will have all his friends to rejoice with him in the day of his espousals to his church; and in token of that to feast with him. In spiritual and heavenly joys there is no danger of exceeding; there we may drink abundantly; drink of the river of God's pleasures, Ps. xxxvi. 8, and be abundantly satisfied, Ps. lxv. 4.

2 I sleep, but my heart waketh:
It is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying,
Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled:
For my head is filled with dew,
And my locks with the drops of the night.
3 I have put off my coat;
How shall I put it on?
I have washed my feet;
How shall I defile them?
4 My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door,
And my bowels were moved for him.
5 I rose up to open to my beloved;
And my hands dropped with myrrh,
And my fingers with sweet smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock.
6 I opened to my beloved;
But my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone:
My soul failed when he spake:
I sought him, but I could not find him;
I called him, but he gave me no answer.
7 The watchmen that went about the city found me,

NIGHT-WATCH IN INDIA.

They smote me, they wounded me;
The keepers of the walls took away my veil from me.

iv. 8—14. The exultant lover here pursues his rapturous strain. Amana is thought to have been one of the mountains of Anti-Lebanon. Shenir, or rather Senir, was the Amorite name of one of the summits of Hermon. Lions no longer haunt Palestine and its vicinity, but leopards are still numerous. The word for spices in verses 10 and 14 really means aromatics or perfumes employed as scents. The saffron in verse 14 was used as an ingredient in perfume, but in what form is not stated. At present the inner portions of the flower are collected, dried, pounded, and formed into small tablets or cakes, in Syria. The aromatic calamus seems to have been imported from countries farther east, as India, like the so-called aloes, which was probably sandal wood. Cinnamon was brought from Ceylon, spikenard from India, so frankincense, and myrrh from Arabia. The camphire, or henna, grew in the country.

iv. 15. "A fountain of gardens" is as much as to say "a garden fountain," which is an ornament and an advantage for the special

8 I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem,
If ye find my beloved, that ye tell him,
That I am sick of love.

In this song of loves and joys, we have here a very melancholy scene; the spouse here speaks not to her beloved, as before, for he is withdrawn, but of him, and it is a sad story she tells of her own folly and ill-carriage towards him, notwithstanding his kindness, and of the just rebukes she fell under for it. Perhaps it may refer to Solomon's own apostacy from God, and the sad effects of that apostacy after God had come into his garden, had taken possession of the temple he had built, and he had feasted with God upon the sacrifices, ver. 1. However, it is applicable to the too common case, both of churches and particular believers, who by their carelessness and security provoke Christ to withdraw from them. Observe,

First. The indisposition that the spouse was under, and the listlessness that had seized her; ver. 2, "I sleep, but my heart wakes." Here is, 1. Corruption appearing in the actings of it, "I sleep;" the wise virgins slumbered. She was on her bed, ch. iii. 1, but now she sleeps. Spiritual distempers, if not striven against at first, are apt to grow upon us, and to get ground. She slept; that is, pious affections cooled, she neglected her duty, and grew remiss in it, she indulged herself in her ease, was secure, and off her watch. This is sometimes the bad effect of more than ordinary enlargements—a good cause. St. Paul himself was in danger of being puffed up with abundant revelations, and of saying, "Soul, take thine ease," which made a thorn in the flesh necessary for him, to keep him from sleeping. Christ's disciples, when he was come into his garden, the garden of his agony, were heavy with sleep, and could not watch with him. True Christians are not always alike lively and vigorous in religion. 2. Grace remaining notwithstanding, in the habit of it, "My heart wakes;" my own conscience reproacheth me for it, and ceaseth not to rouse me out of my sluggishness. "The spirit is willing," and "after the inner man I delight in the law of God, and with my mind I serve that;" I am for the present overpowered by temptation, but all doth not go one way in me. "I sleep," but it is not a dead sleep, I strive against it, it is not a sound sleep; I cannot be easy under this indisposition. Note, 1st. We ought to take notice of our own spiritual slumbers and distempers, and to reflect upon it with sorrow and shame that we have fallen asleep when Christ has been nigh us in his garden. 2nd. When we are lamenting what is amiss in us, we must not overlook the good that is wrought in us, and preserved alive. "My heart wakes" in Christ, who is dear to me as my own heart, and is my life; when I sleep, he neither slumbers nor sleeps.

Secondly. The call that Christ gave to her when she was under this indisposition. "It is the voice of my beloved;" she knew it to be so, and was soon aware of it, which was a sign that her heart was awake. Like the child Samuel, she heard at the first call, but did not, like him, mistake the person; she knew it to be the voice of Christ. He knocks, to awaken us to come and let him in; knocks by his word and Spirit, knocks by afflictions, and by our own consciences; though this be not expressly quoted, yet probably it is referred to, Rev. iii. 20, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." He calls sinners into covenant with him. Those whom he loves he will not let alone in their carelessness, but will find some way or other to awaken them, to rebuke and chasten them. When we are unmindful of Christ, he thinks of us, and provides that our faith fail not. Peter denied Christ, but the Lord turned and looked upon him, and so brought him to himself again. Observe how moving the call is; "Open to me, my sister, my love." 1. He sues for entrance, who may demand it, and knocks, who could easily knock the door down. 2. He gives her all the kind and most endearing titles imaginable; "My sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled." He not only gives her no hard names, nor upbraids her with unkindness in not sitting up for him, but, on the contrary, studies how to express his tender affection to her still; his lovingkindness he will not utterly take away. Those that by faith are espoused to Christ, he looks upon as his sisters, his loves, his doves, and all that is dear; and, being clothed with his righteousness, they are undefiled. This consideration should induce her to open to him; Christ's love to us should engage ours to him, even in the most self-denying instances. "Open to me;" can we deny entrance to such a friend? to such a guest? Shall we not converse more with one that is infinitely worthy of our acquaintance, and so affectionately desirous of it, though we only can be gainers by it? 3. He pleads distress, and begs to be admitted sub forma pauperis,—'as a pauper,' under the character of a poor traveller that wants a lodging. "My head is wet with the dew," with the cold drops "of the night;" consider what hardships I have undergone to merit for thee, which sure may merit from thee so small a kindness as this. When Christ was crowned with thorns, which no doubt fetched blood from his blessed head, then was his head wet with the dew. Consider what a grief it is to me to be thus unkindly used, as much as it would be to a tender husband to be kept out of doors by his wife in a rainy, stormy night. Do we thus requite him for his love? The slights which careless souls put upon Jesus Christ are to him as a continual dropping in a very rainy day.

Thirdly. The excuse she made to put off her compliance with this call; ver. 3, "I have put off my coat, how shall I put it on again?" She is half asleep, she knows the voice of her beloved, she knows his knock, but cannot find in her heart to open to him; she was undressed, and would not be at the pains to dress her again; had washed her feet, and would not have occasion to wash them again. She could not send another to open the door; it must be our own act and deed to let Christ into our hearts, and yet she was loath to go herself; she did not say, I will not open, but "how shall I?" Note, Frivolous excuses are the language of prevailing slothfulness in religion; Christ calls to us to open to him, but we pretend we have no mind, or we have no strength, or we have no time; and therefore think we may be excused, as the sluggard that will not plough by reason of cold. And those who ought to watch for the Lord's coming, with their loins girt, if they ungird themselves, and put off their coat, they will find it difficult to recover their former resolution, and to put it on again; it is best therefore to keep tight. Making excuses, Lu. xiv. 18, is interpreted making light of Christ, Mat. xxii. 5; and so it is. Those put a great contempt upon Christ that cannot find in their hearts to bear a cold blast for him, or get out of a warm bed.

Fourthly. The powerful influences of Divine grace, by which she was made willing to rise and open to her beloved. When he could not prevail with her by persuasion, he "put in his hand by the hole of the door" to unbolt it, as one weary of waiting, ver. 4. This intimates a work of the Spirit upon her soul, by which she was of unwilling made willing, Ps. cx. 3; the conversion of Lydia is represented by the opening of her heart, Acts xvi. 14. And Christ is said to open his disciples' understandings, Lu. xxiv. 45. He that formed the spirit of man within him knows all the avennes to it, and which way to enter into it, he can find the hole of the door, at which to put in his hand for the conquering of prejudices, and the introducing of his own doctrine and law. He has the key of David, Rev. iii. 7, with which he opens the door of the heart in such a way as is suited to it, as the key is fitted to the wards of the lock, in such a way as not to put a force upon its nature, but only upon its ill-nature.

Fifthly. Her compliance with these methods of Divine grace at last; "My bowels were moved for him." The will was gained by a good work wrought upon the affections; "My bowels were moved for him," as those of the two disciples were when Christ made their heart to burn within them. She was moved with compassion to her beloved, because his "head was wet with the dew." Note, Tenderness of spirit, and a heart of flesh, prepares the soul for the reception of Christ into it; and therefore his love to us is represented in such a way as is most affecting. Did Christ redeem us in his pity, let us in pity receive him, and those that are his for his sake, when at any time they are in distress. This good work wrought upon her affections, raised her up, and made her ashamed of her dulness and slothfulness; ver. 5, "I rose up to open to my beloved;" his grace inclining her to do it, and conquering the opposition of unbelief. It was her own act, and yet he wrought it in her: and now her "hands dropped with myrrh upon the handles of the lock." Either, 1. She found it there, when she applied her hand to the lock to shoot it back; he that put in his hand by the hole of the door left it there, as an evidence that he had been there. When Christ has wrought powerfully upon a soul, he leaves a blessed sweetness in it, which is very delightful to it; with this he oiled the lock to make it go easy. Note, When we apply ourselves to our duty in the lively exercises of faith, under the influence of Divine grace, we shall find it will go on much more readily and sweetly than we expected. If we will but rise up to open to Christ, we shall find the difficulty we apprehended in it strangely overcome, and shall say with Daniel, Now, "let my Lord speak, for thou hast strengthened me," Dan. x. 19. Or, 2. She brought it thither; her bowels being moved for her beloved, who had stood so long in the cold and wet, when she came to open to him she prepared to anoint his head, and so to refresh and comfort him, and perhaps to prevent his catching cold. She was in such haste to meet him, that she would not stay to make the usual preparation, but dipped her hand in her box of ointment, that she might readily anoint his head at his first coming in. Those that open the doors of their hearts to Christ, those everlasting doors, must meet him with the lively exercises of faith and other graces, and with these must anoint him.

Sixthly. Her sad disappointment when she did open to her beloved; and here is the most melancholy part of the story: "I opened to my beloved," as I intended, "but, alas, my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone;" 'my beloved was gone, was gone,' so the word is. She did not open to him at his first knock, and now she came too late, when afterwards she would have inherited this blessing. Christ will be sought while he may be found; if we slip our time we lose our passage. Note, 1st. Christ justly rebukes our delays with his denials, and suspends the communications of comfort from those that are remiss and drowsy in their duty. 2nd. Christ's departures are matter of great grief and lamentation to believers. The royal psalmist never complains of any thing with such sorrowful accents as God's hiding his face from him, and casting him off, and forsaking him. The spouse here is ready to tear her hair, and rend her clothes, and wring her hands, crying, 'He is gone, he is gone;' and that which cuts her to the heart is, that she may thank herself she provoked him to withdraw. If Christ depart, it is because he takes something unkindly. Now observe what she doth in this case, and what befell her.

1. She still calls him her beloved, being resolved, how cloudy and dark soever the day be, she will not quit her relation to him, and interest in him. It is a weakness, upon every apprehension either of our own failings or of God's withdrawings, to conclude hardly as to our spiritual state. Every desertion is not despair. I will say, "Lord, I believe," though I must say, "Lord, help my unbelief." Though he leave me, I love him; he is mine.

2. She now remembers the words he said to her when he called her, and what impressions they made upon her; reproaching herself for her folly in not complying sooner with her convictions. "My soul failed when he spake;" his words melted me, when he said, "My head is wet with the dew," and yet, wretch that I was, I lay still, and made excuses, and did not open to him. The smothering and stifling of our convictions is a thing that will be very bitter in the reflection, when God opens our eyes. Sometimes the word hath not its effect presently upon the heart, but it melts it afterwards upon second thoughts. "My soul now melted because of his words" which he had spoken before.

3. She did not go to bed again, but went in pursuit of him; "I sought him, I called him." She might have saved herself this labour, if she would but have bestirred herself when he first called; but we cut ourselves out a great deal of work, and create ourselves a great deal of trouble, by our own slothfulness and carelessness in improving our opportunities. Yet it is her praise, that when her beloved is withdrawn she continues seeking him; her desires towards him are made more strong, and her inquiries after him more solicitous, by his withdrawings. She calls him by prayer, calls after him, and begs of him to return; and she doth not only pray, but use means, she seeks him in the ways wherein she used to find him.

4. Yet still she missed of him; "I could not find him, he gave me no answer." She had no evidences of his favour, no sensible comforts, but was altogether in the dark, and in doubt concerning his love to her. Note, There are those who have a true love for Christ, and yet have not immediate answers to their prayers for his smiles; but he gives them an equivalent, if he strengthens them with strength in their souls to continue seeking him, Ps. cxxxviii. 3. St. Paul could not prevail for the removing of the thorn in the flesh, but was answered with grace sufficient for him.

5. She was ill-treated by the watchmen; "They found me, they smote me, they wounded me," ver. 7. They took her for a lewd woman, because she went about the streets at that time of night, when they were walking their rounds, and beat her accordingly. Disconsolate saints are taken for sinners, and are censured and reproached as such. Thus Hannah, when she was praying in the bitterness of her soul, was wounded and smitten by Eli, one of the prime watchmen, when he said to her, "How long wilt thou be drunken?" so counting her a daughter of Belial, 1 Sam. i. 14, 15. It is no new thing for those that are of the loyal loving subjects of Zion's King to be misrepresented by the watchmen of Zion as enemies, or scandals to his kingdom; they could not abuse and persecute them but by putting them into an ill name. Some apply it to those ministers, who, though watchmen by office, yet misapply the word to awakened consciences, and through unskilfulness or contempt of their griefs, add affliction to the afflicted; and "make the hearts of the righteous sad, whom God would not have made sad," Eze. xiii. 22; discouraging those who ought to be encouraged, and "talking to the grief of those whom God has wounded," Ps. lix. 26. Those watchmen were bad enough, that could not or would not assist the spouse in her inquiries after her beloved, ch. iii. 3; but these were much worse, that hindered her with their severe and uncharitable censures; smote her and wounded her with their reproaches, and, though they were the keepers of the wall of Jerusalem, as if they had been the breakers of it, took away her vail from her rudely and barbarously, as if it had been only a pretence of modesty, but a cover of the contrary. They whose outward appearances are all good, and yet are invidiously condemned and run down for hypocrites, have reason to complain as the spouse here of the taking away of their vail from them.

6. When she was disabled, by the abuses the watchmen gave her, to prosecute benefit of the owner (compare verse 12). "A well of living waters" is a perennial spring, for so the phrase is literally explained.

iv. 16. A writer in Kitto's Cyclopædia says that the invocation in this verse, "which has occasioned much perplexity to illustrators, seems well explained by Rosenmüller, as simply alluding to the effect of winds from opposite quarters in dispersing the fragrance of aromatic shrubs, far and wide, in all directions."

v. 2. The dew is often very copious in Palestine. Dr. Thomson says, "Did you observe that the dew rolled off our tent this morning like rain? And now the early sunbeams 'sow the earth with pearls and diamonds,' as Milton's muse describes these pendant drops, that glitter and sparkle from every leaf in the forest and blade in the field."

v. 4. The peculiar structure of locks in the East to this day is such that they may be opened from the outside, with a little ingenuity, even by the finger. To prevent the unfastening of the door from her inquiry herself, she gave charge to those about her to assist her in the inquiry; ver. 8, "I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem," all my friends and acquaintance, "if you find my beloved," it may be you may meet with him before I shall, 'what shall ye tell him?' so some read it; speak a good word for me, and "tell him that I am sick of love." Observe here, 1st. What her condition was. She loved Jesus Christ to that degree that his absence made her sick, extremely sick, she could not bear it; and she was in pain for his return, as a woman in travail, as Ahab for Naboth's vineyard, which he so passionately coveted. This is a sickness which is a sign of a healthful constitution of soul, and will certainly end well; a sickness that will be not death, but life. It is better be sick of love to Christ than at ease in love to the world. 2nd. What course she took in this condition. She did not sink into despair, and conclude she should die of her disease, but she sent after her beloved; she asked the advice of her neighbours, and begged their prayers for her, that they would intercede with him on her behalf. Tell him, though I was careless, and foolish, and slothful, and rose not up so soon as I should have done to open to him, yet I love him; he knows all things, he knows that I do. Represent me to him as sincere, though in many instances coming short of my duty; nay, represent me to him as an object of his pity, that he may have compassion on me, and help me. She doth not bid them tell him how the watchmen had abused her; how unrighteous soever they were in it, she acknowledgeth that the Lord is righteous, and therefore bears it patiently; but tell him that I am wounded with love to him. Gracious souls are more sensible of Christ's withdrawings than of any other trouble whatsoever. Languet amans, non languet amor,—'The lover languishes, but not his love.'

9 What is thy beloved more than another beloved,
O thou fairest among women?
What is thy beloved more than another beloved,
That thou dost so charge us?
10 My beloved is white and ruddy,
The chiefest among ten thousand.
11 His head is as the most fine gold,
His locks are bushy, and black as a raven.
12 His eyes are as the eyes of doves by the rivers of waters,
Washed with milk, and fitly set.
13 His cheeks are as a bed of spices, as sweet flowers:
His lips like lilies, dropping sweet smelling myrrh.
14 His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl:
His belly is as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires. [gold:
15 His legs are as pillars of marble, set upon sockets of fine
His countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars.

LEBANON, WITH CEDARS.

16 His mouth is most sweet: yea, he is altogether lovely.
This is my beloved, and this is my friend,
O daughters of Jerusalem.

Here is, First. The question which the daughters of Jerusalem put to the spouse concerning her beloved, in answer to the charge she had given them, ver. 9. Observe,

1. The respectful title they give to the spouse; "O thou fairest among women." Our Lord Jesus makes his spouse truly amiable, not only in his eyes, but in the eyes of all the daughters of Jerusalem. The church is the most excellent society in the world, the communion of saints the best communion, and the beauty of the sanctuary a transcendent beauty. The saints are the most excellent people; holiness is the symmetry of the soul; it is its agreement with itself, it recommends itself to all that are competent judges of it. Even those that have little acquaintance with Christ, as those daughters of Jerusalem here, yet cannot but see an amiable beauty in those that bear his image, which we should love wherever we see it, though in different dresses.

2. Their inquiry concerning her beloved; "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?" If thou wilt have us to find him for thee, give us his marks, that we may know him when we see him.

1st. Some take it for a slighting question, blaming her for making such ado about him. Why shouldst thou be so passionate in inquiring after thy beloved, more than others are after theirs? Why shouldst thou be so set upon him, more than others that yet have a kindness for him? Those that are zealous in religion are men wondered at by such as are indifferent to it. The many careless ones laugh at the few that are solicitous and serious. What is there in him that is so very charming, more than in another person? If he be gone, thou that art the fairest among women wilt soon have another with an equal flame. Note, Carnal hearts see nothing excellent or extraordinary in the Lord Jesus; in his person or offices, in his doctrine or in his favours; as if there were no more in the knowledge of Christ, and in communion with him, than in the knowledge of the world, and in its conversation.

2nd. Others rather take it for a serious question, and that by it they intended, First. To comfort the spouse, who they knew would recover new spirits if she did but talk awhile of her beloved; and that nothing would please her better, nor give a more powerful diversion to her grief, than to be put upon the pleasing talk of describing the beauties of her beloved. Secondly. To inform themselves. They had heard in general that he was excellent and glorious, but they desired to know more particularly. They wondered what moved the spouse to charge them concerning her beloved with so much vehemence and concern, and therefore conclude there must be something more in him than in another beloved, which they are willing to be convinced of. Then there begins to be some hopes of people, when they begin to inquire concerning Christ, and his transcendent perfections. And sometimes the extraordinary zeal of one in inquiring after Christ may be a means to provoke many, 2 Cor. ix. 2, as the apostle by the faith of the Gentiles would stir up the Jews to a holy emulation, Rom. xi. 14: see Jno. iv. 10.

Secondly. The account which the spouse gives of her beloved in answer to this question. We should always be ready to instruct and assist those that are inquiring after Christ. Experienced Christians, that are well acquainted with Christ themselves, should do all they can to bring others acquainted with him.

1. She assures them in general that he is one of incomparable perfections and unparalleled worth, ver. 10. Do not you know my beloved? Can the daughters of Jerusalem be ignorant of him that is Jerusalem's crown, and crowned head? Let me tell you then,

1st. That he has every thing in him that is lovely and amiable. "My beloved is white and ruddy," the colours that make up a complete beauty. This points not at any extraordinary beauty of his body when he should be incarnate, it was never said of the child Jesus, as of the child Moses when he was born, that he was exceeding fair, Acts vii. 20; nay, he had no form, nor comeliness, Isa. liii. 2; but his Divine glory, and the concurrence of every thing in him, as Mediator, to make him truly lovely in the eyes of those that are enlightened to discern spiritual things. In him we may behold the beauty of the Lord; he was the holy child Jesus, that was his fairness. If we look upon him as "made to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption," he appears in all very amiable. His love to us renders him lovely. He is white in the spotless innocency of his life, ruddy in the bloody sufferings he went through at his death. White in his glory as God,—when he was transfigured, "his raiment was white as the light,"—ruddy in his assuming the nature of man, Adam, 'red earth.' White in his tenderness towards his people; ruddy in his terrible appearances against his and their enemies. His complexion is a very happy composition.

2nd. That he has that loveliness in him which is not to be found in any other. He is "the chiefest among ten thousand;" a nonsuch for beauty, "fairer than the children of men," than any of them, than all of them; there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him, every thing else is to be accounted loss and dung in comparison of him, Phil. iii. 8. He is "higher than the kings of the earth," Ps. lxxxix. 27, and has obtained a more excellent name than any of the principalities and powers of the upper or lower world, Phil. ii. 9; Heb. i. 4. He is 'a standard-bearer among ten thousand,' so the word is; the tallest and comeliest of the company. He is himself lifted up as an ensign, Isa. xi. 10, to whom we must be gathered, and must always have an eye. And there is all the reason in the world that he should have the innermost and uppermost place in our souls who is the fairest of ten thousands in himself, and the fittest of twenty thousands for us.

2. She gives a particular detail of his accomplishments, conceals not his power or comely proportion. Every thing in Christ is amiable. Ten instances she here gives of his beauty, which we need not be nice in the application of, lest the wringing of them bring forth blood, and prove the wresting of them. The design in general is to shew that he is every way qualified for his undertaking, and has all that in him which may recommend him to our esteem, love, and confidence. Christ's appearance to John, Rev. i. 13, &c., may be compared with the description which the spouse gives of him here, the scope of both being to represent him transcendently glorious, that is, both great and gracious, made lovely in the eyes of believers, and making them happy in himself.

1st. "His head is as the most fine gold." "The head of Christ is God," 1 Cor. xi 3, and it is promised to the saints that the Almighty shall be their gold, Job xxii. 25, their defence, their treasure, much more was he so to Christ, "in whom dwells all the fulness of the godhead bodily," Col. ii. 9. Christ's head speaks his sovereign dominion over all, and his vital influence upon his church, and all its members. This is as gold, gold. The former word signifies shining gold; the latter, strong, solid gold. Christ's sovereignty is both beautiful and powerful. Nebuchadnezzar's monarchy is compared to a head of gold, Dan. ii. 38, because it excelled all the other monarchies, and so doth Christ's government.

2nd. "His locks are bushy and black;" not black as the tents of Kedar, whose blackness was their deformity, to which therefore the church compares herself, ch. i. 5, but black as a raven, whose blackness is his beauty. Sometimes Christ's hair is represented as white, Rev. i. 14, noting his eternity, that he is the Ancient of days; but here as black and bushy, speaking him ever young, and that there is in him no decay, nothing that waxeth old. Every thing that belongs to Christ is amiable in the eyes of a believer, even his hair is so; it was pity it should be wet as it was with the dew, and these locks with the drops of the night, while he waited to be gracious, ver. 2.

3rd. "His eyes are as the eyes of doves," fair, and clear, and chaste, and kind. "By the rivers of waters," which doves delight in, and in which, as in a glass, they see themselves, they are washed to make them clean, washed with milk to make them white, and fitly set, neither starting out nor sunk in. Christ is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, for they are doves' eyes, Hab. i. 13. All believers speak with pleasure of the omniscience of Christ, as the spouse here of his eyes; for though it be terrible to his enemies as a flame of fire, Rev. i. 14, yet it is amiable and comfortable to his friends as doves' eyes, for it is a witness to their integrity; "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." Blessed and holy are they that walk always as under the eye of Christ.

4th. "His cheeks" (the risings of the face) "are as a bed of spices," raised in the gardens, which are the beauty and wealth of them, and "as sweet flowers," or 'towers of sweetness.' There is that in Christ's countenance which is amiable in the eyes of all the saints, in the least glimpse of him, for the cheek is but a part of the face. The half discoveries Christ makes of himself to the soul are reviving and refreshing, fragrant above the richest flowers and perfumes.

5th. "His lips are like lilies," not white like lilies, but sweet and pleasant. Such are the words of his lips to all that are sanctified, sweeter than honey and the honeycomb; such the kisses of his lips, all the communications of his grace. "Grace is poured into his lips," and they "that heard him wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth." "His lips are as lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh." Never any lilies in nature dropped myrrh, but nothing in nature can fully set forth the beauty and excellency of Christ, and therefore to do it by comparison there must be a composition of images.

without, a pin was inserted into the bolt. The text suggests that this precaution had been taken, as the bridegroom failed in his attempt to unfasten the door.

v. 7. Dr. Kitto says that the streets of towns of Western Asia "are usually patrolled at night by guards, who are much feared on account of their dextrous and ever ready use of the stout cudgels which they carry in their hands." "The watchmen," he adds, "challenge every approaching passenger, and expect an answer. Women are almost never seen in the streets at night. If circumstances were similar among the Hebrews, the treatment which is here described is sufficiently explained, and is what any female might expect in hurrying through the streets at night, without male servants bearing lights, and in her fright probably neglecting to reply to the challenge of the watchman." The so-called "veil" was no doubt a "wide and thin garment, such as Eastern ladies to the present day throw over all the rest of their dress" (Thrupp).

6th. "His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl," a noted precious stone, ver. 14. Great men had their hands adorned with gold rings on their fingers, set with diamonds, or other precious stones, but in her eye his hands themselves were as gold rings. All the instances of his power, the works of his hands, all the performances of his providence and grace, are all rich, and pure, and precious as gold, "as the precious onyx and the sapphire," all fitted to the purpose for which they were designed, as gold rings to the finger, and all beautiful and very becoming, "as rings set with beryl." His hands, which are stretched forth both to receive his people and to give to them, are thus rich and comely.

7th. "His bowels are as bright ivory;" for so it should be rendered rather than "his belly," for it is the same word that was used for bowels, ver. 4, and is often ascribed to God, as Isa. lxiii. 15; Jer. xxxi. 20; and so it notes his tender compassion and affection for his spouse, and the love he has to her, even in her desolate and deserted state. This love of his is like bright ivory, finely polished, and richly "overlaid with sapphires." The love itself is strong and firm, and the instances and circumstances of it are bright and sparkling, and add much to the inestimable value of it.

8th. "His legs are as pillars of marble," so strong, so stately, and no disgrace, no, not to the "sockets of fine gold" upon which they are set, ver. 15. This speaks his stability and stedfastness; where he sets his foot he will fix it. He is able to bear all the weight of the government that is upon his shoulders, and his legs will never fail under him. This sets forth the stateliness and magnificence of "the goings of our God, our King, in his sanctuary," Ps. lxviii. 24, and the steadiness and evenness of all his dispensations towards his people. "The ways of the Lord are equal," they are all mercy and truth; these are the pillars of marble, more lasting than the pillars of heaven.

9th. "His countenance," his port and mien, "is as Lebanon," that stately hill; his aspect beautiful and charming, like the prospect of that pleasant forest, or park; excellent as the cedars, which in height and strength excel other trees, and are of excellent use. Christ is a goodly person, the more we look upon him the more beauty we shall see in him.

10th. "His mouth is most sweet," it is sweetness itself; it is 'sweetnesses,' so the word is, it is pure essence, nay, it is the quintessence of all delights, ver. 16. The words of his mouth are all sweet to a believer, sweet as milk to babes, to whom it is agreeable; as honey to those that are grown up, Ps. cxix. 103, to whom it is delicious. The kisses of his mouth, all the tokens of his love, have a transcendent sweetness in them, and are most delightful to them who have their spiritual senses exercised; "To you that believe he is precious."

3. She concludes with a full assurance both of faith and hope, and so gets the mastery of her trouble.

1st. Here is a full assurance of faith concerning the complete beauty of the Lord Jesus; "He is altogether lovely." Why should I stand to mention particulars, when throughout there is nothing amiss? She is sensible she doth him wrong in the particular descriptions of him, and comes far short of the dignity and merit of the subject, and therefore she breaks off with this general encomium, He is truly lovely, he is wholly so. There is nothing in him but what is amiable, and nothing amiable but what is in him. He is all desires; he has all in him that one can desire, and therefore all her desire is towards him, and she seeks him thus carefully, and cannot rest contented in the want of him. Who can but love him who is so lovely?

2nd. Here is a full assurance of hope concerning her own interest in him; "This is my beloved, and this is my friend," and therefore wonder not that I thus long after him. See with what a holy boldness she claims relation to him, and then with what a holy triumph she proclaims it. It is propriety that sweetens excellency. To see Christ, and not to see him as ours, would be rather a torture than a happiness; but to see one that is thus lovely, and to see him as ours, is a complete satisfaction. Here is a true believer, 1st. Giving an entire consent to Christ; He is mine, "my Lord and my God," Jno. xx. 28, mine according to the tenor of the gospel covenant, mine in all relations; bestowed upon me, to be all that to me that my poor soul stands in need of. 2nd. Taking an entire complacency in Christ. It is spoken of here with an air of triumph; This is he whom I have chosen, and to whom I have given up myself; 'None but Christ, none but Christ.' This is he on whom my heart is, for he is my best beloved. This is he in whom I trust, and from whom I expect all good, for this is my friend. Note, Those that make Christ their beloved shall have him their friend; he has been, is, and will be, a special friend to all believers. He loves those that love him, and those that have him their friend have reason to glory in him, and speak of him with delight. Let others be governed by the love of the world, and seek their happiness in its friendship and favours, "this is my beloved, and this is my friend." Others may do as they please, but this is my soul's choice, my soul's rest, my life, my joy, my all; this is he whom I desire to live and die with.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter, I. The daughters of Jerusalem, moved with the description which the church had given of Christ, inquire after him, ver. 1. II. The church directs them where they may meet with him, ver. 2, 3. III. Christ is now found of those that sought him, and very highly applauds the beauty of his spouse, as one extremely smitten with it, ver. 4—7; preferring her before all others, ver. 8, 9; and recommending her to the love and esteem of all her neighbours, ver. 10; and, lastly, acknowledging the impressions which her beauty had made upon him, and the great delight he took in it, ver. 11—13.

WHITHER is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women?
Whither is thy beloved turned aside?
That we may seek him with thee.

2 My beloved is gone down into his garden
To the beds of spices,
To feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies.

3 I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine:
He feedeth among the lilies.

Here is, First. The inquiry which the daughters of Jerusalem made concerning Christ, ver. 1. They still continue their high thoughts of the church, and call her, as before, the fairest among women; for true sanctity is true beauty. And now they raise their thoughts higher concerning Christ: "Whither is thy beloved gone? that we may seek him with thee." This would be but an indecent unacceptable compliment if the song were not to be understood spiritually; for love is jealous of a rival, would monopolise the beloved, and cares not that others should join in seeking him; but they that truly love Christ are desirous that others should love him too, and be joined to him; nay, the greatest instance of duty and respect that the church's children can shew to their mother is to join with her in seeking Christ. The daughters of Jerusalem, that had asked, ch. v. 9, "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?" wondering that the spouse should be so passionately in love with him, are now of another mind, and are themselves in love with him; for, 1. The spouse had described him, and shewn them his excellences and perfections, and therefore, though they have not seen him, yet, believing, they love him. They that undervalue Christ, it is because they do not know him; when God by his word and Spirit discovers him to the soul, with that ray of light the fire of love to him will be kindled. 2. She had expressed her own love to him, her rest in that love, and had triumphed in it; "This is my beloved;" and that flame in her breast scattered sparks into theirs. As sinful lusts, when they break out, defile many, so the pious zeal of some may provoke many, 2 Cor. ix. 2.

The spouse had bespoke their help in seeking her beloved, ch. v. 8, but now they beg hers; for they perceive that now the cloud she had been under began to scatter, and the sky to clear up; and while she was describing her beloved to them she herself retrieved her comfort in him. Drooping Christians would find benefit themselves by talking of Christ, as well as do good to others. Now here, 1. They inquire concerning him, "Whither is thy beloved gone?" which way must we steer our course in pursuit of him? Note, Those that are made acquainted with the excellences of Christ, and the comfort of an interest in him, cannot but be inquisitive after him, and desirous to know where they may meet with him. 2. They offer their service to the spouse, to accompany her in quest of him; "We will seek him with thee." Those that would find Christ must seek him, seek him early, seek him diligently. And it is best seeking Christ in concert, to join with those that are seeking him. We must seek for communion with Christ, in communion with saints. We know whither our beloved is gone; he is gone to heaven, to his Father and our Father; he took care to send us notice of it, that we might know how to direct to him, Jno. xx. 17. We must by faith see him there, and by prayer seek him there; with boldness enter into the holiest; and herein must join with the generation of them that seek him, Ps. xxiv. 6, even with all that in every place call upon him, 1 Cor. i. 2. We must pray with and for others.

Secondly. The answer which the spouse gave to this inquiry, ver. 2, 3. Now she complains not any more as she had done, ch. v. 6, "He is gone, he is gone;" that she knew not where to find him, or doubted she had lost him for ever; no,

1. Now she knows very well where he is, ver. 2. "My beloved" is not to be found in the streets of the city, and the crowd and noise that is there; there I have in vain looked for him, as his parents "sought him among their kindred and acquaintance, and found him not;" but he "is gone down to his garden," a place of privacy and retirement. The more we withdraw from the hurry of the world, the more likely we are to have acquaintance with Christ, who took his disciples into a garden, there to be witnesses of the agonies of his love. Christ's church is a garden, enclosed and separated from the open common of the world; it is his garden, which he hath planted as he did the garden of Eden, which he takes care of, and delights in. Though he is gone up to paradise above, yet he comes down to his garden on earth; it lies low, but he condescends to visit it; and wonderful condescension it is; "Will God in very deed dwell with man upon the earth?" Those that would find Christ may expect to meet with him in his garden, the church; for there he records his name, Ex. xx. 24. They must attend upon him in the ordinances which he hath instituted, the word, sacraments, and prayer, wherein he will be with us always, even to the end of the world. The spouse here refers to what Christ had said, ch. v. 1, "I am come into my garden," as if she should say, What a fool was I to fret and toil myself in seeking him where he was not, when he himself had told me where he was! Words of direction and comfort are many times out of the way when we have occasion to use them, till the blessed Spirit brings them to our remembrance, and then we wonder how we overlooked them. Christ has told us he would come into his garden; thither, therefore, we must go to seek him.

The beds, and lesser gardens in this greater, are the particular churches, the synagogues of God in the land, Ps. lxxiv. 8. The spices and lilies are particular believers, the planting of the Lord, and pleasant in his eyes. When Christ comes down to his church it is, 1st. "To feed among the gardens," to feed his flock, which he feeds not as other shepherds, in the open fields, but in his garden, so well are they provided for, Ps. xxiii. 2. To feed his friends, and entertain them; there you may not only find him, but find his table richly furnished, and hearty welcome to it. To feed himself, that is, to please himself with the products of his own grace in his people; for "the Lord taketh pleasure in those that fear him." He hath many gardens, many particular churches, of different sizes and shapes, but while they are his he feeds in them all, manifests himself among them, and is well pleased with them. 2nd. "To gather lilies," wherewith he is pleased to entertain and adorn himself. He picks the lilies one by one, and gathers them to himself; and there will be a general harvest of them at the great day, when he will send forth his angels to gather all his lilies, that he may be for ever glorified and admired in them.

2. She is very confident of her own interest in him; ver. 3, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine." The relation is mutual, and the knot is tied which cannot be loosed; for "he feedeth among the lilies," and my communion with him is a certain token of my interest in him. She had said this before, ch. ii. 16; but, 1st. Here she repeats it as that which she resolved to abide by, and which she took an unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction in. She liked her choice too well to change. Our communion with God is very much maintained and kept up by the frequent renewing of our covenant with him, and rejoicing in it. 2nd. She had occasion to repeat it, for she had carried it unkindly to her beloved; and for her so doing he had justly withdrawn himself from her, and therefore there was occasion to take fresh hold of the covenant, which continues firm between Christ and believers, notwithstanding their failings and his frowns, Ps. lxxxix. 30—35. I have been careless and wanting in my duty, and yet "I am my beloved's;" for every transgression in the covenant doth not throw us out of covenant. He hath justly hid his face from me, and denied me his comforts, and yet "my beloved is mine," for rebukes and chastenings are not only consistent with, but flow from, covenant love. 3rd. When we want a full assurance of Christ's love, we must live by a faithful adherence to him. Though I have not the sensible consolation I used to have, yet I will stick to this. Christ is mine, and I am his. 4th. Though she had said the same before, yet now she inverts the order, and asserts his interest in her first; "I am my beloved's," entirely devoted and dedicated to him; and then her interest in him, and in his grace, "My beloved is mine," and I am happy, truly happy in him. If our own hearts can but witness for us that we are his, there is no room left to question his being ours; for the covenant never breaks on his side. 5th. It is now her comfort, as it was then, that "he feedeth among the lilies," that he takes delight in his people, and converseth freely with them, as we do with those with whom we feed; and therefore, though at present he be withdrawn, I shall meet with him again; "I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God."

4 Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah,

v. 10. The words rendered "white and ruddy" are variously explained, but they clearly indicate the fair and ruddy or fresh and healthy complexion of the beloved. For "the chiefest" our translators have put in the margin "a standard-bearer," but distinguished or conspicuous seems to be the correct idea.

v. 11. It has been thought that "head" here means the hair, but if the bride praises his hair as black, she would not compare it with gold. The allusion may be to the complexion, or it may merely denote the admirable character of the head, or its excellence. For "bushy" the margin has "curled," which is more correct, as hair in ringlets or wreaths is intended.

v. 12. The Hebrew is, "His eyes are like doves by streams of water, washed in milk, resting on their setting." The margin very well explains the latter words "fitly placed, and set as a precious stone in the foil of a ring."

v. 13. "A bed of spices" may be a bed of odoriferous plants, or Comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners.

5 Turn away thine eyes from me,
For they have overcome me:
Thy hair is as a flock of goats
That appear from Gilead.
6 Thy teeth are as a flock of sheep
Which go up from the washing,
Whereof every one beareth twins,
And there is not one barren among them
7 As a piece of a pomegranate
Are thy temples within thy locks.
8 There are threescore queens, and fourscore concubines,
And virgins without number.
9 My dove, my undefiled, is but one;
She is the only one of her mother,
She is the choice one of her that bare her
The daughters saw her, and blessed her;
Yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her.
10 Who is she that looketh forth as the morning,
Fair as the moon, clear as the sun,
And terrible as an army with banners?

Now we must suppose Christ graciously returned to his spouse, from whom he had withdrawn himself; returned to converse with her, for he speaks to her, and makes her to hear joy and gladness; returned to favour her, and had forgiven and forgotten all her unkindnesses, for he speaks very lovingly and respectfully to her.

First. He pronounceth her truly amiable; ver. 4, "Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah," a city in the tribe of Manasseh, whose name signifies pleasant, or acceptable; the situation, no doubt, being very happy, and the buildings fine and uniform. Thou art comely as Jerusalem, a city compact together, Ps. cxxii. 3, and which Solomon had built and beautified; it was "the joy of the whole earth," an honour to the world (whether they thought so or no) that there was such a city in it. It was the holy city, and that was the greatest beauty of it, and fitly is the church compared to it, for it was figured and typified by it. The gospel church is the Jerusalem that is above, Gal. iv. 26, the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22; in it God hath his sanctuary, and is in a special manner present, thence he has the tribute of praise issuing; it is his rest for ever, and therefore it is comely as Jerusalem. And being so, is "terrible as an army with banners." Church censures duly administered strike an awe upon men's consciences; the word, the weapons of her warfare, casts down imaginations, 2 Cor. x. 5. And even an unbeliever is convinced and judged by the solemnity of holy ordinances, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. The saints, by faith, overcome the world, 1 Jno. v. 4; nay, like Jacob, they have power with God, and prevail, Gen. xxxii. 28.

Secondly. He owns himself in love with her, ver. 5. Though for a small moment, and in a little wrath, he had hid his face from her, yet now he gathers her with very surprising instances of everlasting lovingkindness, Isa. liv. 8. 'Turn thine eyes towards me,' so some read it, turn the eyes of faith and love towards me; 'for they have lifted me up;' look unto me and be comforted. When we are calling to God to turn the eye of his favour towards us, he is calling to us to turn the eye of our obedience towards him. We read it as a strange expression of love, "Turn away thine eyes from me," for I cannot bear the brightness of them; they have quite overcome me, and I am prevailed with to overlook all that is past, as God said to Moses, when he interceded for Israel, "Let me alone," or I must yield, Ex. xxxii. 10. Christ is pleased to borrow these expressions of a passionate lover, only to express the tenderness of a compassionate Redeemer, and the delight he takes in his redeemed, and in the workings of his own grace in them.

Thirdly. He repeats almost word for word part of the description he had given of her beauty, ch. iv. 1—3; her hair, her teeth, her temples, ver. 5—7; not because he could not have described it in other words, and by other similitudes, but to shew that he had still the same esteem of her since her unkindness to him, and his withdrawings from her, that he had before. Lest she should think that, though he would not quite cast her off, yet he would think the worse of her while he knew her, he saith the same of her now that he had done; for those to whom much is forgiven will love the more, and consequently will be the more beloved; for Christ has said, "I love those that love me." He is pleased with his people, notwithstanding their weaknesses, when they sincerely repent of them, and return to their duty, and commends them, as if they were already arrived to perfection.

Fourthly. He prefers her before all competitors, and sees all the beauties and perfections of others meeting and centring in her; ver. 8, 9, "There are," it may be, "threescore queens," that, like Esther, have by their beauty attained to the royal state and dignity, "and fourscore concubines," that kings have preferred before their own queens, as more charming; and these attended by their maids of honour, "virgins without number," that when there is a ball at court appear in great splendour, with beauty that dazzles the eyes of the spectators, but "my dove, my undefiled, is but one," an holy one.

1. She excels them all. Go through all the world and view all the societies of men that reckon themselves wise and happy; kingdoms, courts, senates, councils, or whatever incorporations you may think valuable, they are none of them to be compared with the church of Christ; their honours and beauties are nothing to hers; "Who is like unto thee, O Israel?" Deu. xxxiii. 29; iv. 6, 7. There are particular persons, as "virgins without number," that are famed for their accomplishments, the beauties of their address, language, and performances, but the beauty of holiness is beyond all other beauty; "My dove, my undefiled is one," hath that one beauty, that she is a dove, an undefiled dove, and mine, and that makes her excel the queens and virgins, though they were never so many. 2. She includes them all. Other kings have many queens, and concubines, and virgins, with whose conversation they entertain themselves, but my dove, my undefiled, is to me instead of all; in that one I have more than they have in all theirs. Or, though there be many particular churches, some of greater dignity, others of less, some of longer, others of shorter standing, and many particular believers of different gifts and attainments, some more eminent, others less so, yet they all constitute but one catholic church, are all but parts of that whole, and that is my dove, my undefiled. Christ is the centre of the church's unity; all the children of God that are scattered abroad are gathered by him, Jno. xi. 52, and meet in him, Eph. i. 10, and are all his doves.

Fifthly. He shews how much she was esteemed, not by him only, but by all that had acquaintance with her, and stood in relation to her. It would add to her praise to say, 1. That she was her mother's darling. She had that in her from a child which recommended her to the particular affection of her parents As Solomon himself is said to have been tender, and an only one in the sight of his mother, Pr. iv. 3, so was she the only one of her mother, as dear as if she had been an only one, and if there were many more, yet she was the choice one of her that bare her, more excellent than all the societies of men this world ever produced. All the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, are nothing in Christ's account compared with the church, which is made up of "the excellent ones of the earth, the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold," and more excellent than their neighbours. 2. That she was admired by all her acquaintance; not only "the daughters" that were her juniors, but even "the queens and the concubines," who might have reason to be jealous of her as a rival; they all "blessed her," and wished well to her, "praised her," and spoke well of her. The daughters of Jerusalem called her the "fairest among women;" all agreed to give her the preeminence for beauty, and every sheaf bowed to hers. Note, 1st. Those that have any sense of things cannot but be convinced in their consciences, whatever they say, that godly people are excellent people; many will give them their good word, and more their good-will. 2nd. Jesus Christ takes notice what people think and speak of his church; and is well pleased with them that honour such as fear the Lord, and takes it ill of those that do despise them, particularly when they are under a cloud; that offend any of his little ones.

Sixthly. He produceth the encomium that was given of her, and makes it his own; ver. 10, "Who is she that looks forth as the morning?" This is applicable both to the church in the world and to grace in the heart. 1. They are amiable as the light, the most beautiful of all visible things. Christians are, or should be, the lights of the world. The patriarchal church looked forth as the morning, when the promise of the Messiah was first made known, and the day-spring from on high visited this dark world. The Jewish church was fair as the moon; the ceremonial law was an imperfect light,—it shone by reflection, it was changing as the moon, did not make day, nor was the Sun of righteousness yet risen,—but the Christian church is clear as the sun, exhibits a great light to them that sat in darkness. Or we may apply it to the kingdom of grace, the gospel kingdom. 1st. In its rise, it looks forth as the morning after a dark night; it is discovering, Job xxxviii. 12, 13, and very acceptable; looks forth pleasantly, as a clear morning; but it is small in its beginnings, and scarce perceptible at first. 2nd. It is, at the best in this world, but fair as the moon, which shines with a borrowed light, which has her changes and eclipses, and her spots too, and when at the full doth but rule by night. But, 3rd. When it is perfected in the kingdom of glory, then it will be clear as the sun, the church clothed with the sun, with Christ the sun of righteousness, Rev. xii. 1. They that love God will then be "as the sun when he goes forth in his strength," Jud. v. 31; Mat. xiii. 43. They shall shine in inexpressible glory, and that which is perfect will then come; there shall be no darkness, no spots, Isa. xxx. 26. 2. The beauty of the church, and of believers, is not only amiable, but awful, "as an army with banners." The church in this world is as an army, as the camp of Israel in the wilderness. Its state is militant; it is in the midst of enemies, and is engaged in a constant conflict with them. Believers are soldiers in this army. It has its banners; the Gospel of Christ is an ensign, Isa. xi. 12; the love of Christ, ch. ii. 4; it is marshalled, and kept in order, and under discipline. It is terrible to its enemies, as Israel in the wilderness was, Ex. xv. 14. When Balaam saw Israel encamped according to their tribes, by their standards, colours displayed, he said, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob!" Num. xxiv. 1. When the church preserves her purity, she secures her honour and victory; when she is fair as the moon, and clear as the sun, she is truly great and formidable.

11 I went down into the garden of nuts
To see the fruits of the valley,
And to see whether the vine flourished,
And the pomegranates budded.
12 Or ever I was aware,
My soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib.
13 Return, return, O Shulamite;
Return, return, that we may look upon thee.
What will ye see in the Shulamite?
As it were the company of two armies.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER.

Christ being now returned to his spouse, and the breach being entirely made up, and the falling out of these lovers being the renewing of love, Christ here gives an account both of the distance and of the reconciliation.

First. That when he was withdrawn from his church as his spouse, and did not comfort her, yet even then he had his eye upon it, as his garden which he took care of; ver. 11, "I went down into the garden of nuts," or nutmegs, "to see the fruits of the valley," with complacency and concern, to see them as my own. When he was out of sight he was no farther off than the garden, hid among the trees of the garden in a low and dark valley; but then he was observing how "the vine flourished," that he might do all that to it which was necessary to promote its flourishing, and might delight himself in it, as a rather of balsam. The "sweet flowers" are tall fragrant plants. The figure of lilies dropping myrrh, which exudes from them, is hyperbolic.

v. 14. The hands are called or compared with ornaments of gold and jewels. The idea of "rings" is scarcely tenable. What is called "beryl" by our translators is not certain—topaz or ruby may be meant. For "bright ivory" we may understand "a work of ivory."

v. 15. "Sockets" should be "bases," and "countenance" signifies appearance in general.

vi. 2. "Beds of spices" here are to be explained of beds of balsam or odoriferous plants, as in chap. v. 13. "To feed"—not himself, but his flock, as in chap. i. 7, and in the next verse.

vi. 4. Tirzah was a city east of Samaria, at one time capital of the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xvi. 8), as Jerusalem was of Judah. The actual site of Tirzah is called Telluzeh, and the position is a very man doth in a fruitful garden. He went to see whether "the pomegranates budded." Christ observes the first beginnings of the good work of grace in the soul, and the early buddings of devout affections and inclinations there; and is greatly well pleased with them, as we are with the blossoms of the spring.

Secondly. That yet he could not long content himself with this, but suddenly felt a powerful, irresistible inclination in his own bosom to return to his church, as his spouse, being moved with her lamentations after him, and her languishing desire towards him; ver. 12, "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadib." I could not any longer keep at a distance, "my repentings were kindled together," and I presently resolved to fly back to the arms of my love, my dove. Thus Joseph made himself strange to his brethren for a while, to chastise them for their former unkindnesses, and make trial of their present temper, till he could no longer refrain himself; but, or ever he was aware, burst out into tears, and said, "I am Joseph," Gen. xlv. 1, 3. And now the spouse perceives, as David did, Ps. xxxi. 22, that though she said in her haste she was cut off from before his eyes, yet at the same time he heard the voice of her supplications, and became "like the chariots of Amminadib," which were noted for their beauty and swiftness. 'My soul put me in the chariots of my willing people,' so some read it; the chariots of their faith, and hope, and love, their desires, and prayers, and expectations, which they sent after me to fetch me back, as chariots of fire, with horses of fire. Note, 1. Christ's people are, and ought to be, a willing people. 2. If they continue seeking Christ, and longing after him, even when he seems to withdraw from them, he will graciously return to them in due time, perhaps sooner than they think, and with a pleasing surprise. No chariots sent for Christ shall return empty. 3. All Christ's gracious returns to his people take rise from himself. It is not they, but his own soul, that puts him into the chariots of his people; for he is gracious because he will be gracious, and loves his Israel because he would love them. Not for their sakes, be it known to them.

Thirdly. That he being returned to her kindly courted her return to him, notwithstanding the discouragements she laboured under. Let her not despair of obtaining as much comfort as ever she had before this distance happened; but take the comfort of the return of her beloved, ver. 13. Here,

1. The church is called the Shulamite, referring either to Solomon, the bridegroom in type, by whose name she is called in token of her relation to him, and union with him, (thus believers are called Christians from Christ,) or, referring to Salem, the place of her birth and residence, as the woman of Shunem is called the Shunamite. Heaven is the Salem whence the saints have their birth, and where they have their citizenship; those that belong to Christ, and are bound for heaven, shall be called Shulamites.

2. She is invited to return, and the invitation most earnestly pressed; "Return, return;" and again, "return, return;" recover the peace thou hast lost and forfeited; come back to thy former composedness and cheerfulness of spirit. Note, Good Christians, after they have had their comfort disturbed, are sometimes hardly pacified, and need to be earnestly persuaded to return again to their rest. As revolting sinners have need to be called to again and again, "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die," so disquieted saints have need to be called to again and again, "Turn ye, turn ye," why will ye droop? "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?"

3. Being returned, she is desired to shew her face, "that we may look upon thee;" go no longer with thy face covered like a mourner. Let those that have made their peace with God lift up their faces without spot, Job xxii. 26; let them come boldly to his throne of grace. Christ is pleased with the cheerfulness and humble confidence of his people, and would have them look pleasant. Let us look upon thee, not I only, but the holy angels who rejoice in the consolation of saints, as well as in the conversion of sinners; not I only, but all the daughters. Christ and believers are pleased with the beauty of the church.

4. A short account is given of what is to be seen in her. The question is asked, "What will you see in the Shulamite?" And it is answered, "As it were the company of two armies." 1st. Some think she gives this account of herself. She is shy of appearing, unwilling to be looked upon, having in her own account no form or comeliness; Alas, saith she, "what will you see in the Shulamite?" nothing that is worth your looking upon; nothing but as it were "the company of two armies" actually engaged, where nothing is to be seen but blood and slaughter. The watchmen had smitten her, and wounded her, and she carried in her face the marks of those wounds; looked as if she had been fighting. She had said, ch. i. 6, "Look not upon me, because I am black;" here, Look not upon me, because I am bloody. Or it may note the constant struggle that is between grace and corruption in the souls of believers; they are in them as two armies continually skirmishing, which makes her ashamed to shew her face. 2nd. Others think her beloved gives this account of her: I will tell you what you shall see in the Shulamite; you shall see as noble a sight as that of two armies, or two parts of the same army, drawn out in rank and file; not only as an army with banners, but as two armies with a majesty double to what was before spoken. She is as Mahanaim, as the two hosts which Jacob saw, Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, a host of saints, and a host of angels ministering to them. The church militant, the church triumphant. Behold two armies; in both the church appears beautiful.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter, I. Christ, the royal bridegroom, goes on to describe the beauties of his spouse, the church, in many instances, and to express his love to her, and the delight he has in her conversation, ver. 1—9. II. The spouse, the church, expresseth her great delight in him, and the desire that she had of communion and fellowship with him, ver. 10—13. Such mutual esteem and endearment is there between Christ and believers. And what is heaven but an everlasting interchanging of loves between the holy God and holy souls!

HOW beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter!
The joints of thy thighs are like jewels,
The work of the hands of a cunning workman
2 Thy navel is like a round goblet,
Which wanteth not liquor:
Thy belly is like an heap of wheat
Set about with lilies.
3 Thy two breasts
Are like two young roes that are twins.
4 Thy neck is as a tower of ivory;
Thine eyes like the fishpools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim:
Thy nose is as the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus.
5 Thine head upon thee is like Carmel,
And the hair of thine head like purple; the king is held in the galleries.
6 How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love, for delights
7 This thy stature is like to a palm tree,
And thy breasts to clusters of grapes.
8 I said, I will go up to the palm tree,
I will take hold of the boughs thereof:
Now also thy breasts shall be as clusters of the vine,
And the smell of thy nose like apples;
9 And the roof of thy mouth like the best wine
For my beloved, that goeth down sweetly,
Causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak.

BRIDE'S DRESS, AND HIGH SHOES.—ver. 1.

The title which Jesus Christ here gives to the church is new: "O prince's daughter," agreeing with Ps. xlv. 13, where she is called the king's daughter. She is so in respect of her new birth, born from above, begotten of God, and his workmanship, bearing the image of the King of kings, and guided by his Spirit She is so by marriage; Christ, by betrothing her to himself, though he found her mean and despicable, has made her a prince's daughter; she has a princely disposition, something in her truly noble and generous. She is daughter and heir to the Prince of the kings of the earth; "if children, then heirs." Now here we have,

First. A large description of the beauty of the spouse, which some think is given by the virgins her companions, and that those were they who called upon her to return; it seems rather to be given by Christ himself, and that it is designed to express his love to her, and delight in her, as before, ch. iv. 1, &c. and ch. vi. 5, 6. The similitudes are here different from what they were before, to shew that the beauty of holiness is such as nothing in nature can reach; you may still say more of it, and yet still come short of it. That commendation of the spouse, ch. iv., was immediately upon the espousals, ch. iii. 11, this here upon her return from a bypath, ch. vi. 13; yet this exceeds that, to shew the constancy of Christ's love to his people; he loves them to the end, since he made them precious in his sight, and honourable. The spouse had described the beauty of her beloved in ten particulars, ch. v. 11, &c., and now he describes her in as many, for he will not be behindhand with her in respects and endearments. Those that honour Christ he will certainly honour, and make honourable. As the prophet, in describing the corruptions of degenerate Israel, reckons "from the sole of the foot, even unto the head," Isa. i. 6, so here the beauties of the church are reckoned from foot to head, that, as the apostle speaks when he is comparing the church, as here, to the natural body, 1 Cor. xii. 23, more abundant honour might be bestowed on those parts of the body which we think to be less honourable, and which therefore lacked honour, ver. 24.

1. Her feet are here praised. The feet of Christ's ministers are beautiful in the eyes of the church, Isa. lii. 7, and her feet are here said to be beautiful in the eyes of Christ; "How beautiful are thy feet with shoes!" When believers being made free from the captivity of sin, (Acts xii. 8,) stand fast in the liberty with which they are made free, preserve the tokens of their enfranchisement, have "their feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace," and walk steadily according to the rule of the Gospel, then their feet are beautiful with shoes; they tread firm, being well armed against the troubles they meet with in their way When we rest not in good affections, but those are accompanied with sincere endeavours and resolutions, then our feet are beautified with shoes: see Eze. xvi. 10.

2. "The joints of the thighs are" here said to be "like jewels," and those curiously wrought by a cunning workman. This is explained by Eph. iv. 16, and Col. ii. 19, where the mystical body of Christ is said to be held together by joints and bands, as the hips and knees (both which are the joints of the thighs) serve the natural body in its strength and motion. The church is then comely in Christ's eyes when those joints are kept firm by holy love and unity, and the communion of saints. When believers act in religion from good principles, and are steady and regular in their whole conversation, and turn themselves easily to every duty in its time and place, then the joints are like jewels.

3. The navel is here compared to a round cup, or goblet, that wants not any of the agreeable liquor that one would wish to find in it, such as David's cup that ran over, Ps. xxiii. 5; well shaped, and not as that miserable infant whose navel was not cut, Eze. xvi. 4. The fear of the Lord is said to be health to the beautiful one. Gesenius says, "The virgin is here described as conquering and captivating the hearts of all." (Compare verse 10.)

vi. 5—7. These verses partly repeat chap. iv. 1—3.

vi. 8, 9. "Queens, concubines, and virgins are plentiful, but I love only one, who was her mother's darling. The damsels who have seen her congratulate or call her happy, and queens and concubines applaud her."

vi. 11 Nuts were not originally natives of Palestine, though planted there, and the Hebrews adopted a foreign name for them. The nuts here meant were, no doubt, walnuts, as they are still called by a similar name in Persia. The word rendered "fruits" rather means verdure.

vi. 12. This verse is peculiar, but the sense seems to be that, before she could reflect, her soul hasted after her lover, as if borne in the chariots of Amminadib. What Amminadib is meant is unknown, and hence some translate the word my willing or my navel: see Pr. iii. 8. When the soul wanteth not that fear, then the navel wanteth not liquor.

4. "The belly is like a heap of wheat" in the storechamber, which perhaps was sometimes, to make show, adorned with flowers. The wheat is useful, the lilies beautiful; there is every thing in the church which may be to the members of that body either for use or for ornament. All the body is nourished from the belly. It notes the spiritual prosperity of a believer, and the healthful constitution of the soul, all in good plight.

5. "The breasts are like two young roes that are twins," ver. 3. By the breasts of the church's consolations these are nourished who are born from its belly, (Isa. xlvi. 3,) and by the navel received nourishment in the womb. This comparison we had before, ch. iv. 5.

6. The neck, which before was compared to the tower of David, ch. iv. 4, is here compared to a tower of ivory, so white, so precious. Such is the faith of the saints by which they are joined to Christ their head. The name of the Lord, improved by faith, is to the saints as a strong and impregnable tower.

7. The eyes are likened to the fishpools in Heshbon, or the artificial fishponds, by a gate, either of Jerusalem or of Heshbon, which is called Bath-rabbim, the daughter of a multitude, because a great thoroughfare. The understanding, the intentions of a believer, are clean and clear as these ponds. The eyes weeping for sin are as fountains, Jer. ix. 1, and comely with Christ.

8. The nose like the tower of Lebanon; the forehead, or face, set like a flint, Isa. l. 7, undaunted as that tower was impregnable. So it notes the magnanimity and holy bravery of the church; or, as others, a spiritual sagacity to discern things that differ, as animals strangely distinguish by the smell. This tower looks towards Damascus the head city of Syria, noting the boldness of the church in facing its enemies and not fearing them.

9. The head like Carmel, a very high hill near the sea, ver. 5. The head of a believer is lifted up above his enemies, Ps. xxvii. 6, above the storms of the lower region, as the top of Carmel was, pointing heavenwards. The more we get above this world, and the nearer to heaven, and the more secure and serene we become by that means, the more amiable we are in the eyes of the Lord Jesus.

10. The hair of the head is said to be like purple. It notes the universal amiableness of a believer in the eyes of Christ, even to the hair; or, as some understand it, the pins with which the hair is dressed. Some, by the head and hair, understand the governors of the church, who, if they be careful to do their duty, add much to her comeliness. The head like crimson, (so some read it,) and the hair like purple, the two colours worn by great men.

Secondly. The complacency which Christ takes in his church thus beautified and adorned. She is lovely indeed if she be so in his eyes. As he puts the comeliness upon her, so it is his love that makes this comeliness truly valuable; for he is an unexceptionable judge.

1. He delighted to look upon his church, and to converse with it, rejoicing in that habitable part of his earth; "The king is held in the galleries," and cannot leave them. This is explained by Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14, "The Lord hath chosen Zion," saying, "This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell;" and Ps. cxlvii. 11, "The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him." And if Christ hath such delight to the galleries of communion with his people, much more reason have they to delight in them, and to reckon a day there better than a thousand.

2. He was even struck with admiration at the beauty of his church; ver. 6, "How fair, and how pleasant art thou, O love!" 'how art thou made fair!' so the word is; not born so, but made so with the comeliness which I have put upon thee. Holiness is a beauty beyond expression; the Lord Jesus is wonderfully pleased with it. The outward aspect of it is fair, the inward disposition of it is pleasant and highly agreeable, and the complacency he has in it is inexpressible. 'O my dearest for delights!' so some read it.

3. He determined to keep up communion with his church. 1st. To take hold of her as of the boughs of a palm-tree. He compares her stature to a palm-tree, ver. 7, so straight, so strong, doth she appear, when she is looked upon in her full proportion. The palm-tree is observed to flourish most when it is loaded; so the church, the more it has been afflicted, the more it has multiplied, and the branches of it are emblems of victory. Christ saith, "I will go up to the palm-tree" to entertain myself with the shadow of it, ver. 8, and "I will take hold of its boughs," and observe the beauty of them. What Christ hath said he will do in favour to his people we may be sure he will do, for his kind purposes are never suffered to fall to the ground; and if he take hold of the boughs of his church, take early hold of her branches when they are young and tender, he will keep his hold, and not let them go. 2nd. To refresh himself with her fruits. He compares her breasts (her pious affections towards him) to clusters of grapes, a most pleasant fruit, ver. 7, and he repeats it, ver. 8, they shall be, that is, they shall be to me, as clusters of the vine, which make glad the heart; now I come up to the palm-tree, now thy graces shall be exerted and excited. Christ's presence with his people kindles the holy, heavenly fire in their souls, and then their "breasts shall be as clusters of the vine," a cordial to themselves, and acceptable to him. And since God at first breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, and the breath of the new life still, the smell of their nostrils is like the smell of apples or oranges, which is pleasing and reviving. The Lord smelled a sweet savour from Noah's sacrifice, Gen. viii. 21. And, lastly, The roof of her mouth is like the best wine, ver. 9. Her spiritual taste and relish, or the words she speaks to God and man, which come not from the teeth outward, but from the roof of the mouth, these are pleasing to God. The prayer of the upright is his delight; and when those that fear the Lord speak one to another as becomes them, the Lord hearkens, and hears with pleasure, Mal. iii. 16. It is like that wine which is, First. Very palatable, and grateful to the taste. It goes down sweetly, it goes straightly, so the margin reads it, it moves itself aright, Pr. xxiii. 31. The pleasures of sense seem right to the carnal appetite, and go down smoothly, but they are often wrong; and, compared with the pleasure of communion with God, they are harsh and rough. Nothing goes down so sweetly with a gracious soul as the wine of God's consolations. Secondly. It is a great cordial. The presence of Christ by his Spirit with his people shall be reviving and refreshing to them, as that strong wine which makes the lips even of those that are asleep (that is, that are ready to faint away in a deliquium) to speak. Unconverted sinners are asleep, saints are often drowsy, and listless, and half asleep. But the word and Spirit of Christ will put life and vigour into the soul, and out of the abundance of the heart that is thus filled the mouth will speak. When the apostles were filled with the Spirit, they spake with tongues the wonderful works of God, Acts ii. 10, 12. And they who, in opposition to being drunk with wine, wherein is excess, are filled with the Spirit, speak to themselves in psalms and hymns, Eph. v. 18, 19. When Christ is thus commending the sweetness of his spouse's love excited by the manifestation of his, she seems to put in that word, "for my beloved," as in a parenthesis. Is there any thing in me that is pleasant or valuable? as it is from, so it is for, my beloved; and then he delights in our good affections and services, when they are all for him, and devoted to his glory.

10 I am my beloved's,
And his desire is toward me.
11 Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field;
Let us lodge in the villages.
12 Let us get up early to the vineyards;
Let us see if the vine flourish,
Whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth:
There will I give thee my loves.
13 The mandrakes give a smell,
And at our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old,
Which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved.

MANDRAKES.

These are the words of the spouse, the church, the believing soul, in answer to the kind expressions of Christ's love in the foregoing verses.

First. She here triumphs in her relation to Christ, and her interest in him, and in his name will she boast all the day long. With what a transport of joy and holy exultation doth she say, ver. 10, "I am my beloved's," not my own, but entirely devoted to him, and owned by him. If we can truly say that Christ is our best beloved, we may be confident that we are his, and he will save us, Ps. cxix. 94. The gracious discoveries of Christ's love to us should engage us greatly to rejoice in the hold he has of us, his sovereignty over us, and propriety in us, which is no less a spring of comfort than a bond of duty. Intimacy of communion with Christ should help to clear up our interest in him. Glorying in this, that she is his to serve him, and reckoning that her honour, she comforts herself with this, that his desire is towards her; that is, he is her husband; it is a periphrasis of the conjugal relation, Gen. iii. 16. Christ's desire was strongly towards his chosen remnant when he came from heaven to earth to seek and save them; and when, in pursuance of his undertaking, he was even straitened till the baptism of blood he was to pass through for them was accomplished, Lu. xii. 50. He desired Zion for a habitation. This is a comfort to believers, that whosoever slights them, Christ has a desire towards them, such a desire as will again bring him from heaven to earth to receive them to himself, for he longs to have them all with him, Jno. xvii. 24; xiv. 3.

Secondly. She humbly and earnestly desires communion with him; ver. 11, 12, "Come, my beloved," let us take a walk together, that I may receive counsel, instruction, and comfort from thee, and may make known my wants and grievances to thee with freedom and without interruption. Thus Christ walked with the two disciples that were going to the village called Emmaus, and talked with them till he made their hearts burn within them. Observe here,

1. Having received fresh tokens of his love, and full assurances of her interest in him, she presseth forward towards farther acquaintance with him, as blessed Paul, who desired yet more and more of "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus," Phil. iii. 8. Christ hath made it appear how much his desire is towards us, and we are very ungrateful if ours be not towards him. Note, Communion with Christ is that which all that are sanctified earnestly breathe after; and the clearer discoveries he makes them of his love, the more earnestly do they desire it. Sensual pleasures pall the carnal appetite, and soon give it a surfeit; but spiritual delights whet the desires, whose language is, Nothing more than God, but still more and more of him. Christ had said, "I will go up to the palm-tree." "Come," saith she, "let us go." The promise Christ hath made us of communion with him are not to supersede, but quicken and encourage, our prayers for that communion.

2. She desires to go forth into the fields and villages to have this communion with him. Those that would converse with Christ must go forth from the world and the amusements of it, must avoid every thing that would divert the mind, and be a hindrance to it when it should be wholly taken up with Christ; we must contrive how to "attend upon the Lord without distraction," 1 Cor. vii. 35. For therefore the spouse here covets to get out of the noise of the town. "Let us go forth to him without the camp," Heb. xiii. 13. Solitude and retirement befriend communion with God; therefore "Isaac went out into the field to meditate" and pray. "Enter into thy closet, and shut thy door." A believer is never less alone than when alone with Christ, where no eye sees.

3. Having business to go abroad to look after the grounds, she desires the company of her beloved. Note, Wherever we are, we may keep up our communion with God, if it be not our own fault, for he is always at our right hand, his eye always upon us, and both his word and his ear always nigh us. By going about our worldly affairs with heavenly, holy hearts, mixing pious thoughts with common actions, and having our eyes ever towards the Lord, we may take Christ along with us wherever we go. Nor should we go any whither where we cannot in faith ask him to go along with us.

4. She is willing to rise betimes to go along with her beloved. "Let us get up early to the vineyards." It intimates her care to improve opportunities of conversing with her beloved. When the time appointed is come, we must lose no time; but, as the women, Mar. xvi. 2, go very early, though it be to a sepulchre, if we be in hopes to meet him there. Those that will go abroad with Christ must begin betimes with him, early in the morning of their days, must begin every day with him; seek him early, seek him diligently.

5. She will be content to take up her lodging in the villages, the huts or cottages which the country people built for their shelter when they attended their business in the fields, there, in these mean and cold dwellings, she will gladly reside, if she may but have her beloved with her; his presence will make them fine and pleasant, and convert them into palaces. A gracious soul can reconcile itself to the poorest accommodations if it may have communion with God in them.

6. The most pleasant, delightful fields, even in the spring-time, when the country is most pleasant, yet will not satisfy her unless she have her beloved with her. No delights on earth can make a believer easy unless he enjoy God in all.

Thirdly. She desires to be better acquainted with the state of her own soul, and the present posture of its affairs; ver. 12, "Let us see if the vine flourish." Our own souls are our vineyards; they are, or should be, planted with vines and pomegranates, choice and useful trees. We are made keepers of these vineyards, and therefore are concerned often to look into them, to examine the state of our own souls, to say whether the vine flourisheth, whether we be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness, and whether our fruit abound; and especially let us inquire "whether the tender grape appear," and whether "the pomegranates bud forth," what good motions and dispositions there are in us that are yet but young and tender, that they may be protected and cherished with a particular care, and may not be nipped, or blasted, or rubbed off, but cultivated, that they may bring forth fruit unto perfection. In this inquiry into our own spiritual state, it will be good to take Christ along with us, because his presence will make the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear, as the returning sun revives the gardens, and because to him we are concerned to approve ourselves. If he sees the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear; if we can appeal to him, "Thou noble people. Among the chief ancient versions, the Greek and Latin treat it as a proper name, while the Syriac renders it "a people prepared" or "ready."

vi. 13. Shulamite may be a proper name, Shulamith, but some think it, like Shunamite, a woman of Shalem or Shunem. Others, again, refer it to the name Solomon, as if the "bride of Solomon," which is fanciful. Interpreters greatly vary in their explanations. The latter clause, "the company of two armies," is by some thought to allude to Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, because Mahanaim means two hosts or camps, and received its name from Jacob's vision of angels. Meholah, however—here rendered "company"—properly means a company or choir of dancers; and most likely the phrase signifies a company of dancers, in two bands or parties.

vii. 1—6. The bold and elliptical imagery of these verses, although consonant with Eastern fancy, is more or less incongruous in the eyes of Europeans. But it is doubtful whether the objections urged so knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee;" if his Spirit witness with our spirit that our souls prosper, it is enough. And if we would be acquainted with ourselves, we must beg of him to search and try us, to help us in the search, and discover us to ourselves.

Fourthly. She promiseth to her beloved the best entertainment she can give him at her country seat; for he will come in to us, and sup with us, Rev. iii. 20.

1. She promiseth him her best affections; and, whatever else she had for him, it would utterly be contemned if her heart were not entire for him; "there" therefore "will I give thee my loves;" I will repeat the professions of it, honour thee with the tokens of it, and the outgoings of my soul towards thee in adorations and desires shall be quickened and enlarged, and my heart offered up to thee in a holy fire.

2. She promiseth him her best provision, ver. 13. There we shall find, not only pleasant odours, (for "the mandrakes give a smell," the 'love-flowers,' or lovely ones, so the word signifies, or, the love-fruits; it was something that was in all respects very grateful, so valuable that Rachel and Leah had like to have fallen out about them, Gen. xxx. 14,) but we shall also find that which is good for food, as well as pleasant to the eye; all the rarities that the country affords: "At our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits." Note, 1st. The fruits and exercises of grace are pleasant to the Lord Jesus. 2nd. These must be carefully laid up for him, devoted to his service and honour; must be always ready to us when we have occasion for them, as that is which is laid up at our gates; that by our bringing forth much fruit he may be glorified, Jno. xv. 18. 3rd. There is a great variety of these pleasant fruits with which our souls should be well stocked. We must have all sorts of them, grace for all occasions, new and old; as the good householder has in his treasury, not only the products of this year, but remainders of the last, Mat. xiii. 52. We must not only have that ready to us for the service of Christ, which we have heard, and learned, and experienced lately, but must retain that which we have formerly gathered; nor must we content ourselves only with what we have laid up in store in the days of old, but as long as we live must be still adding something new to it, that our stock may increase, and we may be throughly furnished for every good work. 4th. Those that truly love Christ will think all they have, even their most pleasant fruits, and what they have treasured up most choicely, too little to be bestowed upon him, and he is welcome to it all; if it were more, and better, it should be at his service. It is all from him, and therefore it is fit it should be all for him.

CHAPTER VIII.

The affections between Christ and his spouse are as strong and lively here in this closing chapter of the song as ever, and rather more so. I. The spouse continues her importunity for a more intimate communion and fellowship with him, ver. 1—3. II. She charges the daughters of Jerusalem not to interrupt her communion with her beloved, ver. 4; and they thereupon admire her dependence on him, ver. 5. III. She begs of her beloved, whom she raiseth up by her prayers, ver. 5, that he would by his grace confirm that blessed union with him to which she was admitted, ver. 6, 7. IV She makes intercession for others also, that care might be taken of them, ver. 8, 9; and pleaseth herself with the thoughts of her own interest in Christ, and his affection to her, ver. 10. V. She owns herself his tenant for a vineyard she held of him at Baal-hamon, ver. 11, 12. VI. The song concludes with an interchanging of parting requests; Christ chargeth his spouse that she should often let him hear from her, ver. 13; and she begs of him that he would hasten his return to her, ver. 14.

O THAT thou wert as my brother,
That sucked the breasts of my mother!
When I should find thee without, I would kiss thee;
Yea, I should not be despised.

2 I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's house,
Who would instruct me:
I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine
Of the juice of my pomegranate

POMEGRANATES.

3 His left hand should be under my head,
And his right hand should embrace me.

4 I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem,
That ye stir not up, nor awake my love, until he please.

Here, First. The spouse wisheth for a constant intimacy and freedom with the Lord Jesus. She was already betrothed to him, but the nuptials being not yet solemnized and published, (the bride, the Lamb's wife, will not be completely ready till his second coming,) she was obliged to be shy, and to keep at some distance; she therefore wisheth she might be taken for his sister, he having called her so, ch. v. 1, and that she might have the same chaste and innocent familiarity with him that a sister has with a brother, an own brother, that sucked the breasts of the same mother with her, who would therefore be exceeding tender of her, as Joseph was of his brother Benjamin. Some make this to be the prayer of the Old Testament saints for the hastening of Christ's incarnation, that the church might be better acquainted with him, when, "forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he" should "also himself likewise take part of the same," and not be "ashamed to call them brethren." It is rather the wish of all believers for a more intimate communion with him, that they may receive the spirit of sanctification, and so Christ might be as their brother, that is, they might be as his brethren, which then they are when by grace they are made partakers of a Divine nature; and "he that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are both of one," Heb. ii. 11, &c. It becomes brethren and sisters, the children of the same parents, that have been nursed at the same breast, to be very loving to, and tender of, one another; such a love the spouse desires might be between her and her beloved, that she might call him brother.

Secondly. She promiseth herself then the satisfaction of making a more open profession of her relation to him than at present she could make. "When I should find thee without," any where, even before company, I would kiss thee as a sister doth her own brother, especially her little brother that is now sucking the breasts of her mother, (for so some understand it.) I would use all the decent freedom with thee that could be, and should not be despised for it, as doing any thing unbecoming the modesty of my sex. The church since Christ's incarnation can better own him than she could before, when she would be laughed at for being so much in love with one that was not yet born. Christ is become as our brother; wherever we find him, therefore, let us be ready to own our relation to him, and affection for him, and not fear being despised for it, nor regard that, any more than David did when he danced before the ark, "If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile;" nay, hope that we shall not be despised, so much as some imagine; "Of the maidservants, of whom thou hast spoken, I shall be had in honour." Wherever we find the image of Christ, though it be without, among those that do not follow him with us, we must love it, and testify that love, and we shall not be despised for it, but catholic charity will gain us respect.

Thirdly. She promiseth to improve the opportunity she should then have of cultivating an acquaintance with him; ver. 2, "I would lead thee," as my brother, by the arm, and hang upon thee; I would shew thee all the house of my precious things, would bring thee "into my mother's house;" that is, into the church, into the solemn assemblies, ch. iii. 4, into my closet, for there the saints have most familiar communion with Christ. And there thou wouldst instruct me, so some read it, as brethren inform their sisters of what they desire to be instructed in. Those that know Christ shall be taught of him; and therefore we should desire communion with Christ, that we may receive instruction from him. He is come that he might give us an understanding. Or, my mother would instruct me, when I have thee with me. It is the presence of Christ in and with his church that makes the word and ordinances instructive to her children, which shall all be taught of God.

Fourthly. She promiseth him to bid him welcome to the best she had; would "cause him to drink of her spiced wine, and the juice of her pomegranate," and bid him welcome to it, wishing it better for his sake. The exercise of grace, and the performance of duty, is spiced wine to the Lord Jesus, very acceptable to him, as expressive of a grateful sense of his favours. Those that are pleased with Christ must study to be pleasing to him; and they will not find him hard to be pleased. He reckons hearty welcome his best entertainment, and if he have that he will bring his entertainment along with him.

Fifthly. She doubts not but to experience his tender care of her, and affection to her, ver. 3. That she should be supported by his power, and kept from fainting in the hardest services and sufferings, "his left hand should be under my head;" and that she should be comforted with his love, "his right hand should embrace me." Thus Christ laid his right hand upon John, when he was ready to die away, Rev. i. 17; Dan. x. 10, 18. It may be read as it is ch. ii. 6, "His left hand is under my head," for the words are the same in the original, and so it speaks an immediate answer to her prayer; she was answered with strength in her soul, Ps. cxxxviii. 3. While we are following hard after Christ, his right hand sustains us; Ps. lxiii. 8. "Underneath are the everlasting arms."

Sixthly. She chargeth those about her to take heed of doing any thing to interrupt the pleasing communion she now had with her beloved, ver. 4, as she had done before, when he thus strengthened and comforted her with his presence; ch. ii. 7, "Let me charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem," and reason with you. "Why should you stir up, and why should you awake my love until he will?" The church, our common mother, chargeth all her children that they never do any thing to provoke Christ to withdraw, which we are very prone to do. Why should you put such an affront upon him? Why should you be such enemies to yourselves? We should thus reason with ourselves when we are tempted to do that which will grieve the Spirit. What! am I weary of Christ's presence, that I affront him, and provoke him to depart from me? Why should I do that which he will take so unkindly, and which I shall certainly repent of?

5 Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness,
Leaning upon her beloved?
I raised thee up under the apple tree:
There thy mother brought thee forth:
There she brought thee forth that bare thee.

6 Set me as a seal upon thine heart,
As a seal upon thine arm:
For love is strong as death;
Jealousy is cruel as the grave:
The coals thereof are coals of fire,
Which hath a most vehement flame.

7 Many waters cannot quench love,
Neither can the floods drown it:
If a man would give all the substance of his house for love,
It would utterly be contemned.

Here, First. The spouse is very much admired by those about her. It come in in a parenthesis, but in it gospel grace lies as plain and as much above ground as anywhere in this mystical song. "Who is this that comes up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?" Some make these the words of the bridegroom, expressing himself well pleased with her reliance on him, and resignation of herself to his conduct. They are rather the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom she spoke ver. 4; they see her, and bless her. The angels in heaven, and all her friends on earth, are the joyful spectators of her bliss. The Jewish church came up from the wilderness, supported by the Divine power and favour, Deu. xxxii. 10, 11; the Christian church was raised up from a low and desolate condition by the grace of Christ relied on, Gal. iv. 27. Particular believers are then amiable, nay, admirable, and Divine grace is to be admired in them, when by the power of that grace they are brought up from the wilderness, leaning with a holy confidence and complacency upon Jesus Christ their beloved. This speaks the beauty of a soul, and the wonders of often against the figures are just. The sacred writer starts with the idea that his heroine is beautiful, generally and specially, and his opening words may be understood throughout the series at every step. Not only so; the bold literalism of the translation ought to be toned down, and more elegant terms, as well as more correct ones, in some cases adopted. Lastly, the admiration expressed for physical graces accords with modes of life, thought, and dress far distant from our own. "The contour of thy hips" is less repulsive than "the joints of thy thighs," and more correct; and when it is remembered that the term for "thighs" not only includes "hips," but the "side," it will be seen that we are occupied with a similar thought when we speak of "a graceful figure," or "an elegant waist." To enter into all the details is here impossible, but it may fairly be stated that the writer does not mean there is any physical resemblance between the objects he seems to compare, but that one reminds him of another by some characteristic. He did not think the lady's Divine grace, 1. In the conversion of sinners. A sinful state is a wilderness, remote from communion with God, barren and dry, and in which there is no true comfort; it is a wandering, wanting state. Out of this wilderness we are concerned to come up, by true repentance, in the strength of the grace of Christ, supported by our beloved, and carried in his arms. 2. In the consolation of saints. A soul convinced of sin, and truly humbled for it, is in a wilderness, quite at a loss; and there is no coming out of this wilderness, but leaning on Christ as our beloved by faith, and not leaning to our own understanding, nor trusting to any righteousness or strength of our own as sufficient for us, but going forth and going on in the strength of the Lord God, and making mention of his righteousness, even his only, who is the Lord our righteousness. 3. In the salvation of those that belong to Christ. We must go up from the wilderness of this world having our conversation in heaven, and at death must remove thither, leaning upon Christ; must live and die by faith in him. To me to live is Christ, and it is he that is gain in death.

Secondly. She addresseth herself to her beloved.

1. She puts him in mind of the former experience which she and others had had of comfort and success in applying to him. 1st. For her own part; "I raised thee up under the apple tree;" that is, I have many a time wrestled with thee by prayer, and have prevailed. When I was alone in the acts of devotion, retired in the orchard under the apple tree, (which Christ himself was compared to, ch. ii. 3,) as Nathanael under the fig-tree, Jno. i. 48, meditating and praying, then I raised thee up to help me and comfort me, as the disciples raised him up in the storm, saying, "Master, carest thou not that we perish?" Mar. iv. 38; and the church, Ps. xliv. 23, "Awake, why sleepest thou?" Note, The experience we have had of Christ's readiness to yield to the importunities of our faith and prayer should encourage us to continue instant in our addresses to him, to strive more earnestly, and not to faint. "I sought the Lord, and he heard me," Ps. xxxiv. 4. 2nd. Others also had had like experience of comfort in Christ, as it follows there, Ps. xxxiv. 5, "They looked unto him," as well as I, "and were lightened." There "thy mother brought thee forth," the universal church, or believing souls, in whom Christ was formed, Gal. iv. 15. They were in pain for the comfort of an interest in thee, and travailed in pain, with great sorrow, so the word here signifies. But they brought thee forth; the pangs did not continue always, they that had travailed in convictions at last brought forth in consolations, and the pain was forgotten for joy of the Saviour's birth. By this very similitude our Saviour illustrates the joy which his disciples would have in his return to them, after a mournful separation for a time, Jno. xvi. 21, 22. After the bitter pangs of repentance, many a one has had the blessed birth of comfort, why then may not I?

2. She begs of him that her union with him might be confirmed, and her communion with him continued, and made more intimate; ver. 6, "Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm." 1st. Let me have a place in thy heart, an interest in thy love. This is that which all those desire above any thing, that know how much their happiness is bound up in the love of Christ. 2nd. Let me never lose the room I have in thy heart; let thy love to me be insured, as that deed which is sealed not to be revoked, that cabinet which is sealed up not to be robbed. Let nothing ever prevail, either to separate me from thy love, or, by suspending the communications of it, to deprive me of the comfortable sense of it. 3rd. Let me be always near and dear to thee as "the signet on thy right hand," not to be parted with, Jer. xxii. 24; "engraven upon the palms of thy hand," Isa. xlix. 14; loved with a peculiar love. 4th. Be thou my high priest; let my name be written on thy breastplate, nearer thy heart, as the names of all the tribes were engraven, like the engravings of a signet, in twelve precious stones, on the breastplate of Aaron, and also on two precious stones on the two shoulders or arms of the ephod, Ex. xxviii. 11, 12, 21. 5th. Let thy power be engaged for me as an evidence of thy love to me. Let me be not only "a seal upon thine heart," but "a seal upon thine arm." Let me be ever borne up in thine arms, and know it to my comfort. Some make these to be the words of Christ to his spouse, commanding her to be ever mindful of him and of his love to her; however, if we desire and expect that Christ should set us as a seal on his heart, sure we cannot do less than set him as a seal on ours.

3. To enforce this petition she pleads the power of love, of her love to him, which constrained her to be thus pressing for the tokens of his love to her.

1st. Love is a violent, vigorous passion. First. It is "strong as death." The pains of a disappointed lover are like the pains of death; nay, the pains of death are slighted, and made nothing of in pursuit of the beloved object. Christ's love to us was strong as death, for it broke through death itself; he loved us and gave himself for us. The love of true believers to Christ is strong as death, for it makes them dead to every thing else; it even parts between soul and body, while the soul upon the wings of devout affections soars upwards to heaven, and even forgets that it is yet clothed and clogged with flesh. Paul, in a rapture of this love, knew not whether he was in the body or out of the body. By it a believer is crucified to the world. Secondly. "Jealousy is cruel as the grave," which swallows up and devours all. Those that truly love Christ are jealous of every thing that would draw them from him, and especially jealous of themselves, lest they should do any thing to provoke him to withdraw from them, and rather than do so would pluck out a right eye, and cut off a right hand, than which what can be more cruel? Weak and trembling saints, that conceive a jealousy of Christ, doubting of his love to them, find that jealousy to prey upon them like the grave; nothing wastes the spirits more; but it is an evidence of the strength of their love to him. Thirdly. "The coals thereof," its lamps, and flames, and beams, are very strong, and burn with incredible fury and irresistible force, "as the coals of fire that have a most vehement flame;" a flame of the Lord, so some read it; a powerful, piercing flame, as the lightning, Ps. xxix. 7. Holy love is a fire that begets a mighty heat in the soul, and consumes the dross and chaff that is in it, melts it down like wax into a new form, and carries it upward as the sparks towards God and heaven.

2nd. Love is a valiant, victorious passion. Holy love is so; the reigning love of God in the soul is constant and firm, and will not be drawn off from him, either by fair means or foul, by life or death, Rom. viii. 38.

First. Death, and all its terrors, will not frighten a believer from loving Christ. "Many waters," though they will quench fire, "cannot quench this love," no, "nor the floods drown it," ver. 7. The noise of these waters will strike no terror upon it; let them do their worst, Christ shall still be the best beloved. The overflowing of these waters will strike no damp upon it; but it will enable a man to rejoice in tribulation. Though he slay me, I will love him, and trust in him. No waters could quench Christ's love to us, nor any floods drown it; he waded through the greatest difficulties, even seas of blood. Love sat king upon the floods; let nothing, then, abate our love to him.

Secondly. Life, and all its comforts, will not entice a believer from loving Christ. "If a man" could hire him, with "all the substance of his house," to take his love off from Christ, and set it upon the world and the flesh again, he would reject the proposal with the utmost disdain; as Christ, when the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them were offered him to buy him off from his undertaking: "Get thee hence, Satan." "It would utterly be contemned." Offer those things to those that know no better. Love will enable us to repel and triumph over temptations from the smiles of the world as much as from its frowns. Some give this sense of it: If "a man would give all the substance of his house" to Christ, as an equivalent, instead of love, to excuse it, "it would be contemned." He seeks not ours, but us; the heart, not the wealth. "If I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love," it is nothing, 1 Cor. xiii. 3. Thus believers stand affected to Christ. The gifts of his providence cannot content them without the assurance of his love.

8 We have a little sister, and she hath no breasts
What shall we do for our sister
In the day when she shall be spoken for?
9 If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace of silver
And if she be a door, we will enclose her with boards of cedar 10 I am a wall, and my breasts like towers:
Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour 11 Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon;
He let out the vineyard unto keepers;
Every one for the fruit thereof was to bring a thousand pieces of silver.
12 My vineyard, which is mine, is before me:
Thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand,
And those that keep the fruit thereof two hundred.

Christ and his spouse having sufficiently confirmed their love to each other, and agreed it to be on both sides strong as death, and inviolable; they are here, in these verses, like a loving husband and his wife, consulting together about their affairs, and considering what they should do. Yoke-fellows, having laid their hearts together, lay their heads together, to contrive about their relations, and about their estates; and accordingly this happy pair are here advising with one another about a sister they had, and a vineyard they had.

First. They are here consulting about their sister, their little sister, and the disposing of her.

1. The spouse proposeth her case with a compassionate concern; ver. 8, "We have a little sister, and she has no breasts," she is not yet grown up to maturity; "what shall we do for this little sister of ours in the day that she shall be spoken for?" so as that we may do well for her. 1st. This may be understood as spoken by the Jewish church concerning the Gentile world. God had espoused the church of the Jews to himself, and she was richly endowed; but what shall become of the poor Gentiles, the barren that has not borne, and the desolate? Isa. liv. 1. Their condition, say the pious Jews, is very deplorable and forlorn; they are sisters, children of the same fathers,—God and Adam; but they are little, because not dignified with the knowledge of God; they have no breasts, no Divine revelation, no Scriptures, no ministers, no breasts of consolation drawn out to them whence they might suck, being "strangers to the covenants of promise;" no breasts of instruction themselves to draw out to their children, to nourish them, 1 Pet. ii. 2. What shall we do for them? We can but pity them, and pray for them; Lord, what wilt thou do for them? The saints in Solomon's time might know from David's psalms that God had mercy in store for them, and they begged it might be hastened to them. Now the tables are turned, the Gentiles are betrothed to Christ, and ought to return the kindness by an equal concern for the bringing in of the Jews again; our eldest sister that once had breasts, but now has none. If we take it in this sense, the unbelieving posterity of these pious Jews contradicted this prayer of their fathers; for when the day came that the Gentiles should be spoken for, and courted to Christ, instead of considering what to do for them, they plotted to do all they could against them, which filled up the measure of their iniquity, 1 Thes. ii. 16. Or, 2nd. It may be applied to any other that belong to the election of grace, but are yet uncalled. They are remotely related to Christ and his church, and sisters to them both; "other sheep that are not of this fold," Jno. x. 16; Acts xviii. 10. They have no breasts, none yet fashioned, Eze. xvi. 7, no affection to Christ, no principle of grace. The day will come when they shall be spoken for; when the chosen shall be called, shall be courted for Christ by the ministers, the friends of the bridegroom; a blessed day it will be, a day of visitation; what shall we do in that day to promote the match, to conquer their coyness, and persuade them to consent to Christ, and present themselves chaste virgins to him? Note, Those that through grace are brought to Christ themselves should contrive what they may do to help others to him; to carry on the great design of his Gospel, which is to espouse souls to Christ, and convert sinners to him from whom they have departed.

2. Christ soon determines what to do in this case, and his spouse agrees with him in it; ver. 9, "If she be a wall," if the good work be once begun with the Gentiles, with the souls that are to be called in, if the little sister, when she shall be spoken for by the Gospel, will but receive the word, and build herself upon Christ the foundation, and frame her doings to turn to the Lord, as the wall is in order to the house, "we will build upon her a palace of silver," or build her up into such a palace; we will carry on the good work that is begun, till the wall becomes a palace, the wall of stone, a palace of silver, which goes beyond the boast of Augustus Cæsar, that what he found brick he left marble. This little sister, when once she is joined to the Lord, shall be made to "grow into a holy temple, a habitation of God through the Spirit," Eph. ii. 21, 22. If she be a door, when this palace comes to be finished, and the door of this wall set up, which was the last thing done, Neh. vii. 1, then "we will inclose her with boards of cedar;" that is, will carefully and effectually protect her, that she receive no damage. We will do it; Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all concur in contriving, carrying on, and crowning the blessed work when the time comes. Whatever is wanting shall be set in order, and the work of faith shall be fulfilled with power. Though the beginnings of grace be small, the latter end shall greatly increase. The church is in care concerning those that are yet uncalled. Let me alone, saith Christ, I will do all that which is necessary to be done for them. Trust me with it.

3. The spouse takes this occasion to acknowledge with thankfulness his kindness to her, ver. 10. She is very willing to trust him with her little sister, for she herself had had great experience of his grace, and for her part she owed her all to it. "I am a wall, and my breasts like towers." This she speaks, not as upbraiding her little sister that had no breasts, but comforting herself concerning her, that he who had made her what she was, that had built her up upon himself, and made her to grow up to maturity, could and would do the same kindness for those whose case she bore upon her heart. "Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour." See, 1st. What she values herself by; her having found favour in the eyes of Jesus Christ. Those are happy, truly happy, and for ever so, that have the favour of God, and are accepted of him. 2nd. How she ascribes the good work of God in her to the good-will of God towards nose was like a tower, though it reminded him of the tower—a prominent object in a beautiful scene. "Galleries," in verse 5, should doubtless be curls, tresses, or locks of hair, which would hold a king captive.

vii. 8. "The smell of thy nose" signifies "the smell of thy breath." It is not certain that the word "apples" is restricted in Hebrew to what we usually call apples; and the term perhaps includes apricots, citrons, and even oranges.

vii. 9. "The roof of thy mouth," or "thy palate," i.e., thy conversation, or, as some suppose, kisses. The whole verse is obscure, and learned men differ much as to its translation and as to its application. One thing certain is, that our common version needs revision. Adam Clarke well says, "It means that the charms of her conversation must cause the most taciturn to speak in her praise."

vii. 13. "Mandrakes," or love-apples, are common in Palestine. The plant is thought to possess peculiar virtues.

her; he hath made me "a wall, and my breasts as towers;" and then, in that instance, more than in any thing, I experienced his love to me. "Hail, thou that art highly favoured," for in thee Christ is formed. 3rd. What pleasure God takes in the work of his own hands. When we are made as a wall, as a brazen wall, Jer. i. 18; xv. 20, that stands firm against the blast of the terrible ones, Isa. xxv. 4; then God takes delight in us to do us good. 4th. With what joy and triumph we ought to speak of God's grace towards us, and with what satisfaction we should look back upon the special times and seasons when we were in his eyes as those that find favour. These were days never to be forgotten.

Secondly. They are here consulting about a vineyard they had in the country; the church of Christ on earth considered under the notion of a vineyard, ver. 11, 12. "Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon," had a kingdom in the possession of a multitude, a numerous people. As he was a type of Christ, so his vineyard was a type of the church of Christ. Our Saviour has given us a key to these verses in the parable of the vineyard let out to unthankful husbandmen, Mat. xxi. 33. The bargain was, that every one of the tenants having so much of the vineyard assigned him as would contain a thousand vines, he was to pay the annual rent of a thousand pieces of silver; for we read, Isa. vii. 23, that in a fruitful soil there were "a thousand vines at a thousand silverlings." Observe, 1. Christ's church is his vineyard, a pleasant and peculiar place, privileged with many honours; he delights to walk in it as a man in his vineyard, and is pleased with its fruits. 2. He has intrusted each of us with this vineyard, as keepers of it. The privileges of the church are that good thing which he has committed to us, to be kept as a sacred trust. The service of the church is to be our business, according as our capacity is. "Son, go work to-day in my vineyard." Adam, in innocency, was to dress the garden, and to keep it. 3. He expects rent from those that are employed in his vineyard, and intrusted with it. He comes seeking fruit, and requires gospel duty of all those that enjoy gospel privileges. Every one, of what rank or degree soever, must bring glory and honour to Christ, and do some service to the interest of his kingdom in the world, in consideration of what benefit and advantage they enjoy by their share of the privileges of the vineyard. 4. Though Christ has let out his vineyard to keepers, yet still it is his, and he has his eye always upon it for good; for if he did not watch over it night and day, Isa. xxvii. 1, 2, the watchmen to whom he has let it out, would keep it but in vain, Ps. cxxvii. 1. Some take these for Christ's words, ver. 12, "My vineyard, which is mine, is before me;" and they observe how he harps upon his propriety in it; It is my vineyard, which is mine; so dear is his church to him. It is his own in the world, Jno. xiii. 1, and therefore he will always have it under his protection; it is his own, and he will look after it. 5. The church, that enjoys the privileges of the vineyard, must have them always before her. The keeping of the vineyard requires constant care and diligence They are rather the words of the spouse, "My vineyard, which is mine, is before me." She had lamented her fault and folly in not keeping her own vineyard, ch. i. 6, but now she resolves to reform. Our hearts are our vineyards, which we must keep with all diligence; and therefore we must have a watchful, jealous eye upon them at all times. 6. Our great care must be to pay our rent for what we hold of Christ's vineyard, and to see that we do not go behindhand, nor disappoint the messengers he sends to receive the fruits, Mat. xxi. 34. "Thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand," and shalt have. The main of the profits belong to Christ; to him and his praise all our fruits must be dedicated. 7. If we be careful to give Christ the praise of our church privileges, we may then take to ourselves the comfort and benefit of them. If the owner of the vineyard has had his due, "the keepers of it" shall be well paid for their care and pains; they "shall have two hundred," which, no doubt, was looked upon as good profit. They that work for Christ are working for themselves, and shall be unspeakable gainers by it.

13 Thou that dwellest in the gardens,
The companions hearken to thy voice:
Cause me to hear it.
14 Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe
Or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices.

Christ and his spouse are here parting for a while: she must stay below in the gardens on earth, where she hath work to do for him; he must remove to the mountains of spices in heaven, where he has business to attend for her, as an advocate with the Father. Now observe with what mutual endearments they part:

First. He desires to hear often from her. She is good at her pen; she must be sure to write to him; she knows how to direct it; ver. 13, "Thou that" for the present "dwellest in the gardens," dressing and keeping them, till thou remove from the garden below to the paradise above; thou, O believer, whoever thou art, that dwellest in the gardens of solemn ordinances, in the gardens of church fellowship and communion, the companions are so happy as to "hear thy voice, cause me to hear it too." Observe,

1. Christ's friends should keep a good correspondence one with another, and, as dear companions, speak often to one another, Mal. iii. 16, and l earken to one another's voice; they should edify, and encourage, and respect one another They are companions in the kingdom and patience of Christ, and therefore, as fellow-travellers, should keep up mutual freedom, and not be shy of, or strange to, one another. The communion of saints is an article of our covenant as well as an article of our creed, "to exhort one another daily," and be glad to be exhorted one by another. Hearken to the voice of the church as far as it agrees with the voice of Christ: his companions will do so.

2. In the midst of our communion with one another, we must not neglect our communion with Christ, but let him see our countenance, and hear our voice. He here bespeaks it; "The companions hearken to thy voice," it is a pleasure to them; "cause me to hear it." Thou makest thy complaints to them when any thing grieves thee; why dost thou not bring them to me, and let me hear them? Thou art free with them, be as free with me; pour out thy heart to me. Thus Christ, when he left his disciples, ordered them to send to him upon every occasion; "ask, and ye shall receive." Note, Christ not only accepts and answers, but even courts his people's prayers, not reckoning them a trouble to him, but an honour and a delight, Pr. xv. 8. We cause him to hear our prayers, when we not only pray, but wrestle and strive in prayer. He loves to be pressingly importuned, which is not the manner of men. Some read it, 'Cause me to be heard;' thou hast often an opportunity of speaking to thy companions, and they hearken to what thou sayest; speak of me to them, let my name be heard among them, let me be the subject of thy discourse. 'One word of Christ,' as Archbishop Usher used to say, 'before you part.' No subject is more becoming, or should be more pleasing.

Secondly. She desires his speedy return to her; ver. 14, "Make haste, my beloved," to come again and receive me to thyself; "be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of spices." Let no time be lost; it is pleasant dwelling here in the gardens, but to depart and be with thee is far better; that therefore is it I wish, and wait, and long for: "even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Observe, 1. Though Jesus Christ be now retired, he will return. The heavens, those high mountains of sweet spices, must contain him till the times of refreshing shall come; and those times will come when "every eye shall see him" in all the pomp and power of the upper and better world, the mystery of God being finished, and the mystical body completed. 2. True believers, as they are looking for, so they are hastening to, the coming of that day of the Lord; not that they would have him make more haste than good speed, but that the intermediate counsels may all be fulfilled, and then that the end may come—the sooner the better. Not that they think him "slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness," but thus they express the strength of their affection to him, and the vastness of their expectations from him when he comes again. 3. Those only that can in sincerity call Christ their beloved, their best beloved, can, upon good grounds, desire him to hasten his second coming. As for those whose hearts go a whoring after the world, and who set their affections on the things of the earth, they cannot love his appearing, but dread it rather, because then the earth, and all the things of it which they have chosen for their portion, will be burnt up. But they that truly love Christ long for his second coming, because it will be the crown both of his glory and their bliss. 4. The comfort and satisfaction which we sometimes have in communion with God in grace here should make us breathe the more earnestly after the immediate vision and complete fruition of him in the kingdom of glory. The spouse, after an endearing conference with her beloved, finding it must break off, concludes with this affectionate request for the perfecting and perpetuating of this happiness in the future state. The clusters of grapes that meet us in this wilderness should make us long for the full vintage in Canaan. If a day in his courts be so sweet, what then will an eternity within the veil be? If this be heaven, Oh that I were there! 5. It is good to conclude our devotions with a joyful expectation of the glory to be revealed, and holy, humble breathings towards it. We should not part but with the prospect of meeting again. It is good to conclude every sabbath with thoughts of the everlasting sabbath, which shall have no night at the end of it, nor any week day to come after it; to conclude every sacrament with thoughts of the everlasting feast, when we shall sit down with Christ at his table in his kingdom to rise no more, and drink of the wine new there; and to break up every religious assembly, in hopes of the general assembly of the church of the firstborn, when time and days shall be no more. Let the blessed Jesus hasten that blessed day. "Why are his chariot wheels so long a coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?"

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE* TO THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

The Saviour of sinners is God and man united in one Christ. As God, he has all the perfection of heaven, and as man, he has all the beauties of this earth; he has every grace of time, and every blessing of eternity, which ought to draw and to attract our love. But while men are in their natural, unregenerate state, they see none of his perfections and beauties. They behold no form nor comeliness in him, that they should desire him. The world, and the things of it, appear more desirable than he does. The base perishing joys of sense have the entire possession of their affections. Sin is more lovely in their eyes than God the Saviour, and they give up their hearts to its enjoyments in preference to him and his heaven. While they continue to place their love on such unworthy objects, they are incapable of judging of this Divine Song; for they are not only strangers, but also enemies, to that love, of which it treats; and how then can they see the beauties of its composition, or judge of the justness of its sentiments? So long as they love sin, they cannot love Jesus Christ, and therefore they cannot love the sweet descriptions in this poem, which set forth the happiness of loving him above all things. But when their eyes are opened to see the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and their hearts are once drawn from the love of sin; when they have found that it cannot make them happy, then they are glad to hear of a Saviour; and when they have tasted of his love, then they begin to understand and to admire the beauties of this Divine Song, and the more they love him the greater beauties do they find in it.

The subject of it is the union between Christ and the faithful soul. In this all the expositors of Scripture, ancient and modern, are agreed. It is a spiritual Song, composed in the manner of a dialogue. The speakers are Christ and the believer. The inspirer of it is the holy and eternal Spirit, who delivered it by the mouth of Solomon. He knew it to be true by his own experience, as every believer does to this day. After he had left God he sought for happiness in the creatures, but was disappointed. He turned from one object to another, tried the whole circle of worldly enjoyments, and, as he passed on, he wrote viii. 2. Spiced wine is wine mixed with spices and other ingredients, to make it stronger and more powerful, or more pleasant.

viii. 5. "Raised" here means aroused, awakened viii. 6. A seal or signet was sometimes worn suspended upon the breast or on the arm, as well as in a ring upon the finger.

viii. 9. The terms "wall" and "door" are fanciful comparisons in the language of affection. "A palace" is rather a tower or turret; and the "tower of silver" is the protection of wealth. The board or panel of cedar seems to mean ornament—she shall be adorned, as it were, with cedar.

viii. 11. Baal-hamon is only mentioned here as a place where Solomon had a large vineyard. It is thought to have been in the mountains of Ephraim, north of Samaria.

viii. 12. There is here a personal address to Solomon, but it does not follow that the son of David is literally spoken to. In the verse preceding Solomon is named as the possessor of a famous vineyard, upon each, "Vanity and vexation of spirit." It pleased God to shew him his error, and to make use of him, as a proper person to warn others from setting their hearts upon any object but God; for if Solomon could not find happiness in the world, "what can the man do that cometh after the king?" This is the subject of the book of Ecclesiastes. After Solomon had turned from these worldly vanities to serve the living God, he wrote this Divine Song, to shew what true happiness he had found, and every believer will find, in being united to Christ in the bonds of love and affection. The Holy Spirit had drawn his heart from the love of all inferior objects to God the Redeemer, and had given him faith to see his own interest in what the Redeemer was to do and suffer for him. By these bonds the union was formed and perfected. The Holy Spirit on Christ's part, and faith on the believer's, united them to each other. And the believer here describes what happy effects flowed to him from this union, and Christ describes the delight he had in it. The descriptions of their mutual love and happiness run through this Song of loves.

The general plan of this book, in short, is well expressed in the argument put before it in the Bible that was in use in Queen Elizabeth's time: 'In this song, Solomon by most sweet and comfortable allegories and parables, describeth the perfect love of Jesus Christ, the true Solomon and king of peace, and the faithful of his church, which he hath sanctified, and appointed to be his spouse, holy, chaste, and without reprehension. So that here is declared the singular love of the bridegroom toward the bride, and his great and excellent benefits wherewith he doth enrich her of his pure bounty and grace, without any of her deservings. Also the earnest affection of the church, which is inflamed with the love of Christ, desiring to be more and more joined to him in love, and not to be forsaken for any spot or blemish that is in her.'

This was the judgment of our reformers,—and many arguments may be brought to prove that such is the scope and design of the book.

The first argument which would occur to every serious person is the universal consent of expositors. All the Jewish writers suppose it to treat of the spiritual union between Christ and the believer. All Christian writers understand it in the same sense. And the unanimous opinion of all learned and good men ought certainly to have great weight with us: for the scope and design of the book must be very plain and clear, since there never was any dispute about it in the church of God. This then being the received sense, we may examine upon what principles it came to be so universally received. We suppose men were led to consider it in this light from the established method of explaining Scripture; and this is the second argument we shall use.

The Scriptures are suited to man in his present state. While he is here in the body he cannot converse immediately with spiritual objects; he can only see them comparatively, as compared to and illustrated by material and sensible objects. The Scriptures take this method of instruction. They teach us spiritual and heavenly things under their expressive images of nature. Whoever considered the Scriptures in this light could not rest in the literal sense of the Song. He knew that all Scripture had a spiritual sense, and therefore in reading the Song he would consider what the spiritual sense could be, and he could not easily mistake it, when he recollected what was the one great end and aim of all Scripture. Every part of it was to lead men to some knowledge of Christ, which is the third argument tending to open to us the scope and design of this Divine book.

Search the Scriptures, says he of whom they write, for these are they which testify of me. The Song is part of these Scriptures, and therefore it testifies of Christ; and what other testimony does it bear of him, than in setting forth the love which he hath for his faithful people?

"The testimony of Jesus," says St. John, "is the spirit of prophecy." If you understand the prophetical spirit of this book, you will read in it the testimony of Jesus; therefore, if you do not see how it bears testimony to him, you have no insight into its prophetical spirit.

Again we read, "That the holy Scriptures are able to make a man wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus; for all Scripture is given by inspiration of God," 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16. From whence we infer, that the Song, being part of Scripture, is given by inspiration of God, and was therefore given that it might make the man of God wise unto salvation; and this it does by establishing him in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Another proof may be taken from the 45th psalm, which is a song of loves. The subject, and the manner of the composition, are the same with this Divine book. They treat of the love of Christ to his church, and after the manner of a dialogue; and the 45th psalm is applied to Christ by an infallible interpreter. St. Paul, in the 1st of the Hebrews, and the 8th verse, says, that it was written of God the Son; from whence we may conclude, that the Song being upon the same subject, and drawn up in the same manner, treats also of the love of God the Son to his faithful people. And to confirm the interpretation of these more general proofs, I may mention a fourth argument, taken from those places of Scripture wherein Christ is spoken of in the very terms used in the Song. The Scripture often speaks of him under the character of the bridegroom. In the 25th of St. Matthew we have the parable of the ten virgins who went out to meet the bridegroom, who, in the 13th verse, is called the Son of Man. In the 5th of the Ephesians, St. Paul is treating of the love and union between husbands and wives, and in the 32nd verse he says, "This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and his church," in the same manner, and with the same expressions, which are used in the Song, and which are carried on through the New Testament; for thus we read, in one of the last scenes of the Revelation of St. John, that the multitude of the heavenly host cried aloud, "as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." And in the 21st chapter St. John informs us who the bride, the Lamb's wife is, the church, the Jerusalem that is above, which is the spiritual mother of us all, even of every one of us who shall be so happy as to be called to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

From these authorities it appears undeniably evident, that it is common in Scripture to speak of Christ in the very same manner that he is spoken of in the Song; and therefore, summing up all these arguments together, considering that the expositors, Jews and Christians, are agreed about the plan and design of it, and that the received sense is agreeable to the general rule for interpreting Scripture, and is founded upon clear reasoning from many particular passages, and more especially from those passages wherein express mention is made of Christ's love to the faithful, under the very images used to represent it in the Song, we may certainly from hence conclude, that the scope and design of this sweet portion of Scripture is to set forth in the most lively and affecting manner the mutual joys and mutual praises of Christ and the faithful.

Are there any of our readers, who, after what has been said, are not yet reconciled to this book? Do you think that it had better have been left out of the sacred volume? Consider that your opinion weighs nothing against the unanimous consent of the church of God, and your opinion is founded upon your ignorance of the things of God. If you understood this book you could not think meanly of it; but in order to understand it you must have some experience of that love of which it treats: having never tasted of it, you cannot enter into the spirit of the descriptions of it here made by Christ and by the faithful. Instead then of looking into the book for matter of censure, look into your own hearts, and beg of God to shew you how much you stand in need of having the love of Christ shed abroad in them; and whenever he enables you to say with the apostle, Jesus Christ loved me and gave himself for me, then you will taste and see how exceedingly sweet every image and description is in this Divine Song.

If you cannot be persuaded to desire the love of God may be shed abroad in your hearts, you will entertain a mean opinion of this treatise upon it. But, for the sake of your dear and immortal soul, suffer not yourself to speak irreverently of it. If God ever revealed himself to man, this is part of his revelation. The holy and eternal Spirit, who inspired all Scripture, spake this by his unerring wisdom. He is the author, and the subject is the deep things of God. Let not then a disrespectful word come out of your mouth against it. But if you will suffer your wit to run into licentiousness, remember that you ridicule this book at the peril of your soul. You are guilty of blasphemy against the Most High. And how can you think it safe to jest upon the Almighty, and to make sport with his omnipotence? Why will you set God at defiance, and add fresh fuel to his wrath, as if all your other sins would not sink you deep enough into the pit of destruction? If you have any love left for your eternal interest, forbear this desperate wit; and beg of God to enlighten the darkness of your understanding, that you may see the scope and design of this sacred Song. And to those persons who desire this we make a second remark.

You do not clearly comprehend the things written in this book, but you desire to comprehend them. If this desire be from God, it will put you upon praying for the experience of that love which is here treated of. You may possibly come at the meaning of some things in it, but you cannot know them practically nor profitably, until you are taught them of God. You cannot tell what the love of God is until it be shed abroad in your heart. No description can make you acquainted with it; and therefore look up to God who has it to give. Ask him out of the riches of his grace to bestow it upon you; and when he gives you the comfortable sense of it, then you will have the best key to open the mysteries of this Divine Song. And for your encouragement in seeking, remember that this love is free. Though it be inestimable, yet it is to be had without money and without price. God had no motive to shew it to sinners but his own inherent mercy, and he waits for no merit or qualification in them; for it is to supply the want of all merit and qualification; and he has already begun to bestow the riches of this free love upon you, by making you sensible of your want of it, and by putting you upon seeking for it. Wait upon him then in the ways of his ordinances, and he will finish what he has begun. He will enable you to love him, because he first loved you. Ask this out of a due sense of your unworthiness; and the Father, for the sake of his Son, will shed abroad his love in your hearts by the Holy Ghost. And thus he will bring you into the happy number of those believers, to whom I make my third and last inference.

You who are Christians indeed can read this sweet portion of Scripture with delight and profit. You know it to be true by your own experience. You look upon Jesus Christ in the light here described; for he is your peace, and you find his dealings with your souls are the very same which the Song mentions. For what the song says of the church in general must be true of every individual who is a member of it. For the church is nothing more than a congregation of believers, united by faith, and by the bond of the Spirit, to Christ, the Head of the spiritual body, and by love to one another; united to him, as the members are to the head, and united to one another as the members are in the same body. What, therefore, is spoken in the Song of the whole church, as the spouse of Christ, is true of every particular Christian. And what is said of the church is briefly this: In the first chapter the church expresses a strong desire for nearer communion with Christ, and then there follows some declining of her affection. After this we have her recovery, a regaining of her first love and yet she afterwards declines again in her affection, her love grows cold, and she falls into a state of desertion. Christ hides his presence from her more than he did in her former coldness; and this continues, until perceiving Christ's constant affection to her, notwithstanding her unkind treatment of him, she recovers, and follows him more closely, and with a more constant love than before.

These passages agree with the experience of the best Christians in the course of their own lives, and therefore the Song is not a dark unintelligible book to them. They find it to be an experimental treatise upon the love of Jesus Christ to his people. And all who have experienced that love understand it in this light. You have read it with care, praying the holy Inspirer of it to enlighten your understandings, that you might see its true sense and spiritual meaning; and he has opened to you the truth of its descriptions. The Holy Spirit has drawn you to Christ, and has made you happy in the sense of his love, and thus he has given you the best comment upon the song. The more he enables you to taste of this love, the more clearly will you understand the Song. You will have the greater insight into it, the nearer access you have to the Father, with confidence through the faith that is in Christ; for what is written concerning communion with God must certainly be best understood by those who live in close communion with him. This is your privilege. Remember how great and high it is, and act worthy of it. You have fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit is the bond of this communion, and therefore it is called the 'communion of the Holy Ghost.' Oh, beware then of every thing that would grieve or offend him. As his is a holy office, entirely relating to holiness, nothing can displease this Holy Spirit so much as sin. He is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity. The least thought of sin offends him; for it is sin that pollutes his sacred residence, and defiles the temple of the heart. Sin makes him withdraw and hide the light of his countenance, and withhold the sweet sense of his comfortable presence. Oh, beware then, as you love your own peace of mind, as you love your God and his glory, as you love Jesus Christ and his salvation, beware of the least approach to sin. Pray, watch, strive against it. Resist unto blood, striving against sin. Wait upon God in all his ordinances, to get power over it. And the more you are dead to sin and alive unto God, the nearer fellowship will you have with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ; and, as this fellowship is the subject of the Song, you will therefore understand it the better, and experience more of its sweetness.

and it is at least possible that the spouse here appeals to her beloved as her Solomon, whose vineyard (herself) is under her care; and she promises that the return shall be abundant, both to him and to those who aid her in her duty.

Additional Note on chap. vii. 1—9. Upon this passage, which is often appealed to as proving that the Song of Solomon offends against propriety, we give the following remarks from the commentary of Mr. Thrupp:—"No parts of the female form are described in the Song but what a sculptor would imitate, in order thereby to display the full symmetry of the human figure; nor would he generally be blamed for this, so long as he sought by it to appeal to the spectators' ideas of beauty, and not to their idle curiosity or impure passions. Those who are jealous for the honour of the Bible should beware of supposing that they uphold it by seeing in the passage under review aught but a general commendation of the graces of the Church. The passage particularises so minutely, that were the spirit of it vicious, the tendency of it would needs be also vicious, from whomsoever it were represented as proceeding. The public exhibition of that which is impure does not practically conduce to purity; we can hardly, even in a drama, enter with any fulness of detail into feelings that are immoral without catching something of their tone of immorality." He adds that verses 7—9 are by some put into the mouth of the chorus, or daughters of Jerusalem, but we think such a view incorrect.

PROPHETICAL BOOKS

THE OLD TESTAMENT:

VIZ.,

ISAIAH, JEREMIAH, LAMENTATIONS, EZEKIEL, DANIEL, HOSEA, JOEL, AMOS, OBADIAH, JONAH, MICAH, NAHUM, HABAKKUK, ZEPHANIAH, HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, AND MALACHI.

PREFACE.

THOSE books of Scripture are all prophetical which here, "in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling," we have endeavoured a methodical explanation, and a practical improvement of. I call them prophetical, because so they are for the main, though we have some histories here and there brought in for the illustration of the prophecies, and a book of Lamentations. Our Saviour often puts "the law and the prophets" for all the Old Testament. The prophets, by waiving the ceremonial precepts, and not insisting on them, but only on the weightier matters of the law, plainly intimated the abolishing of that part of the law of Moses by the Gospel; and by their many predictions of Christ, and the kingdom of his grace, they intimated the accomplishing and perfecting of that part of the law of Moses in the Gospel. Thus the prophets were the nexus—'the connecting bond' between the law and the Gospel, and are therefore fitly placed between them.

These books being prophetical, as such they are Divine, and of heavenly original and extraction. We have human laws, human histories, and human poems, as well as Divine ones; but we can have no human prophecies. Wise and good men may make prudent conjectures concerning future events, moral prognostications we call them; but it is essential to true prophecy that it be of God. The learned Huetius lays this down for one of his axioms, Omnis prophetica facultas a Deo est,—'the prophetic talent is entirely from God,' (Demonstrat. Evang. p. 15;) and proves it to be the sense both of Jews and heathen, that it is God's prerogative to foresee things to come, and whoever had such a power had it from God. And therefore the Jews reckon all prophecy to be given by the highest degree of inspiration, except that which was peculiar to Moses. When our Saviour asked the chief priests whether John's baptism were from heaven, or of men, they durst not say of men, because the people counted him a prophet, and if so, then not of men.

The Hebrew name for a prophet is נביא, a 'speaker,' 'preacher,' or 'orator,' a 'messenger' or 'interpreter,' that delivers God's messages to the children of men; as a herald to proclaim war, or an ambassador to treat of peace. But then it must be remembered, that he was formerly called ראה, or חזה, that is, a seer, (1 Sam. ix. 9,) for prophets with the eyes of their mind first saw what they were to speak, and then spoke what they had seen.

Prophecy, taken strictly, is the foretelling of things to come; and there were those to whom God gave this power, not only that it might be a sign for the confirming of the faith of the church, concerning the doctrine preached, when the things foretold should be fulfilled, but for warning, instruction, and comfort, in prospect of what they themselves might not live to see accomplished, but which should be fulfilled in its season; so predictions of things to come long after might be of present use.

The learned Dr. Grew, (Cosmol. Sacra. l. iv. c. 6,) describes prophecy in this sense to be, a 'declaration of the Divine prescience, looking at any distance through a train of infinite causes, known and unknown to us, upon a sure and certain effect.' Whence he infers, 'that the being of prophecies supposeth the non-being of contingents; for, though there are many things which seem to us to be contingents, yet were they so indeed there could have been no prophecy; and there can be no contingent seemingly so loose and independent but it is a link of some chain.' And Huetius gives this reason why none but God can foretell things to come: because every effect depends upon an infinite number of preceding causes, all which in their order must be known to him that foretells the effect; and therefore to God only, for none but he is omniscient. So Tully (De Divin. l. i.) argues, Qui teneat causas rerum futurarum, idem necesse est omnia teneat quæ futura sint; quod facere nemo nisi Deus potest,—'He who knows the causes of future events must necessarily know the events themselves; this is the prerogative of God alone.' And therefore we find that by this the God of Israel proves himself to be God, (Isa. xlvi. 9, 10,) that by his prophets he foretold things to come, which came to pass according to the prediction; and by this he disproves the pretensions of the pagan deities, that they could not shew the things that were to come to pass hereafter, Isa. xli. 23. Tertullian (Apol. c. 20) proves the Divine authority of the Scripture from the fulfilling of Scripture prophecies, Idoneum, opinor, testimonium divinitatis, veritas divinationis,—'I conceive the accomplishment of prophecy to be a satisfactory attestation from God.' And, besides the foretelling of things to come, the discovering of things secret by revelation from God is a branch of prophecy, as Ahijah's discovering Jeroboam's wife in disguise, and Elisha's telling Gehazi what passed between him and Naaman.

But prophecy, (Du Pin, Hist. of the Canon, l. i. c. 2,) in Scripture language, is taken more largely for a declaration of such things to the children of men, either by word or writing, as God has revealed to them that speak or write it, by vision, dream, or inspiration, guiding their minds, their tongues, and pens, by his Holy Spirit; and giving them not only ability, but authority to declare such things in his name, and to preface what they say with, "Thus saith the Lord." In this sense it is said, "that the prophecy of Scripture came not in old time by the will of man," as other pious moral discourses might, "but holy men spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," 2 Pet. i. 20, 21. The same Holy Spirit that moved upon the face of the waters to produce the world, moved upon the minds of the prophets to produce the Bible.

Now I think it is worthy to be observed that all nations, having had some sense of God and religion, have likewise had a notion of prophets and prophecy; have had a veneration for them, and a desire and expectation of acquaintance and communion with the gods they worshipped in that way. Witness their oracles, their augurs, and the many arts of divination they had in use among them, in all the ages and all the countries of the world.

It is commonly urged as an argument against the atheists, to prove that there is a God, that all nations of the world acknowledged some god or other, some being above them, to be worshipped and prayed to, to be trusted in and praised: the most ignorant and barbarous nations could not avoid the knowledge of it; the most learned and polite nations could not avoid the belief of it. And this is a sufficient proof of the general and unanimous consent of mankind to this truth; though far the greatest part of men made to themselves gods, which yet were no gods. Now I think it may be urged with equal force against the deists, for the proof of a Divine revelation, that all nations of the world had, and had veneration for, that which they at least took to be a Divine revelation, and could not live without it; though in this also "they became vain in their imagination, and their foolish heart was darkened." But if there were not a true Deity, and a true prophecy, there would never have been pretended deities and counterfeit prophecies.

Lycurgus and Numa, those two great lawgivers of the Spartan and Roman commonwealths, brought their people to an observance of their laws by possessing them with a notion that they had them by Divine revelation, and so making it a point of religion to observe them. And those that have been never so little conversant with the Greek and Roman histories, as well as with the more ancient ones of Chaldea and Egypt, cannot but remember what a mighty deference their princes and great commanders, and not their unthinking commonalty only, paid to the oracles and prophets, and the prognostications of their soothsayers, which in all cases of importance were consulted with abundance of gravity and solemnity; and how often the resolutions of councils, and the motions of mighty armies, turned upon them, though they appeared never so groundless and far-fetched.

There is a full account given by that learned philosopher and physician, Caspar Peucer, of the many kinds of divination and prediction used among the Gentiles, by which they took on them to tell the fortune both of states and of particular persons. They Preface to the Prophets.—It can scarcely be expected that we should subject to the test of modern criticism all the statements and opinions made in this general preface. Nothing is stated but the simple truth when we say that since the time of Mr. Henry great progress has been made in critical science, while none at all has been made towards the discovery of new moral and religious truths and duties. The writers he quotes were eminent in his time and popular, whereas now most of them are only consulted by the learned, and that seldom. Huetius, or Peter Daniel Huet, was a French Roman Catholic bishop, who had a reputation for immense learning, and certainly produced some useful books. He was born in 1630, and died in 1721. Dr. Grew, another celebrity referred to on this page, was an industrious writer on scientific and other subjects. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society and of the College of Physicians, and died in 1711. The "Cosmologia Sacra" is called "a discourse of the universe, as it is the creature and kingdom of God," and was pub-were all, he saith, (De Præcipuis Divinationum Generibus, A. 1591,) reduced by Plato to two heads, Divinatio, Μαντική, which was a kind of inspiration, or was thought to be so; the prophet or prophetess foretelling things to come by an internal flatus, or fury. Such was the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, and that of Jupiter Trophonius; which, with the like, were famous for many ages during the prevalency of the kingdom of darkness: but (as appears by some of the pagan writers themselves) they were all silenced and struck dumb when the Gospel, that truly Divine oracle, began to be preached to the nations. The other kind of divination was that which he calls Οἰωνιστική, which was a prognostication by signs according to rules of art, as by the flight of birds, the entrails of beasts, by stars, or meteors, and abundance of ominous accidents, with which a foolish world was miserably imposed upon. A large account of this matter we have also in the late learned dissertation of Anton. Van Dale, (De Vera ac Falsa Prophetia, A. 1696,) to which I refer the reader. But nothing of this kind made a greater noise in the Gentile world than the oracles of the Sibyls, and their prophecies. Their name signifies a divine counsel: Sibyllæ, qu. Siobulæ, Sios, in the Æolic dialect, being put for Theos. Peucer saith, every nation almost had their Sibyls, but those of Greece were most celebrated. They lived in several ages; the most ancient is said to be the Sibylla Delphica, who lived before the Trojan war, or about that time: the Sibylla Erythrea was the most noted; she lived about the time of Alexander the Great: but it was the Sibylla Cumana of whom the story goes that she presented herself and nine books of oracles to Tarquinius Superbus, which she offered to sell him at so vast a rate that he refused to purchase them, upon which she burnt three, and upon his second refusal the other three, but made him give the same rate for the remaining three, which were deposited with great care in the Capitol: but those being afterwards burnt accidentally with the Capitol a collection was made of other Sibylline oracles, and those are they which Virgil refers to in his fourth Eclogue, (Vid. Virg. Æneid. l. vi.)

All the oracles of the Sibyls that are extant were put together and published in Holland not many years ago, by Servatius Gallæus, in Greek and Latin, with large and learned notes; together with all that could be met withal of the metrical oracles that go under the names of Jupiter, Apollo, Serapis, and others, by Joannes Opsopæus.

The oracles of the Sibyls were appealed to by many of the fathers, for the confirmation of the Christian religion. Justin Martyr (Ad Græcos Cohortat. juxta finem) doth it with a great deal of assurance, persuading the Greeks to give credit to that ancient Sibyl, whose works were extant all the world over; and to their testimony and to that of Hydaspis, he appeals concerning the general conflagration, and concerning the torments of hell. Clemens Alexandrinus (Apol. 2, p. mihi. 66, l.) often quotes the Sibyl's verses with great respect; so doth Lactantius, (Qu. et Respons. p. 436;) St. Austin (De Civ. Dei, l. xviii. c. 23,) has the famous acrostic at large, said to be one of the oracles of the Sibylla Erythrea, the first letters of the verses making Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ υἱὸς Σώτηρ,—'Jesus Christ the Son of God the Saviour.' Divers passages they produce out of those oracles which expressly foretell the coming of the Messiah, his being born of a virgin, his miracles, his sufferings, particularly his being buffeted, spit upon, crowned with thorns, having vinegar and gall given him to drink, &c.

Whether these oracles were genuine and authentic or no, has been much controverted among the learned. Baronius and the Popish writers generally admit and applaud them, and build much upon them; so do some Protestant writers. Isaac Vossius has written a great deal to support the reputation of them, and (as I find him quoted by Van Dale) will needs have it that they were formerly a part of the canon of Scripture. And a learned prelate of our own nation, Bishop Montague, pleads largely and with great assurance for their authority, and is of opinion that some of them were Divinely inspired.

But many learned men look upon it to be a pious fraud, as they called it, that those verses of the Sibyls which speak so very expressly of Christ, and the future state, were forged by some Christians, and imposed upon the over-credulous. Huetius, (Demonstrat. p. 748,) though of the Romish church, condemns both the ancient and more modern composures of the Sibyls; and refers his reader for the proof of the vanity of them to the learned Blondel. Van Dale and Gallæus look upon them to be a forgery. And the truth is, they speak so much more particularly and plainly concerning our Saviour and the future state than any of the prophets of the Old Testament do, that we must conclude St. Paul, who was the apostle of the Gentiles, guilty not only of a very great omission, that in all his preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, and in all his Epistles to the Gentile churches, he never so much as mentions the prophecies of the Sibyls, nor vouches their authority, as he doth that of the Old Testament prophets, in his preaching and writing to the Jews; but likewise of a very great mistake, in making it the particular advantage which the Jews had above the Gentiles, that to them were committed the oracles of God, Rom. iii. 1, and they were the children of the prophets; and in speaking of the Gentiles as sitting in darkness, and being afar off. We cannot conceive that heathen women, and those acted by demons, should speak more early and fully of the Messiah than those holy men did, who we are sure were moved by the Holy Ghost; or that the Gentiles should be intrusted with larger and earlier discoveries of the great salvation than that people of whom as concerning the flesh Christ was to come. But enough, if not more than enough, of the pretenders to prophecy. It is a good remark which the learned Gallæus makes upon the great veneration which the Romans had for the oracles of the Sibyls, for which he quotes Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Οὐδὲν οὕτε Ῥωμαῖοι φυλάττουσιν οὔτε ὅσιον κτῆμα οὔτε ἱερὸν, ὡς τὰ Σιβύλλεια θέσφατα,—'The Romans preserve nothing with such sacred care, nor do they hold any thing in such high estimation, as the Sibylline oracles.' Hi si pro vitreis suis thesauris adeo decertarunt, quid nos pro genuinis nostris, a Deo inspiratis? &c.—'If they had such a value for these counterfeits, how precious should the true treasure of the Divine oracles be to us!' And of that we come next to speak.

Prophecy, we are sure, was of equal date with the church; for faith comes not by thinking and seeing, as philosophy doth, but by hearing, Rom. x. 17; by hearing the word of God. In the antediluvian period, Adam received Divine revelation in the promise of the seed of the woman, and no doubt communicated it in the name of the Lord to his seed, and was prophet as well as priest to his numerous family. Enoch was a prophet, and foretold perhaps the deluge, however the last judgment, that of the great day, "Behold, the Lord comes!" Jude 14. When men began as a church to call upon the name of the Lord, Gen. iv. 26, or to call themselves by his name, they were blessed with prophets, for the prophecy came in old time, 2 Pet. i. 21: it is venerable for its antiquity.

When God renewed his covenant of providence (and that a figure of the covenant of grace) with Noah and his sons, we soon after find Noah as a prophet, foretelling not only the servitude of Canaan, but God's enlarging Japhet by Christ, and his dwelling in the tents of Shem, Gen. ix. 26, 27. And when upon the general revolt of mankind to idolatry, (as in the former period upon the apostacy of Cain,) God distinguished a church for himself by the call of Abraham, and by his covenant with him and his seed, he conferred upon him, and other the patriarchs, the spirit of prophecy. For when he reproved kings for their sakes, this was it he said, "Touch not mine anointed," (who have received that unction from the Holy One,) "and do my prophets no harm," Ps. cv. 14, 15. And of Abraham he said expressly, "He is a prophet," Gen. xx. 7. And it was with a prophetical eye, as a seer, that he saw Christ's day; saw it at so great a distance, and yet with so great an assurance triumphed in it, Jno. viii. 56. And Stephen seems to speak of the first settling of a correspondence between him and God, by which he was established to be a prophet, when he saith, the God of glory appeared to him, Acts vii. 2; appeared in glory. Jacob upon his deathbed, as a prophet, told his sons what should befall them in the last days, Gen. xlix. 1–10; and spoke very particularly concerning the Messiah.

Hitherto was the infancy of the church, and with it of prophecy. It was the dawning of that day; and that morning light owed its rise to the Sun of righteousness, though he rose not till long after; but it shone more and more. During the bondage of Israel in Egypt this, as other glories of the church, was eclipsed; but as the church made a considerable and memorable advance in the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the forming of them into a people, so did the spirit of prophecy in Moses, the illustrious instrument employed in that great service: so it is said, Hos. xii. 13, "By a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved" through the wilderness to Canaan; that is, by Moses, as a prophet. It appears, by what God said to Aaron, that there were then other prophets among them, to whom God made known himself and his will in dreams and visions, Num. xii. 16; but to Moses he spake in a peculiar manner, "mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, Num. xii. 6, 8.

lished in 1701. Of Tully, as our author calls Cicero, we need not speak. Du Pin was a Roman Catholic, a learned and moderate writer, whose candour is often grossly misrepresented by infidels, and not liked by extreme members of his own community. He died in 1719. Caspar, or Gaspard Peucer, was son-in-law to Melancthon. He was imprisoned for ten years on account of his opinions, and died in 1602. His works are chiefly on miscellaneous subjects.

Antony Van Dale was a Dutch physician, who wrote on heathen oracles, idolatry, &c., and died in 1708. Gallæus, a Dutch writer, published his collection of the Sibylline Oracles in 1689. It was at that time the most complete, but has been superseded by more recent works. He died in 1709. Opsopæus, a German critic, also published an edition of the Sibylline Oracles. He died in 1596. Cæsar Baronius, who died in 1607, was a Roman Catholic, and is chiefly known for his "Ecclesiastical Annals." Isaac Vossius was a native of Holland. His learning was great, and his works were numerous.

Nay, such a plentiful effusion was there of the spirit of prophecy at that time, (because Moses was such a prophet, as was to be a type of Christ the great prophet,) that some of his spirit was put upon seventy elders of Israel at once, and they prophesied, Num. xi. 25. What they said was extraordinary, and not only under the direction of a prophetic inspiration, but under the constraint of a prophetic impulse; as appears by the case of Eldad and Medad.

When Moses, that great prophet, was laying down his office, he promised Israel that the Lord God would raise them up a prophet of their brethren like unto him, Deu. xviii. 15–18. Which words, saith the learned Bishop Stillingfleet, (Orig. Sacr. b. 2. c. 4,) though in their full and complete sense they relate to Christ, (and to him they are more than once applied in the New Testament,) yet there is included in them a promise of an order of prophets, which should succeed Moses in the Jewish church, and be λόγια ζῶντα, the living oracles among them, Acts vii. 38, by which they might know the mind of God; for in the next words he lays down rules for the trial of prophets, whether what they said was of God or no. And it is observable, that that promise comes in immediately upon an express prohibition of the pagan rites of divination, and the consulting of wizards and familiar spirits. You shall not need to do that, saith Moses; for, to your much better satisfaction, you shall have prophets Divinely inspired, by whom you may know, from God himself, both what to do and what to expect. But as Jacob's dying prophecy concerning the sceptre in Judah, and the lawgiver between his feet, did not begin to be remarkably fulfilled till David's time, most of the judges being of other tribes, so Moses's promise of a succession of prophets began not to receive its accomplishment till Samuel's time, a little before the other promise began to emerge and operate; and it was an introduction to the other, for it was by Samuel as a prophet that David was anointed king; which was an intimation that the prophetical office of our Redeemer should make way both in the world and in the heart for his kingly office; and therefore, when he was asked, "Art thou a King?" he answered, not evasively, but very pertinently, "I came to bear witness to the truth," Jno. xviii. 37; and so to rule as a king purely by the power of truth.

During the government of the judges there was a pouring out of the Spirit, but more as a spirit of conduct and courage for war than as a spirit of prophecy. Deborah is indeed called a prophetess, because of her extraordinary qualifications for judging Israel; but that is the only mention of prophecy, that I remember, in all the book of Judges. Extraordinary messages were sent by angels, as to Gideon and Manoah; and it is expressly said, that before the word of the Lord came to Samuel it was precious, it was very scarce, "there was no open vision," 1 Sam. iii. 1. And it was therefore with more than ordinary solemnity that the word of the Lord came first to Samuel; and by degrees notice and assurance was given to Israel, "that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord," 1 Sam. iii. 20. In Samuel's time, and by him, the schools of the prophets were erected, by which prophecy was dignified, and provision made for a succession of prophets; for it should seem that in those colleges hopeful young men were bred up in devotion, in a constant attendance upon the instructions the prophets gave from God, and under a strict discipline, as candidates, or probationers for prophecy, who were called the sons of the prophets; and their religious exercises of prayer, conference, and psalmody especially, are called prophesyings; and their prefect, or president, is called their father, 1 Sam. x. 12. Out of these God ordinarily chose the prophets he sent, yet not always. Amos was no prophet or prophet's son, Amos vii. 14, had not his education in the schools of the prophets, and yet was commissioned to go on God's errands; and (which is observable) though he had not academical education himself, yet he seems to speak of it with great respect, when he reckons it among the favours God had bestowed upon Israel, that he raised up of their sons for prophets, and of their young men for Nazarites, Amos ii. 11.

It is worth noting that, when the glory of the priesthood was eclipsed by the iniquity of the house of Eli, the desolations of Shiloh, and the obscurity of the ark, there was then a more plentiful effusion of the spirit of prophecy than had been before; a standing ministry of another kind was thereby erected, and a succession of it kept up. And thus afterwards, in the kingdom of the ten tribes, where there was no legal priesthood at all, yet there were prophets, and prophets' sons; in Ahab's time we meet with a hundred of them, whom Obadiah hid by fifty in a cave, 1 Kin. xviii. 4. When the people of God that desired to know his mind wanted one way of instruction, God furnished them with another, and a less ceremonious one; for he left not himself without witness, nor them without a guide. And when they had no temple or altar that they could attend upon with any safety or satisfaction, they had private meetings at the prophets' houses, to which the devout faithful worshippers of God resorted, as we find the good Shunamite did, 2 Kin. iv. 23; and where they kept their new moons and their sabbaths comfortably, and to their edification.

David was himself a prophet; so St. Peter calls him, Acts ii. 30; and though we read not of God's speaking to him by dreams and visions, yet we are sure "the Spirit of the Lord spake by him, and his word was in his tongue," and he had those about him that were seers, that were his seers, as Gad and Iddo, 2 Sam. xxiii. 2, that brought him messages from God, and wrote the history of his times. And now the products of the spirit of prophecy were translated into the service of the temple, not only in the model of the house, which the Lord made David understand in writing by his hand upon him, 1 Chr. xxviii. 19, but in the worship performed there, for there we find Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, prophesying with harps, and other musical instruments, according to the order of the king, not to foretell things to come, but to give thanks, and to praise the Lord, 1 Chr. xxviii. 1–3; yet in their psalms they spoke much of Christ and his kingdom, and the glory to be revealed.

In the succeeding reigns, both of Judah and Israel, we frequently meet with prophets sent on particular errands to Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Asa, and other of the kings, who, it is probable, instructed the people in the things of God at other times, though it be not recorded. But prophecy growing into contempt with many, God revived the honour of it, and put a new lustre upon it, in the power given to Elijah and Elisha to work miracles, and the great things that God did by them, for the confirming of the people's faith in it, and the awakening of their regard to it, 2 Kin. ii. 3; iv. 1–38; v. 22; vi. 1. In their time, and by their agency, it should seem that the schools of the prophets were revived; and we find sons of the prophets, fellows of these sacred colleges, employed in carrying messages to the great men, as to Ahab, 1 Kin. xx. 35; and to Jehu, 2 Kin. ix. 1.

Hitherto the prophets of the Lord delivered their messages by word of mouth, only we read of one writing which came from Elijah the prophet to Jehoram king of Israel, 2 Chr. xxi. 12. The histories of those times which are left us were compiled by prophets under a Divine direction; and when the Old Testament is divided into the law and the prophets, the historical books are for that reason reckoned among the prophets. But in the later times of the kingdom of Judah and Israel some of the prophets were Divinely inspired to write their prophecies, or abstracts of them, and to leave them upon record for the benefit of after ages, that the children which should be born might praise the Lord for them, and by comparing the event with the prediction might have their faith confirmed. And probably those later prophets spoke more fully and plainly of the Messiah and his kingdom than their predecessors had done, and for that reason their prophecies were put in writing, not only for the encouragement of the pious Jews that looked for the consolation of Israel, but for the use of us Christians, upon whom the ends of the world are come, as David's psalms had been for the same reason, that the Old Testament and the New might mutually give light and lustre to each other. Many other faithful prophets there were at the same time, who spoke in God's name, that did not commit their prophecies to writing, but were of those whom God sent, "rising up betimes and sending them;" the contempt of whom, and of their messages, brought ruin without remedy upon that sottish people, that "knew not the day of their visitation." In their captivity they had some prophets, some to shew them how long; and though it was not by a prophet like Moses that they were brought up out of Babylon, as they had been out of Egypt, but by Joshua the high priest first, and afterwards by Ezra the scribe, to shew that God can do his work by ordinary means when he pleaseth, yet soon after their return the spirit of prophecy was poured out plentifully, and continued (according to the Jews' computation,) forty years in the second temple, but ceased in Malachi. Then (say the rabbins) the Holy Spirit was taken from Israel, and they had the benefit only of the Bathkol, 'the daughter of a voice,' namely, a voice from heaven, which they look upon to be the lowest degree of Divine revelation. Now herein they are witnesses against themselves for rejecting the true Messiah; for our Lord Jesus, and he only, was spoken to by a voice from heaven, at his baptism, his transfiguration, and his entrance on his sufferings.

He died in 1688. Dr. Montague, who died Bishop of Norwich, in 1641, was a learned man, but a great defender of extremely High Church principles. David Blondel was a French Protestant. He died in 1655, and left several works, which were able and erudite. With reference to the Sibylline Oracles, there is now but one opinion, and it is that they are a combination of literary forgeries, partly pagan and partly due to Christians, with possibly some Jewish elements. They are at best literary curiosities, without a shadow of authenticity. The appeals to them by Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Augustine, Lactantius, and other Fathers, show that they existed in those early times, and that their true character was misunderstood.

Mr. Henry refers to the Jewish opinion that prophecy proper ceased after Malachi, and that the Bath-kol alone remained. This Bath-kol is variously explained, but probably it means a mere echo of heavenly utterances, as some rabbinical writers understand it. Of the three degrees of revelation recognised by the rabbis it was the

In John Baptist prophecy revived; and therefore in him the Gospel is said to begin, when the church had had no prophets of above three hundred years. We have not only the vox populi,—'the voice of the people,' to prove John a prophet, for all the people counted him so, but vox Dei,—'the voice of God' too, for Christ calls him a prophet, Mat. xi. 9, 10. He had an extraordinary commission from God to call people to repentance, was "filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb," and therefore was "called the prophet of the Highest," because he went before the face of the Lord to prepare his way, Lu. i. 15, 16; and though he did no miracle, nor gave any sign or wonder, yet this proved him a true prophet, that all he said of Christ was true, Jno. x. 41. Nay, and this proved him more than a prophet, than any of the other prophets, that whereas by other prophets Christ was discovered at a great distance, by him he was discovered as already come; and he was enabled to say, "Behold the Lamb of God." But after the ascension of our Lord Jesus there was a more plentiful effusion of the spirit of prophecy than ever before; then was the promise fulfilled that God would pour out his Spirit upon all flesh, (and not as hitherto upon the Jews only,) and their sons and their daughters should prophesy, Acts ii. 16, &c. The gift of tongues was one new product of the spirit of prophecy, and given for a particular reason, that, the Jewish pale being taken down, all nations might be brought into the church. These and other gifts of prophecy being for a sign, are long since ceased, and laid aside, and we have no encouragement to expect the revival of them; but, on the contrary, are directed to call the Scriptures the more sure word of prophecy, 2 Pet. i. 19, more sure than voices from heaven, and to them we are directed to take heed, to search them, and to hold them fast. All God's spiritual Israel know that they are established to be the oracles of God, 1 Sam. iii. 20; and if any add to, or take from, the book of that prophecy, they may read their doom in the close of it; God shall take blessings from them, and add curses to them, Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

Now concerning the prophets of the Old Testament, whose writings are before us, observe,

I. That they were all holy men. So we are assured by the apostles, that "the prophecy came in old time by holy men of God," (and men of God they were commonly called, because they were devoted to him,) "who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." They were men subject to like passions as we are, Jam. v. 17; so Elijah, one of the greatest of them, is said to have been; but they were holy men, men that in the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives were examples of serious piety. Though there were many pretenders, that without warrant said, Thus saith the Lord, when he sent them not; and some that prophesied in Christ's name, (Mat. vii. 22, 23,) but he never knew them, and they indeed were workers of iniquity; and though the cursing, blaspheming lips of Balaam and Caiaphas, even then when they actually designed mischief, were overruled to speak oracles; yet none were employed and commissioned to speak as prophets but those that had received the spirit of grace and sanctification; for holiness becomes God's house. The Jewish doctors universally agree in this rule, that the spirit of prophecy never rests upon any but a holy and wise man, and one whose passions are allayed; (see Mr. Smith, Of Prophecy;) or, as others express it, an humble man, and a man of fortitude; that is, one that has power to keep his sensual, animal part in due subjection to religion and right reason. And some of them give this rule, (Gemara Schab. c. 2,) that the spirit of prophecy doth not reside where there is either on the one hand grief and melancholy, or on the other hand laughter and lightness of behaviour, and impertinent idle talk. And it is commonly observed by them, both from the musical instruments used in the schools of the prophets in Samuel's time, and from the instance of Elisha's calling for a minstrel, (2 Kings iii. 15,) that the Divine presence doth not reside with sadness, but with cheerfulness; and Elisha, they say, had not yet recovered himself from the sorrow he conceived at parting with Elijah. They have also a tradition, but I know no ground for it, that all the while Jacob mourned for Joseph, the Shechinah, or Holy Spirit, withdrew from him. Yet I believe, when David intimates that by his sin in the matter of Uriah he had lost the right spirit and the free spirit, (Ps. li. 10, 12,) which therefore he begs might be renewed in him, and restored to him, it was not because he was under grief, but because he was under guilt. And therefore, in order to the return of that right and free spirit, he prays that God would create in him a clean heart.

II. That they had all a full assurance in themselves of their Divine mission; and, though they could not always prevail to satisfy others, yet they were abundantly satisfied themselves that what they delivered as from God, and in his name, was indeed from him; and with the same assurance did the apostles speak of the Word of life, as that which they had heard and seen, and looked on, and which their hands had handled, 1 Jno. i. 1. Nathan spoke from himself, when he encouraged David to build the temple; but afterwards knew he spake from God, when in his name he forbade him to do it. God had various ways of making known to his prophets the messages they were to deliver to his people; it should seem ordinarily to have been by the ministry of angels: the Apocalypse Christ is expressly said to have signified by his angel to his servant John, Rev. i. 1. It was sometimes done in a vision, when the prophet was awake, sometimes in a dream, when the prophet was asleep, and sometimes by a secret but strong impression upon the mind of the prophet. But it is a maxim Maimonides has laid down, that all prophecy makes itself known to the prophet that it is prophecy indeed; that is, saith another of the rabbins, by the vigour and liveliness of the perception, whereby he apprehends the things propounded, which Jeremiah intimates when he saith, the word of the Lord was as a fire in his bones, Jer. xx. 9; and therefore they always spoke with great assurance, knowing they should be justified, Isa. l. 7.

III. That in their prophesying, both in receiving their message from God and delivering it to the people, they always kept possession of their own souls, Dan. x. 8. Though sometimes their bodily strength was overpowered by the abundance of the revelations, and their eyes dazzled with the visionary light, as in the instances of Daniel and John, (Rev. i. 17,) yet still their understanding remained with them, and the free exercise of their reason. This is excellently well expressed by a learned writer of our own, (Smith, Of Prophecy, p. 190,) 'that the prophetical spirit seating itself in the rational powers, as well as in the imagination, did never alienate the mind, but inform and enlighten it; and they that were acted by it always maintained a clearness and consistency of reason with strength and solidity of judgment. For (saith he afterwards, p. 266) God did not make use of idiots, or fools, to reveal his will by, but such whose intellectuals were entire and perfect; and he imprinted such a clear copy of his truth upon them, as that it became their own sense, being digested fully into their understanding, so as they were able to deliver and represent it to others, as truly as any can paint forth his own thoughts.' God's messengers were speaking men, not speaking trumpets. The fathers frequently took notice of this difference between the prophets of the Lord, and the false prophets, that the pretenders to prophecy, that either were acted by an evil spirit or were under the force of a heated imagination, that these counterfeits underwent alienations of mind, and delivered what they had to say in the utmost toss and disorder, as the Pythian prophetess, that delivered her infernal oracles with many antic gestures, tearing her hair, and foaming at the mouth. And by this rule they condemned the Montanists, that pretended to prophecy, in the second century, that what they said was in a way of extacy, not like rational men, but like men in a frenzy. Chrysostom (in 1 Cor. xii. 1,) having described the furious, violent motions of the pretenders to prophecy, adds, Ὁ δὲ φροφητὴς οὐχ οὕτως, 'a true prophet doth not do so.' Sed mente sobria, et constanti animi statu, et intelligens quæ profert, omnia pronunciat,—'He understands what he utters, and utters it soberly and calmly.' And Jerome, in his preface to his commentaries upon Nahum, observes, that it is called the book of the vision of Nahum; Non enim loquitur ἐν ἐκστάσει, sed est liber intelligentis omnia quæ loquitur,—'For he speaks not in any extacy, but as one who understands every thing he says;' it is the word of one that understands all he speaks. And again, (Prolog. in Habac.) Non ut amens loquitur propheta, nec in morem insanientium fœminarum dat sine mente sonum,—'The prophet speaks not as an insane person, nor like women wrought into fury, nor does he utter sound without sense.'

IV. That they all drove at one and the same thing, which was to bring people to repent of their sins, and to return to God, and to do their duty to him. This was the errand on which all God's messengers were sent, to beat down sin, and to revive and advance serious piety; the burthen of every song was, Turn ye now every one from his evil way; amend your ways and your doings, and execute judgment between a man and his neighbour, Jer. vii. 3, 5; (see Zech. vii. 7, 8; viii. 16.) The scope and design of all their prophecies was to enforce the precepts and sanctions of the law of Moses, the moral law, which is of universal and perpetual obligation. Here is nothing of the ceremonial institutes, of the carnal ordinances, that were imposed only till the times of reformation, lowest; the first being called Prophecy, the second the Holy Spirit, and th third Bath-kol. Of its precise character very much has been writte , and very little is known.

Mr. Smith, who is quoted as a writer on prophecy, was a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and died there in 1652. He was a man of much learning, and wrote select discourses on theological subjects. That on prophecy was inserted by Bishop Watson in his collection of "Theological Tracts."

The "Gemàra schabbath" is a portion of the Talmud, which is a collection of tracts on a multitude of subjects. What is called the text is the Mishna, and the running commentary is the Gemara. The Talmud was begun to be written in the second century of our era, and not finished till long after. It is a great storehouse of the most incongruous materials, including some of value. Two forms of the Talmud exist - the Jerusalem, or Palestinian, and the Babylonian, and they differ much from each other.

Heb. ix. 10. Those were now waxing old, and ready to vanish away; but they make it their business to press the great and weighty matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and truth.

V. That they all bare witness to Jesus Christ, and had an eye to him. God's raising up the horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David was consonant to, and in pursuance of, what he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began, Lu. i. 69, 70. They prophesied of the grace that should come to us, and it was the Spirit of Christ in them, one and the same spirit, that testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. Christ was then made known, and yet comparatively hid in the predictions of the prophets, as before in the types of the ceremonial law. And the learned Huetius (Demonstrat. Evang. p. 737) observes it as really admirable, that so many persons in different ages should conspire with one consent as it were to foretell, some one particular, and others another, concerning Christ, all which had at length their full accomplishment in him. Ab ipsis mundi incunabulis, per quatuor annorum millia, uno ore venturum Christum prædixerunt viri complures, in ejusque ortu, vita, virtutibus, rebus gestis, morte, ac tota denique Οἰκονομία prænonstranda consenserunt,—'From the earliest period of time, for four thousand years, a great number of men have predicted the advent of Christ, and presented an harmonious statement of his birth, life, character, actions, and death, and of that economy which he came to establish.'

VI. That these prophets were generally hated and abused in their several generations by those that lived with them. Stephen challengeth his judges to produce an instance to the contrary, "Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted?" yea, and as it should seem for this reason, because "they shewed before of the coming of the Just One," Acts vii. 52. Some there were that trembled at the word of God in their mouths, but by the most they were ridiculed and despised, and, as ministers are now by profane people, made a jest of, Hos. ix. 7; the prophet was the fool in the play. "Wherefore came this mad fellow unto thee?" (2 Kin. ix. 11,) said the captains, of one of the sons of the prophets. The Gentiles never treated their false prophets so ill as the Jews did their true prophets, but on the contrary had them always in veneration. The Jews' mocking the messengers of the Lord, killing the prophets, and stoning them that were sent unto them, was as amazing unaccountable an instance of the enmity that is in the carnal mind against God as any other. And this makes their rejection of Christ's Gospel the less strange, that the spirit of prophecy, which for many ages was so much the glory of Israel, in every age met with so much opposition; and there were those that always resisted the Holy Ghost in the prophets, and turned that glory into shame, Acts vii. 51; but this was it that was the measure-filling sin of Israel, that brought upon them both their first destruction by the Chaldeans and their final ruin by the Romans, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16.

VII. That though men slighted these prophets, God owned them, and put honour upon them. As they were men of God, his immediate servants and his messengers, so he always shewed himself "the Lord God of the holy prophets," Rev. xxii. 6; stood by them, and strengthened them, and by his Spirit they were full of power; and those that slighted them, when they had lost them, were made to know to their confusion that a prophet had been among them. What was said of one of the primitive fathers of the prophets was true of them all, "The Lord was with them, and did let none of their words fall to the ground," 1 Sam. iii. 19. What they said by way of warning and encouragement, for the enforcing of their calls to repentance and reformation, was to be understood conditionally: when God spake by them either on the one hand to build and to plant, or on the other hand to pluck up and pull down, the change of the people's way might produce a change of God's ways, (Jer. xviii. 7, 19;) such was Jonah's prophecy of Nineveh's ruin within forty days; or God might sometimes be better than his word, in granting a reprieve: but what they said by way of prediction of a particular matter, and as a sign, did always come to pass exactly as it was foretold; yea, and the general predictions sooner or later took hold, even of those that would fain have got clear of them, (Zech. i. 6;) for this is that which God glories in, that "he confirmeth the word of his servants, and performeth the counsel of his messengers," Isa. xliv. 26.

In opening these prophecies I have endeavoured to give the genuine sense of them, as far as I could reach it, by consulting the best expositors, considering the scope and coherence, and "comparing spiritual things with spiritual," the spiritual things of the Old Testament with those of the New, and especially by prayer to God for the conduct and direction of the Spirit of truth; but after all there are many things here "dark and hard to be understood," concerning the certain meaning of which, though I could not gain myself, much less expect to give my reader, full satisfaction, yet I have not, with the unlearned and unstable, wrested them to the destruction of any, 2 Pet. iii. 16. It is the prerogative of the Lamb of God to take this book, and to open all its seals. I have likewise endeavoured to accommodate these prophecies to the use and service of those who desire to read the Scripture, not only with understanding, but with pious affections, and to their edification in faith and holiness. And we shall find all that is given by inspiration of God is profitable, though not all alike profitable, 2 Tim. iii. 16, not all alike easy or improvable; but when the mystery of God shall be finished we shall see, what we are now bound to believe, that there is not one idle word in all the prophecies of this book. What God hath said, as well as what he doth, we know not now, but shall know hereafter.

The pleasure I have had in studying and meditating upon those parts of these prophecies which are plain and practical, and especially those that are evangelical, has been an abundant balance to, and recompence for, the harder tasks we have met with in other parts that are more obscure. In many parts of this field the treasure must be digged for, as that in the mines, but in other parts the surface is covered with rich and precious products, with corn and flocks, of which we may say as was said of Noah, these same have comforted us greatly "concerning our work and the toil of our hands," and have made it very pleasant and delightful; God grant it may be no less so to the readers.

And now let me desire the assistance of my friends in setting up my Ebenezer here in a thankful acknowledgment that "hitherto the Lord has helped me." I desire to praise God that he hath spared my life to finish the Old Testament, and hath graciously given me some tokens of his presence with me in carrying on of this work; though the more I reflect upon myself the more unworthy I see myself of the honour of being thus employed, and the more need I see of Christ and his merit and grace. "Remember me, O God, for good, and spare me according to the multitude of thy mercies." The Lord forgive what is mine, and accept what is his own.

I purpose, if God continue my life and health, according to the measure of the grace given to me, and in a constant and entire dependence upon Divine strength, to go through the New Testament in two volumes more. I intimated in my preface to the first volume, that I had drawn up some expositions upon some parts of the New Testament; viz., the gospels of St. Matthew and St. John; but they are so large, that, to make them bear some proportion to the rest, it is necessary they be much contracted, so that I shall be obliged to write them all over again, and to make considerable alterations; and therefore I cannot expect they should be published but, as these hitherto have been, if God permit, a volume every other year. I shall begin it now shortly, if the Lord will, and apply myself to it as closely as I can; and I earnestly desire the prayers of all that wish well to the undertaking, that, if the Lord spare me to go on with it, I may be enabled to do it well, and so as that by it some may be led into the "riches of the full assurance of understanding in the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ," Col. ii. 2. And if it shall please God to remove me by death before it be finished, I trust I shall be able to say, not only, Welcome his blessed will, but, Welcome that blessed world, in which, though now we know but in part, and prophesy but in part, that knowledge which is perfect will come, and that which is partial will be done away, 1 Cor. xiii. 8, 10, 12; in which all our mistakes will be rectified, all our doubts resolved, all our deficiencies made up, all our endeavours in preaching, catechizing, and expounding superseded and rendered useless, and all our prayers swallowed up in everlasting praises; in which prophecy, we now so much admire, shall fail, and tongues shall cease, and the knowledge we have now shall vanish away, as the light of the morning star doth when the sun is risen; in which we shall no longer see through a glass darkly, but face to face. In a believing, comfortable, well-grounded expectation of that true and perfect light, I desire to continue, living and dying; in an humble and diligent preparation for it, let me spend my time, and in the full enjoyment of it, Oh that I may spend a glorious eternity!

July 18, 1712. M. H.

The whole subject of prophecy is universally regarded as instructive and important, and it has been dealt with by multitudes of writers of different views. Without reckoning the unbelieving school, which openly or practically denies the reality of prophecy, there are two or three classes of evangelical interpreters, some of whom plead for a single and others for a double fulfilment of certain predictions. To discuss the merits of the various systems is not within the scope of these brief notes [see more in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary," article "Prophecy"]; we may, however, observe that among the uses of prophecy the following are enumerated by Dr. Jortin:—1. It served to secure the belief in God and his providence. 2. It was fitted to promote veneration for the Divine omniscience. 3. It helped to keep alive true religion, as that of the heart, and not of mere forms. 4. It attracted men to love and trust in God, who deigned to speak to them. 5. It was intended to preserve the people from idolatry.

AN EXPOSITION

OF THE BOOK OF

THE PROPHET ISAIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

PROPHET is a title that sounds very great to those that understand it, though, in the eye of the world, many of those that were dignified with it appeared very mean. A prophet is one that hath a great intimacy with heaven, and a great interest there, and, consequently, a commanding authority upon earth. Prophecy is put for all Divine revelation, 2 Pet. i. 20, 21, because that was, most commonly (by dreams, voices, or visions,) communicated to prophets first, and by them to the children of men, Num. xii. 6. Once, indeed, God himself spoke to all the thousands of Israel from the top of mount Sinai; but it was so intolerably dreadful that they begged that for the future God would speak to them as he had done before, by men like themselves, whose terror should not make them afraid, nor their hands be heavy upon them, Job xxxiii. 7. God approved the motion: "They have well said," saith he, Deu. v. 27, 28; and the matter was then settled by consent of parties that we must never expect to hear from God any more in that way, but by prophets, who received their instructions immediately from God, with a charge to deliver them to his church. Before the sacred canon of the Old Testament began to be written there were prophets, who were instead of Bibles to the church. Our Saviour seems to reckon Abel among the prophets, Mat. xxiii. 31, 35. Enoch was a prophet, and by him that was first in prediction which is to be last in execution, the judgment of the great day; Jude 14, Behold, the Lord comes with his holy myriads. Noah was a preacher of righteousness. God saith of Abraham, He is a prophet, Gen. xx. 7. Jacob foretold things to come, Gen. xlix. 1; nay, all the patriarchs are called prophets, Ps. cv. 15, "Do my prophets no harm." Moses was, without compare, the most illustrious of all the Old Testament prophets, for with him the Lord spake face to face, Deu. xxxiv. 10. He was the first writing prophet, and by his hand the first foundations of holy writ were laid; even those that were called to be his assistants in the government had the spirit of prophecy, such a plentiful effusion was there of that spirit at that time, Num. xi. 25. But after the death of Moses, for some ages, the Spirit of the Lord appeared and acted in the church of Israel more as a martial spirit than as a spirit of prophecy, and inspired men more for acting than speaking; I mean in the time of the judges. We find the Spirit of the Lord coming upon Othniel, Gideon, Samson, and others, for the service of their country with their swords, not with their pens. Messages were sent from heaven by angels, as to Gideon and Manoah, and to the people, Jud. ii. 1. In all the book of Judges there is never once mention of a prophet, only Deborah is called a prophetess. Then the word of the Lord was precious; there was no open vision, 1 Sam. iii. 1. They had the law of Moses newly written; let them study that. But in Samuel prophecy revived, and in him a famous epocha or period of the church began: a time of great light, in a constant, uninterrupted succession of prophets, till some time after the captivity, when the canon of the Old Testament was completed in Malachi; and then prophecy ceased for near four hundred years, till the coming of the great Prophet and his forerunner. Some prophets were Divinely inspired to write the histories of the church, but they did not put their names to their writings, only referring themselves for proof to the authentic records of those times, which were known to be drawn up by prophets, as Gad, Iddo, &c. David and others were prophets to write sacred songs for the use of the church. After them, we often read of prophets sent on particular errands, and raised up for special public services; among them the most famous were Elijah and Elisha in the kingdom of Israel. But none of these put their prophecies in writing, nor have we any remains of them but some fragments in the histories of their times; yet nothing of their own writing (that I remember) but one epistle of Elijah's, 2 Chr. xxi. 12. But towards the latter end of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel it pleased God to direct his servants the prophets to write and publish some of their sermons, or abstracts of them. The dates of many of their prophecies are uncertain, but the earliest of them was in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and Jeroboam II., his contemporary, king of Israel, about two hundred years before the captivity; and not long after Joash had slain Zechariah the son of Jehoiada in the courts of the temple. If they begin to murder the prophets, yet they shall not murder their prophecies; they shall remain as witnesses against them. Hosea was the first of the writing prophets, and Joel, Amos, and Obadiah published their prophecies about the same time. Isaiah began some time after, and not long; but his prophecy is placed first, because it is the largest of them all, and has most in it of Him to whom all the prophets bear witness; and, indeed, so much of Christ that he is justly styled the evangelical prophet, and, by some of the ancients, a fifth evangelist. We shall have the general title of this book ver. 1, and, therefore, shall here only observe something, Preliminary Note.—There are about fifty quotations from Isaiah in the New Testament, some of the passages occurring more than once. This fact shows the importance of Isaiah to the Christian student, and in part accounts for the immense number of criticisms to which the first prophetic book has given rise. Mr. Barnes says, 'It is manifest that a correct exposition of this book must go far to throw a clear light on a considerable portion of the writings of the New Testament. Indeed, so numerous are the quotations, and so entirely do the writings of Isaiah harmonise with those of the New Testament, that it may be regarded almost as an indispensable part of the work of explaining the New Testament to explain Isaiah." As might be expected, critics of a certain school have laboured hard and long to overthrow the claims to originality of many portions of the book, while other critics have been at least equally able and industrious in defending it. The chief attacks have been directed against the last twenty-seven chapters.

I. Concerning the prophet himself. He was (if we may believe the tradition of the Jews) of the royal family, his father being, they say, brother to king Uzziah. However, he was much at court, especially in Hezekiah's time, as we find in his story; to which many think it is owing, that his style is more curious and polite than that of some other of the prophets, and in some places exceeding lofty and soaring. The Spirit of God sometimes served his own purpose by the particular genius of the prophet, for prophets were not speaking trumpets, through which the Spirit spake, but speaking men, by whom the Spirit spake, making use of their natural powers, in respect both of light and flame, and advancing them above themselves.

II. Concerning the prophecy. It is transcendently excellent and useful; it was so to the church of God then, serving for conviction of sin, direction in duty, and consolation in trouble. Two great distresses of the church are here referred to, and comfort prescribed in reference to them—that by Sennacherib's invasion, which happened in his own time, and that of the captivity in Babylon, which happened long after; and in the supports and encouragements laid up for each of these times of need we find abundance of the grace of the Gospel. There are not so many quotations in the Gospels out of any, perhaps not out of all the prophecies of the Old Testament, as out of this; nor so express testimonies concerning Christ, witness that of his being born of a virgin, ch. ix., and that of his sufferings, ch. liii. The beginning of this book abounds most with reproofs for sin and threatenings of judgment; the latter end of it is full of good words and comfortable words. This method the Spirit of Christ took formerly in the prophets, and doth still,—first to convince, and then to comfort; and those that would be blessed with the comforts must submit to the conviction. Doubtless, Isaiah preached many sermons, and delivered many messages to the people, which are not written in this book, as Christ did; and probably these sermons were delivered more largely and fully than they are here related; but so much is left on record as Infinite Wisdom thought fit to convey to us, on whom the ends of the world are come. And these prophecies, as well as the histories of Christ, are written that we might believe on the name of the Son of God, and that, believing, we might have life through his name; for to us is the Gospel here preached, as well as unto them that lived then, and more clearly. Oh that it may be mixed with faith!

CHAPTER I.

The first verse of this chapter is intended for a title to the whole book, and it is likely that this was the first sermon that this prophet was appointed to publish, and to affix in writing (as Calvin thinks the custom of the prophets was) to the door of the temple, as with us proclamations are fixed to public places, that all might read them, Hab. ii. 2; and those that would might take out authentic copies of them, the original being after some time laid up by the priests among the records of the temple. The sermon which is contained in this chapter hath in it, I. A high charge exhibited in God's name against the Jewish church and nation, 1. For their ingratitude, ver. 2, 3; 2. For their incorrigibleness, ver. 5; 3. For the universal corruption and degeneracy of the people, ver. 4, 6, 21, 22; 4. For their rulers' perverting of justice, ver. 23. II. A sad complaint of the judgments of God which they had brought upon themselves by their sins, and by which they were brought almost to utter ruin, ver. 7—9. III. A just rejection of those shows and shadows of religion which they kept up among them, notwithstanding this general defection and apostacy, ver. 10—15. IV. An earnest call to repentance and reformation, setting before them life and death; life if they complied with the call, and death if they did not, ver. 16—20. V. A threatening of ruin to those that would not be reformed, ver. 24, 28—31. VI. A promise of a happy reformation at last, and a return to their primitive purity and prosperity, ver. 25—27. And all this is to be applied by us, not only to the communities we are members of, in their public interests, but to the state of our own souls.

THE vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah.

Here is, First. The name of the prophet, Isaiah, or Jesaihahu, for so it is in the Hebrew, which in the New Testament is read Esaias. His name signifies 'the salvation of the Lord,' a proper name for a prophet, by whom God gives knowledge of salvation to his people, especially for this prophet, who prophesies so much of Jesus, the Saviour, and the great salvation wrought out by him. He is said to be the son of Amoz, not Amos the prophet,—the two names in the Hebrew differ more than in the English,—but, as the Jews think, of Amoz the brother or son of Amaziah king of Judah; a tradition as uncertain as that rule which they give, that where a prophet's father is named he also was himself a prophet. The prophets' pupils and successors are indeed often called their sons, but we have few instances, if any, of their own sons being their successors.

Secondly. The nature of the prophecy. It is a vision; being revealed to him in a vision when he was awake, "and heard the words of God, and saw the visions of the Almighty," as Balaam speaks, Num. xxiv. 4, though perhaps it was not so illustrious a vision at first as that afterwards, ch. vi. 1. The prophets were called seers, or seeing men, and therefore their prophecies are fitly called visions. It was what he saw with the eyes of his mind, and foresaw, as clearly by Divine revelation, was as well assured of it, as fully apprized of it, and as much affected with it, as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes. Note, 1. God's prophets saw what they spoke of, knew what they said, and require our belief of nothing but what they themselves believed and were sure of, Jno. vi. 69; 1 Jno. i. 1. 2. They could not but speak what they saw, because they saw how much all about them were concerned in it, Acts iv. 20; 2 Cor. iv. 13.

Thirdly. The subject of the prophecy. It was what "he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem," the country of the two tribes, and that city which was their metropolis; and there is not much in it relating to Ephraim, or the ten tribes, as there is in the prophecy of Hosea. Some chapters there are in this book which relate to Babylon, Egypt, Tyre, and some other neighbouring nations; but it takes its title from that which is the greatest part of it, concerning Judah and Jerusalem. And the other nations spoken of are such as the people of the Jews had concerns with. Isaiah brings to them in a special manner, 1. Instruction; for it is the privilege of Judah and Jerusalem that to them pertain the oracles of God. 2. Reproof and threatening; for if in Judah, where God is known,—if in Salem, where his name is great,—iniquity be found, they sooner than any other shall be reckoned with for it. 3. Comfort and encouragement in evil times; for the children of Zion shall be joyful in their king.

Fourthly. The date of the prophecy. He prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah." By this it appears, 1. That he prophesied long, especially if, as the Jews say, he was at last put to death by Manasseh, to a cruel death,—being sawn asunder,—to which some suppose the apostle refers, Heb. xi. 37. From the year that king Uzziah died, ch. vi. 1, to Hezekiah's sickness and recovery, was forty years; how much before and after he prophesied is not certain; some reckon sixty, others eighty, years in all. It was an honour to him, and a happiness to his country, that he was continued so long in his usefulness. And we must suppose both that he began young and that he held out to old age; for the prophets were not tied, as the priests were, to a certain age for the beginning or ending of their ministration. 2. That he passed through variety of times. Jotham was a good king, and Hezekiah a better, who, no doubt, gave encouragement to, and took advice from, this prophet; were patrons to him, and he a privy counsellor to them. But between them, and when Isaiah was in the prime of his time, the reign of Ahaz was very profane and wicked. Then, no doubt, he was frowned upon at court, and it is likely forced to abscond. Good men and good ministers must expect bad times in this world, and prepare for them. Then religion was run down to that degree that the doors of the house of the Lord were shut up, and idolatrous altars were erected in every corner of Jerusalem; and Isaiah, with all his Divine eloquence, and messages immediately from God himself, could not help it. The best men, the best ministers, cannot do the good they would do in the world.

2 Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth:
For the LORD hath spoken,
I have nourished and brought up children,
And they have rebelled against me.
3 The ox knoweth his owner,
And the ass his master's crib:
But Israel doth not know,
My people doth not consider.
4 Ah sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity,
A seed of evildoers, children that are corrupters:
They have forsaken the LORD,
They have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger,
They are gone away backward.
5 Why should ye be stricken any more?
Ye will revolt more and more:
The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint.
6 From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it;
But wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores:
They have not been closed, neither bound up,
Neither mollified with ointment.
7 Your country is desolate,
Your cities are burned with fire:
Your land, strangers devour it in your presence,
And it is desolate, as overthrown by strangers. [yard,
8 And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vine-
As a lodge in a garden of cucumbers,
As a besieged city. [remnant,
9 Except the LORD of hosts had left unto us a very small
We should have been as Sodom,
And we should have been like unto Gomorrah.

We will hope to meet with a brighter and more pleasant scene before we come to the end of this book; but truly here in the beginning of it every thing looks very bad, very black, with Judah and Jerusalem. What is the wilderness of the world, if the church, the vineyard, have such a dismal aspect as this here?

First. The prophet, though he speaks in God's name, yet, despairing to gain audience with the children of his people, addresseth himself to the heavens and the earth, and bespeaks their attention; ver. 2, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth!" Sooner will the inanimate creatures hear, who observe the law and answer the end of their creation, than this stupid, senseless people. Let the lights of heaven shame their darkness, and the fruitfulness of the earth their barrenness, and the strictness of each to their time their irregularity. Moses begins thus, Deu. xxxii. 1, to which the prophet here refers, intimating that now those times were come which Moses there foretold, Deu. xxxi. 29. Or, this is an appeal to heaven and earth, to angels, and then to the inhabitants of the upper and lower world: let them judge between God and his vineyard.

i. 1. This first verse is a general title and declaration of the period over which the prophetic activity of Isaiah extended. Of his family and rank but little is known. A Jewish tradition makes him the nephew of Amaziah, king of Judah, and another says he was put to death by Manasseh.

i. 3. In this verse the words "doth not consider" are scarcely so exact a translation as "doth not understand."

i. 5. Instead of "why" some, as Dr. Alexander, explain "whereupon;" i.e., on what part of the body "can ye be stricken" (smitten, punished) "any more?" But other good critics prefer our authorised version.

i. 6. The Chaldee interprets this to mean that, "from the lowest of the people even to the princes, all are contumacious and rebellious." For "putrifying sores" we may put fresh or new wounds, but it may be that "undressed wounds" are meant, as further indicated by what follows.

Can either produce such an instance of ingratitude? Note, God will be justified when he speaks, and both heaven and earth shall declare his righteousness, Mic. vi. 1, 2; Ps. l. 6.

Secondly. He chargeth them with base ingratitude, a crime of the highest nature; call a man ungrateful and you can call him no worse. Let heaven and earth hear, and wonder at, 1. God's gracious dealings with such a peevish, provoking people as they were. "I have nourished and brought them up as children;" they have been well fed, and well taught, Deu. xxxii. 6. I have magnified and exalted them, so some; not only made them grow, but made them great; not only maintained them, but preferred them; not only trained them up, but raised them high. Note, We owe the continuance of our lives and comforts, and all our advancements, to God's fatherly care of us, and kindness to us. 2. Their ill-natured carriage towards him who was so tender of them; "They have rebelled against me;" or, (as some read it,) 'they have revolted from me;' they have been deserters, nay, traitors against his crown and dignity. Note, All the instances of God's favour to us, as the God both of our nature and of our nurture, aggravate our treacherous departures from him, and all our presumptuous oppositions of him. Children, and yet rebels!

Thirdly. He attributes this to their ignorance and inconsideration; ver. 3, "The ox knows," but "Israel doth not." Observe, 1. The sagacity of the ox and the ass, which are not only brute creatures, but of the dullest sort; and yet the ox hath such a sense of duty as to know his owner, and to serve him, to submit to his yoke and draw in it. The ass hath such a sense of interest as to know his master's crib or manger where he is fed, and to abide by it; he will go to that of himself if ye turn him loose. A fine pass man is come to when he is shamed even in knowledge and understanding by these silly animals; and is not only sent to school to them, Pr. vi. 6, 7, but set in a form below them, Jer. viii. 7; "taught more than the beasts of the earth," Job xxxv. 11, and yet knowing less. 2. The sottishness and stupidity of Israel. God is their owner and proprietor; he made us, and his we are more than our cattle are ours; he has provided well for us; providence is our master's crib; yet many that are called the people of God do not know, and will not consider this; but ask, "What is the Almighty, that we should serve him?" He is none of our owner; "and what profit shall we have if we pray unto him?" he hath no crib for us to feed at. He had complained, ver. 2, of the obstinacy of their wills; "they have rebelled against me." Here he runs it up to its cause: Therefore they have rebelled because they do not know, they do not consider; the understanding is darkened, and therefore the whole soul is alienated from the life of God, Eph. iv. 18. "Israel doth not know," though their land was a land of light and knowledge. "In Judah is God known;" yet, because they do not live up to what they know, it is in effect as if they did not know. They know, but their knowledge doth them no good; because they do not consider what they know, they do not apply it to their case, nor their minds to it. Note, 1. Even among those that profess themselves God's people, that have the advantages, and lie under the engagements of his people, yet there are many that are very careless in the affairs of their souls. 2. Inconsideration of what we do know is as great an enemy to us in religion as ignorance of what we should know. 3. Therefore men revolt from God, and rebel against him, because they do not know and consider their obligations to God in duty, gratitude, and interest.

Fourthly. He laments the universal pravity and corruption of their church and kingdom. The disease of sin was epidemical, and all orders and degrees of men were infected with it. "Ah sinful nation," ver. 4. The prophet bemoans those that would not bemoan themselves: Ah, alas for them, woe to them! he speaks with a holy indignation at their degeneracy, and a dread of the consequences of it. See here,

1. How he aggravates that sin, and shews the malignity that there was in it, ver. 4. 1st. The wickedness was universal; they were a sinful nation, the generality of the people were vicious and profane; they were so in their national capacity, in the management of their public treaties abroad, and the administration of public justice at home, they were corrupt. Note, It is ill with a people when sin becomes national. 2nd. It was very great and heinous in its nature. They were "laden with iniquity;" the guilt of it, and the curse incurred by that guilt, lay very heavy upon them; it was a heavy charge that was exhibited against them which they could never clear themselves from. Their wickedness was upon them as a talent of lead, Zec. v. 7, 8; and their sin, as it did easily beset them, and they were prone to it, was a weight upon them, Heb. xii. 1. 3rd. They came of an ill breed, were "a seed of evil-doers." Treachery ran in the blood, they had it by kind, which made the matter so much the worse, more provoking, and less curable; they rose up in their fathers' stead, and trod in their fathers' steps, to "fill up the measure of their iniquity," Num. xxxii. 14; they were a race and family of rebels. 4th. They that were themselves debauched did what they could to debauch others. They are not only corrupt children, born tainted, but "children that are corrupters," that propagate vice, and infect others with it; not only sinners, but tempters; not only acted by Satan, but agents for him. If those that are called children, God's children, that are looked upon as belonging to his family, be wicked and vile, their example is of the most malignant influence. 5th. Their sin was a treacherous departure from God. They were deserters from their allegiance; "they have forsaken the Lord," to whom they had joined themselves; they are "gone away backward," are alienated or separated from God; have turned the back upon him, run their colours, and quitted their service; when they were urged forward they ran backward, "as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke," Hos. iv. 16. 6th. It was an impudent and daring defiance of him. "They have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger," wilfully and designedly; they knew what would anger him, and that they did. Note, The backslidings of those that have professed religion and relation to God are in a special manner provoking to him.

2. How he illustrates it by a comparison taken from a sick and diseased body all overspread with leprosy; or, like Job's, with sore boils, ver. 5, 6. 1st. The distemper hath seized the vitals, and so threatens to be mortal. Diseases in the head and heart are most dangerous. Now the head, "the whole head, is sick, the heart, the whole heart, is faint;" they were become corrupt in their judgment, the leprosy was in their head; they were utterly unclean; their affection to God and religion was cold and gone; the things which remained were ready to die away, Rev. iii. 2. 2nd. It hath overspread the whole body, and so becomes exceeding noisome; "from the sole of the foot even to the head." From the meanest peasant to the greatest peer "there is no soundness," no good principles, no religion, for that is the health of the soul; nothing "but wounds and bruises," guilt and corruption, the sad effects of Adam's fall; noisome to the holy God, painful to the sensible soul. They were so to David when he complained, Ps. xxxviii. 5, "My wounds stink and are corrupt, because of my foolishness." See Ps. xxxii. 3, 4. No attempts were made for reformation, or, if they were, they proved ineffectual; the wounds "have not been closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment." While sin remains unrepented of, the wounds are unsearched, unwashed, the proud flesh in them not cut out; and while, consequently, it remains unpardoned, the wounds are not mollified or closed up, nor any thing done towards the healing of them, and the preventing of the fatal consequences of them.

Fifthly. He sadly bewails the judgments of God which they had brought upon themselves by their sins, and their incorrigibleness under those judgments.

1. Their kingdom was almost ruined, ver. 7. So miserable were they that both their towns and their lands were wasted, and yet so stupid that they needed to be told this, and to have it shewed them. Look and see how it is: "your country is desolate," the ground is not cultivated, for want of inhabitants, the villages being deserted, Jud. v. 7; and thus the fields and vineyards become like deserts, "all grown over with thorns," Pr. xxiv. 31. "Your cities are burned with fire," by the enemies that invade you. Fire and sword commonly go together. As for the fruits of "your land," which should be food for your families, "strangers devour them;" and, to your greater vexation, it is "before your eyes," and you cannot prevent it; you starve while your enemies surfeit on that which should be your maintenance. The overthrow of your country is as the overthrow of strangers; it is used by the invaders as one might expect it should be used by strangers. Jerusalem itself, which was as the daughter of Zion, (the temple built on Zion was a mother, a nursing mother to Jerusalem,) or Zion itself, the holy mountain, which had been dear to God as a daughter, was now lost, deserted, and exposed "as a cottage in a vineyard," which, when the vintage is over, nobody dwells in or takes any care of, and looks as mean and despicable "as a lodge" or hut "in a garden of cucumbers," and everybody is afraid of coming near it, and solicitous to remove their effects out of it, as if it were a besieged city, ver. 8. And some think it is the calamitous state of the kingdom that is represented by a diseased body, ver. 6. Probably this sermon was preached in the reign of Ahaz, when Judah was invaded by the kings of Syria and Israel, the Edomites and the Philistines, who slew many, and carried many away into captivity, 2 Chr. xxviii. 5, 17, 18. Note, National impiety and immorality bring national desolation. Canaan, the glory of all lands, mount Zion, the joy of the whole earth, both became a reproach and a ruin, and sin hath made them so, that great mischief-maker.

2. Yet they were not at all reformed, and therefore God threatens to take another course with them; ver. 5, "Why should ye be stricken any more" with any expectation of doing you good by it, when you increase revolts as your rebukes are increased; "You will revolt more and more," as you have done, as Ahaz particularly did, who "in his distress trespassed yet more against the Lord," 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. Thus the physician, when he sees the patient's case desperate, troubles him no more with physic; and the father resolves to correct his child no more when, finding him hardened, he determines to disinherit him. Note, 1st. There are those who are made worse by the methods God takes to make them better. The more they are stricken the more they revolt; their corruptions, instead of being mortified, are irritated and exasperated by their afflictions, and their hearts more hardened. 2nd. God sometimes in a way of righteous judgment ceaseth to correct those who have been long incorrigible, and whom therefore he designs to destroy. The reprobate silver shall be cast, not into the furnace, but to the dunghill, Jer. vi. 29, 30: see Eze. xxiv. 13; Hos. iv. 14, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still."

Sixthly. He comforts himself with the consideration of a remnant that should be the monuments of Divine grace and mercy, notwithstanding this general corruption and desolation, ver. 9. See here, 1. How near they were to an utter extirpation. They were almost like Sodom and Gomorrah, in respect both of sin and ruin, grown almost so bad as that there could not have been found ten righteous men among them, and almost so miserable as that none had been left alive, but their country turned into a sulphureous lake. Divine justice said, "Make them as Admah, set them as Zeboim;" but mercy said, "How shall I do it?" Hos. xi. 8, 9. 2. What it was that saved them from it: "The Lord of hosts left unto them a very small remnant," that were kept pure from the common apostacy, and kept safe and alive from the common calamity. This is quoted by the apostle, Rom. ix. 29, and applied to those few of the Jewish nation who in his time embraced Christianity, when the body of the people rejected it, and in whom the promises made to the fathers were accomplished. Note, 1st. In the worst of times there is a remnant preserved from iniquity, and reserved for mercy; as Noah and his family in the deluge, Lot and his in the destruction of Sodom. Divine grace triumphs in distinguishing by an act of sovereignty. 2nd. This remnant is often a very small one in comparison with the vast numbers of revolting ruined sinners. Multitude is no mark of the true church; Christ's is a little flock. 3rd. It is God's work to sanctify and save some, when others are left to perish in their impurity; it is the work of his power as the Lord of hosts. Except he had left us that remnant there had been none left; the corrupters (ver. 4) did what they could to debauch all; and the devourers (ver. 7) to destroy all, and had prevailed if God himself had not interposed to secure to himself a remnant, who are bound to give him all the glory. 4th. It is good for a people that have been saved from utter ruin to look back and see how near they were to it, just upon the brink of it, to see how much they owed to a few good men that stood in the gap, and that that was owing to a good God, who left them these good men. "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed."

10 Hear the word of the LORD, ye rulers of Sodom;
Give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah.
11 To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the LORD:
I am full of the burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of [fed beasts;
And I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats.
12 When ye come to appear before me,
Who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts?
13 Bring no more vain oblations;
Incense is an abomination unto me;
The new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies,
I cannot away with;
It is iniquity, even the solemn meeting [hateth:
14 Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul
They are a trouble unto me;
I am weary to bear them.
15 And when ye spread forth your hands,
I will hide mine eyes from you:

i. 7. "Strangers" here are foreign foes, who may have been actually invading the land, though some think a previous invasion is referred to.

i. 8. The word for "cottage" means merely a shed or booth, and that for "lodge" denotes a sort of "watch-box," both being hasty erections for the keepers and labourers. Melons, rather than cucumbers, are alluded to in the second clause, unless, as alleged, the original word includes generally gourds, melons, and cucumbers.

i. 12—15. A general rebuke and repudiation of hypocritical services—of outward forms without consistent lives. The actions are not acceptable, because of the absence of holy and obedient dispositions. If the heart be not right with God, external obedience is an abomination to him. This is the leading idea, but it suggests that a day might come when these times and external forms would be dispensed with (John iv. 23, 24). "The calling of assemblies," in verse 13, refers to the "convocations" of the law.

Yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear:
Your hands are full of blood.

Here, First. God calls to them (but calls in vain) to hear his word, ver. 10. 1. The title he gives them is very strange; "Ye rulers of Sodom," and "Ye people of Gomorrah." This intimates what a righteous thing it had been with God to make them like Sodom and Gomorrah in respect of ruin, ver. 9, because they had made themselves like Sodom and Gomorrah in respect of sin. "The men of Sodom were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly," Gen. xiii. 13; and so were the men of Judah. When the rulers were bad no wonder the people were so. Vice overpowered virtue, for it had the rulers, the men of figure, on its side; and it outpolled it, for it had the people, the men of number, on its side. The streams being thus strong, no less a power than that of the Lord of hosts could secure a remnant, ver. 2. The rulers are boldly attacked here by the prophet as rulers of Sodom, for he knew not to give flattering titles. The tradition of the Jews is that for this he was articled against long after and put to death, as having cursed the gods, and spoken evil of the rulers of his people. 2. His demand upon them is very reasonable; "Hear the word of the Lord, and give ear to the law of our God;" attend to that which God has to say to you, and let his word be a law to you. The following declaration of dislike to their sacrifices would be a kind of new law to them, though really it was but an explication of the old law; but special regard is to be had to it, as is required to the like, Ps. l. 7, 8. Hear this and tremble; hear it and take warning.

Secondly. He justly refuseth to hear their prayers and accept their services; their sacrifices and burnt offerings, the fat and blood of them, ver. 11; their attendance in his courts, ver. 12; their oblations, their incense, and their solemn assemblies, ver. 13; their new moons and their appointed feasts, ver. 14; their devoutest addresses, ver. 15. They are all rejected, because their hands were full of blood. Now observe,

1. There are many who are strangers, nay, enemies to the power of religion, and yet seem very zealous for the show, and shadow, and form of it. This sinful nation, this seed of evil-doers, these rulers of Sodom, and people of Gomorrah, brought, not to the altars of false gods, (they are not here charged with that,) but to the altar of the God of Israel, sacrifices, a multitude of them, as many as the law required, and rather more; not only peace offerings, which they themselves had their share of, but burnt offerings, which were wholly consumed to the honour of God. Nor did they bring the torn, and lame, and sick, but fed beasts, and the fat of them, the best of the kind. They did not send others to offer their sacrifices for them, but came themselves to appear before God; they observed the instituted places, not in high places or groves, but in God's own courts; and the instituted time, the "new moons and sabbaths, and appointed feasts," none of which they omitted; nay, it should seem, they called extraordinary assemblies, and held solemn meetings for religious worship besides those that God had appointed. Yet this was not all; they applied themselves to God not only with their ceremonial observances, but with the moral instances of devotion; they prayed, they prayed often, made many prayers, thinking they should be heard for their much speaking; nay, they were fervent and importunate in prayer, they spread forth their hands as men in earnest. Now, one would have thought these, and no doubt they thought themselves, a pious, religious people; and yet far from being so; for, 1st. Their hearts were empty of true devotion. They came to appear before God, ver. 12, 'to be seen before him,' so the margin reads it; they rested in the outside of the duties, they looked no farther than to be seen of men, and went no farther than that which men see. 2nd. Their hands were full of blood; that is, they were guilty of murder, rapine, and oppression, under colour of law and justice. The people shed blood, and the rulers did not punish them for it; the rulers shed blood, and the people were aiding and abetting, as the elders of Jezreel were to Jezebel in shedding Naboth's blood. Malice is heart-murder in the account of God. He that hateth his brother in his heart hath, in effect, his hands full of blood.

2. When sinners are under the judgments of God they will easier be brought to fly to their devotions than to forsake their sins, and to reform their lives. Their country was now desolate, and their cities burned, ver. 7; and this awakened them to bring their sacrifices and offerings to God more constantly than they had done, as if they would bribe God Almighty to remove the punishment, and give them leave to go on in the sin. "When he slew them, then they sought him," Ps. lxxviii. 34; "Lord, in trouble have they visited thee," ch. xxvi. 16. Many that will readily part with their sacrifices yet will not be persuaded to part with their sins.

3. The most pompous and costly devotions of wicked people, without a thorough reformation of the heart and life, are so far from being acceptable to God that really they are an abomination to him. It is shewed here in a great variety of expressions, that "to obey is better than sacrifice," nay, that sacrifice without obedience is a jest, it is an affront and provocation to God. The comparative neglect which God here expresseth of ceremonial observances was a tacit intimation of what they would come to at last, when they would all be done away by the death of Christ; what was now made little of would in due time be made nothing of. "Sacrifice and offering," and prayer made in the virtue of that, "thou wouldst not; then said I, Lo, I come." Their sacrifices are here represented,

1st. As fruitless and insignificant. "To what purpose" is it? ver. 11; they are vain oblations, ver. 13; "in vain do they worship me," Mat. xv. 9. It was all lost labour, and served not to answer any good intention; for, First. It was not looked upon as any act of duty or obedience to God: "Who has required those things at your hands?" ver. 12. Not that God disowns his institutions, or refuseth to stand by his own warrants, but in what they did they had not an eye to him that required it; nor did indeed he require it of them whose hands were full of blood, and continued impenitent. Secondly. It did not recommend them to God's favour, he delighted not in the blood of their sacrifices, for he did not look upon himself as honoured by it. Third'y. It would not obtain any relief for them. They pray, but God will not hear; because they regard iniquity, Ps. lxvi. 18; he will not deliver them, for, though they make many prayers, they none of them come from an upright heart. All their religious services turned to no account to them. Nay,

2nd. As odious and offensive. God did not only not accept them, but he did detest and abhor them. They are your sacrifices, they are none of mine; I am full of them, even surfeited with them; he needed them not, Ps. l. 10, did not desire them, had had enough of them, and more than enough. Their coming into his courts he calls treading them, or trampling upon them; their very attendance on his ordinances was construed a contempt of them. Their incense, though never so fragrant, was an abomination to him; for it was burned in hypocrisy, and with an ill design. Their solemn assemblies he could not away with, could not see them with any patience, nor bear the affront they gave him. The solemn meeting is iniquity, though the thing itself was not; yet, as they managed it, it was. It is a vexation, (so some read it,) a provocation to God, to have ordinances thus prostituted, not only to wicked people, but to wicked purposes. My soul hates them, they are a trouble to me, a burthen, an encumbrance, I am perfectly sick of them, and weary to bear them. He is never weary of hearing the prayers of the upright, but soon weary of the costly sacrifices of the wicked; he hides his eyes from their prayers, as that which he has an aversion to and is angry at.

All this is to shew, 1st. That sin is very hateful to God; so hateful that it makes even men's prayers, and their religious services, hateful to him. 2nd. That dissembled piety is double iniquity. Hypocrisy in religion is of all things most abominable to the God of heaven. Jerome applies it to the Jews in Christ's time, who pretended a great zeal for the law and the temple, but made themselves and all their services abominable to God, by filling their hands with the blood of Christ and his apostles, and so filling up the measure of their iniquities.

16 Wash you, make you clean;
Put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes;
17 Cease to do evil; learn to do well:
Seek judgment, relieve the oppressed,
Judge the fatherless, plead for the widow.
18 Come now, and let us reason together, saith the LORD:
Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow;
Though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.
19 If ye be willing and obedient,
Ye shall eat the good of the land:
20 But if ye refuse and rebel,
Ye shall be devoured with the sword:
For the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.

Though God hath rejected their services as insufficient to atone for their sins, while they persisted in them, yet he doth not reject them as in a hopeless condition; but here calls upon them to forsake their sins, which hindered the acceptance of their services, and then all would be well. Let them not say, God picked quarrels with them; no, he proposeth a method of reconciliation. Observe here,

First. A call to repentance and reformation. If you would have your sacrifices accepted, and your prayers answered, you must begin your work at the right end; 'Be converted to my law,' so the Chaldee begins this exhortation. Make conscience of second-table duties, else expect not to be accepted in the acts of devotion. As justice and charity will never atone for atheism and profaneness, so prayers and sacrifices will never atone for fraud and oppression; for righteousness towards men is as much a branch of pure religion as religion towards God is a branch of universal righteousness.

1. They must "cease to do evil;" must do no more wrong, shed no more innocent blood; that is the meaning of washing them, and making them clean, ver. 16; it is not only sorrowing for the sin they had committed, but breaking off the practice of it for the future, and mortifying all those vicious affections and dispositions which inclined them to it. Sin is defiling to the soul; our business is to wash us from it by repenting of it, and turning from it to God. We must put away not only that evil of our doings which is before the eye of the world, by refraining from the gross acts of sin, but that which is before God's eyes, the roots and habits of sin that are in our hearts; those must be crushed and mortified.

2. They must "learn to do well." This was necessary to the completing of their repentance. Note, It is not enough that we "cease to do evil," but we must "learn to do well." 1st. We must be doing; not cease to do evil, and then stand idle. 2nd. We must be doing good; the good which the Lord our God requires, and which will turn to a good account. 3rd. We must do it well, in a right manner, and for a right end; and, 4th. We must learn to do well, we must take pains to get the knowledge of our duty, be inquisitive concerning it, in care about it; and accustom ourselves to it, that we may readily turn our hands to our work, and become masters of this holy art of doing well.

He urgeth them particularly to those instances of well-doing wherein they had been defective. To second-table duties: "Seek judgment;" inquire what is right, that ye may do it; be solicitous to be found in the way of your duty, and do not walk at all adventures; seek oportunities of doing good, "relieve the oppressed," those whom you yourselves have oppressed, ease them of their burthens, ch. lviii. 6. You that have power in your hands use it for the relief of those whom others do oppress, for that is your business; right those that suffer wrong, in a special manner concern yourselves for the fatherless and the widow, whom, because they are weak and helpless, proud men trample upon and abuse. Do you appear for them at the bar, on the bench, as there is occasion; speak for those that know not how to speak for themselves, and that have not wherewithal to gratify you for your kindness. Note, We are truly honouring God when we are doing good in the world; and acts of justice and charity are more pleasing to him than all burnt offerings and sacrifices.

Secondly. A demonstration at the bar of right reason, of the equity of God's proceedings with them; "Come now, and let us reason together," ver. 18. While your hands are full of blood, I will have nothing to do with you, though you bring me a multitude of sacrifices; but, if you "wash you and make you clean," you are welcome to draw nigh to me; come now, and let us talk the matter over. Note, Those, and those only, that break off their league with sin, shall be welcome into covenant and communion with God; he saith, Come now, who before forbade them his courts: see Jas. iv. 8. Or rather thus, there were those among them who looked upon themselves as affronted by the slights God put on the multitude of their sacrifices, as ch. lviii. 3, "Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?" they represented God as a hard Master, whom it was impossible to please. Come, saith God, let us debate the matter fairly, and I doubt not but to make it out, that "my ways are equal, but yours are unequal," Eze. xviii. 25. Note, 1. Religion hath reason on its side; there is all the reason in the world that we should do as God would have us do. 2. The God of heaven condescends to reason the case with those that contradict him, and find fault with his proceedings; for he will be justified when he speaks, Ps. li. 4. The case needs only to be stated, (as it is here very fairly,) and it will determine itself. God shews here upon what terms they stood, as he doth, Eze. xviii. 21, 24; xxxiii. 18, 19; and then leaves it to them to judge whether they were not fair.

1. They cannot in reason expect any more than that, if they repent and reform, they should be restored to God's favour, notwithstanding their former provocations. Why, this you may expect, saith God. And it is very kind, who could have the face to desire it upon any other terms? 1st. It is very little that is required, only that you "be willing and obedient," that you 'consent to obey,' so i. 16. After what has been said, no intelligent Jew could understand the precept to "wash" of merely ceremonial washing or baptism, for the washing of blood-stained hands only made a man clean, not innocent, even in men's eyes, still less before God. To anticipate the folly which leads men to trust in rites and ceremonies, the works of righteousness are enumerated.

i. 18. Much has been made of the Hebrew word for scarlet, which has been thought to mean double dyed, but it more probably signifies the brilliancy of the colour. The real reason for the comparison is perhaps that red is the colour of blood, the shedding of which is the greatest crime among men. Similarly, wool and snow are the emblems of purity, because of their whiteness.

i. 22. "Dross" is the refuse of melted metal, but here a base metal or alloy may be meant. The word for "mixed" is explained "cut" or "divided," hence weakened or adulterated, and not pure and genuine. The idea is that the chief men are corrupt.

some read it; that you subject your wills to the will of God, acquiesce in that, and give up yourselves in all things to be ruled by him that is infinitely wise and good. Here is no penance imposed for their former stubbornness, nor the yoke made heavier, or bound harder on their necks; only, whereas hitherto you have been perverse and refractory, and would not comply with that which was for your own good, now be tractable, be governable. He doth not say, If you be perfectly obedient, but willingly so; for if there be a willing mind it is accepted. 2nd That is very great that is promised hereupon. First. That all their sins should be pardoned to them, and should not be mentioned against them. Though they be red as scarlet and crimson, that is, though you lie under the guilt of blood, yet, upon your repentance, even that shall be forgiven you, and you shall appear in the sight of God as white as snow. Note, The greatest sinners, if they truly repent, shall have their sins forgiven them, and so have their consciences pacified and purified. Though our sins have been as scarlet and crimson, a deep dye, a double dye, first in the wool of original corruption, and afterwards in the many threads of actual transgression, though we have been often dipped, by our many backslidings into sin, and though we have lain long soaking in it, as the cloth doth in the scarlet dye, yet pardoning mercy will thoroughly discharge the stain, and being by it purged as with hyssop, we shall be clean, Ps. li. 7. If we make it clean by repentance and reformation, ver. 16, God will make us white by a full remission. Secondly. That they should have all the happiness and comfort they could desire: "Be but willing and obedient, and ye shall eat the good of the land," the land of promise; you shall have all the blessings of the new covenant, of the heavenly Canaan, all the good of that land. They that go on in sin, though they dwell in a good land, cannot with any comfort eat the good of it, guilt embitters all; but if sin be pardoned, creature-comforts become comforts indeed.

2. They cannot in reason expect any other than that, if they continue obstinate in their disobedience, they should be abandoned to ruin; and the sentence of the law should be executed upon them. What can be more just? ver. 20, "If ye refuse and rebel," if you continue to rebel against the Divine government, and refuse the offers of Divine grace, "ye shall be devoured with the sword;" with the sword of your enemies, which shall be commissioned to destroy you; with the sword of God's justice, his wrath and vengeance, which shall be drawn against you; for this is that which "the mouth of the Lord hath spoken," and which he will make good for the maintaining of his own honour. Note, Those that will not be governed by God's sceptre will certainly and justly be devoured by his sword.

And now life and death, good and evil, are thus set before you; "Come, and let us reason together." What have you to object against the equity of this? or against complying with God's terms?

21 How is the faithful city become an harlot!
It was full of judgment;
Righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers.
22 Thy silver is become dross,
Thy wine mixed with water:
23 Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves:
Every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards:
They judge not the fatherless,
Neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them.
24 Therefore saith the Lord,
The LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel,
Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries,
And avenge me of mine enemies:
25 And I will turn my hand upon thee,
And purely purge away thy dross,
And take away all thy tin:
26 And I will restore thy judges as at the first,
And thy counsellors as at the beginning:
Afterward thou shalt be called,
The city of righteousness, the faithful city.
27 Zion shall be redeemed with judgment,
And her converts with righteousness.
28 And the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together,
And they that forsake the LORD shall be consumed.

ORIENTAL OAK.

29 For they shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired,
And ye shall be confounded for the gardens that ye have chosen 30 For ye shall be as an oak whose leaf fadeth,
And as a garden that hath no water
31 And the strong shall be as tow,
And the maker of it as a spark,
And they shall both burn together,
And none shall quench them.

Here, First. The woful degeneracy of Judah and Jerusalem is sadly lamented. See, 1. What the royal city had been. A faithful city, faithful to God, and the interests of his kingdom among men, faithful to the nation, and the public interests of that; "it was full of judgment," justice was duly administered upon the thrones of judgment which were set there, the thrones of the house of David, Ps. cxxii. 5. Men were generally honest in their dealings, and abhorred to do an unjust thing; "Righteousness lodged in it," was constantly resident in their palaces, and in all their dwellings; not called in now and then to serve a turn, but at home there. Note, Neither holy cities nor royal ones, neither places where religion is professed nor places where government is administered, are faithful to their trust, if religion do not dwell in them. 2. What it was now become. That beauteous, virtuous spouse was now debauched, and become an adulteress. Righteousness no longer dwelt in Jerusalem, (terras Astræa reliquit,—'Astræa left the earth,') even murderers were unpunished, and lived undisturbed there. Nay, the princes themselves were so cruel and oppressive, that they were become no better than murderers. An innocent man might better guard himself against a troop of banditti or assassins than against a bench of such judges. Note, It is a great aggravation of the wickedness of any family or people, that their ancestors were famed for virtue and probity; and commonly those that thus degenerate prove the most wicked of all other. Corruptio optimi est pessima.—'That which was originally the best becomes, when corrupted, the worst.' Lu. xi. 26; Eccl. iii. 16: see Jer. xxii. 15—17.

This is illustrated, 1st. By similitudes; ver. 22, "Thy silver is become dross." This degeneracy of the magistrates, whose character is the reverse of that of their predecessors, is as great a reproach and injury to the kingdom as the debasing of their coin would be, and the turning of their silver into dross. Righteous princes, and righteous cities, are as silver for the treasury; but unrighteous ones are as dross for the dunghill; "How is the gold become dim!" Lam. iv. 1; "Thy wine is mixed with water," and so is become flat and sour. Some understand both these literally; the wine they sold was adulterated, it was half water. The money they paid was counterfeit; and so they cheated all they dealt with. But it is rather to be taken figuratively; justice was perverted by their princes, and religion and the word of God sophisticated by their priests, and made to serve what turn they pleased. Dross may shine like silver, and the wine that is mixed with water may retain the colour of wine, but neither are worth any thing. Thus they retained a show and pretence of virtue and justice; but had no true sense of either. 2nd. By some instances; ver. 23, "Thy princes," that should keep others in their allegiance to God, and subjection to his law, "are" themselves "rebellious," and set God and his law at defiance. They that should restrain thieves, proud and rich oppressors, those worst of robbers, and those that designedly cheat their creditors, who are no better, they are themselves "companions of thieves," connive at them, do as they do, and with greater security and success, because they are princes, and have power in their hands. They share with the thieves they protect in their unlawful gain, Ps. l. 18; and cast in their lot among them, Pr. i. 13, 14. First. The profit of their places is all their aim; to make the best hand they can of them, right or wrong. They love gifts, and follow after rewards; they set their hearts upon their salary, the fees and perquisites of their offices, and are greedy of them, and never think they can get enough. Nay, they will do any thing, though never so contrary to law and justice, for a gift in secret. Presents and gratuities will blind their eyes at any time, and make them pervert judgment. These they love, and are eager in the pursuit of, Hos. iv. 18. Secondly. The duty of their places is none of their care. They ought to protect those that are injured, and take cognizance of the appeals made to them; why else were they preferred? but "they judge not the fatherless," take no care to guard the orphans, "nor doth the cause of the widow come unto them," because the poor widow has no bribe to give, with which to make way for her, and to bring her cause on. Those will have a great deal to answer for, who, when they should be the patrons of the oppressed, are their greatest oppressors.

Secondly. A resolution is taken up to redress these grievances; ver. 24, "Therefore, saith the Lord, the Lord of hosts, the Mighty One of Israel," who has power to make good what he saith, who hath hosts at command for the executing of his purposes, and whose power is engaged for his Israel, "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries." Observe, 1. Wicked people, especially wicked rulers that are cruel and oppressive, are God's enemies, his adversaries; and shall so be accounted of, and so dealt with. If the holy seed corrupt themselves, they are the foes of his own house. 2. They are a burthen to the God of heaven, which is implied in his easing himself of them. The Mighty One of Israel, that can bear any thing, nay, that upholds all things, complains of his being wearied with men's iniquities, ch. xliii. 24; Am. ii. 13. 3. God will find out time and way to ease himself of this burthen, by avenging himself on those that thus bear hard upon his patience. He here speaks as one triumphing in the foresight of it; "Ah, I will ease me." He will ease the earth of the burthen under which it groans, Rom. viii. 21, 22; will ease his own name of the reproaches with which it is loaded. He will be eased of his adversaries, by taking vengeance on his enemies, he will spew them out of his mouth, and so be eased of them, Rev. iii. 16. He speaks with pleasure of the day of vengeance being in his heart, ch. lxiii. 4. If God's professing people conform not to his image, as the Holy One of Israel, ver. 4, they shall feel the weight of his hand as the Mighty One of Israel. His power, that used to be engaged for them, shall be armed against them.

Two ways God will ease himself of this grievance:

1. By reforming his church, and restoring good judges in the room of those corrupt ones. Though the one hath a great deal of dross in it, yet it shall not be thrown away, but refined; ver. 25, "I will purely purge away thy dross," that is, will amend what is amiss. Vice and profaneness shall be suppressed, and put out of countenance; oppressors displaced, and deprived of their power to do mischief. When things are never so bad, God can set them to rights, and bring about a complete reformation; when he begins he will make an end,—will take away all the tin. Observe, 1st. The reformation of a people is God's own work; and if ever it be done it is he that brings it about. "I will turn my hand upon thee;" that is, will do that for the reviving of religion

i. 25. "Tin" here is said to mean an alloy of lead and silver; hence the removal of dross and tin is the removal of that which is base and impure.

i. 27. Instead of "her converts" the margin correctly reads, "they that return of her;" i.e., those who are brought back from captivity shall come back or be redeemed in righteousness. Opinions are divided as to whether literal or spiritual bondage is intended.

i. 29. Modern critics generally think that the trees here called "oaks" are terebinths, but the Greek and Syriac versions have "idols." Idolatrous groves would seem to be meant. Gardens were in a similar manner frequented for idolatrous practices. The difference of person, "they shall be ashamed," "ye have desired," may mean, "others shall be ashamed of your idolatries."

i. 31. "Tow" is untwisted hemp, which, wanting cohesion, is easily pulled asunder and burnt. Instead of "the maker of it" we which I did at first for the planting of it. He can do it easily, with the turn of his hand; but he doth it effectually, for what opposition can stand before the arm of the Lord revealed? 2nd. He doth it by blessing them with good magistrates, and good ministers of state; ver. 26, "I will restore thy judges as at the first," to put the laws in execution against evil-doers, "and thy counsellors" to transact public affairs, "as at the beginning;" either the same persons that had been turned out or others of the same character. 3rd. He doth it by restoring judgment and righteousness among them, ver. 27; by planting in men's minds principles of justice, and governing their lives by those principles. Men may do much by external restraints, but God doth it effectually by the influences of his Spirit, as a spirit of judgment, ch. iv. 4; and xxviii. 6: see Ps. lxxxv. 10, 11. 4th. The reformation of a people will be the redemption of them and their converts; for sin is the worst captivity, the worst slavery, and the great and eternal redemption is that by which Israel is redeemed from all his iniquities. Ps. cxxx. 8; and he the blessed Redeemer that turns away ungodliness from Jacob, Rom. xi. 26, and saves his people from their sins, Mat. i. 21. All the redeemed of the Lord shall be converts, and their conversion is their redemption; her converts, or, they that return of her; so the margin. God works deliverance for us, by preparing us for it with judgment and righteousness. 5th. The reviving of a people's virtue is the restoring of their honour; "Afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city;" that is, First. Thou shalt be so. The reforming of the magistracy is a good step towards the reforming of the city, and the country too. Secondly. Thou shalt have the praise of being so; and a greater praise there cannot be to any city than to be called a city of righteousness, and to retrieve the ancient honour which was lost when the faithful city became a harlot, ver. 21.

2. By cutting off those that hate to be reformed, that they may not remain either as snares or as scandals to the faithful city. 1st. It is an utter ruin that is here threatened. They shall be destroyed and consumed, and not chastened and corrected only. The extirpation of them will be necessary to the redemption of Zion. 2nd. It is a universal ruin, which will involve the transgressors and the sinners together; that is, the openly profane that have quite cast off all religion, and the hypocrites that live wicked lives under the cloak of a religious profession; they shall be both destroyed together, for they are both alike an abomination to God, both those that contradict religion and those that contradict themselves in their pretensions to it. And they that forsake the Lord, to whom they had formerly joined themselves, shall be consumed, as the water in the conduit pipe is soon consumed when it is cut off from the fountain. 3rd. It is an inevitable ruin; there is no escaping it. First. Their idols shall not be able to help them. The oaks that they have desired, and the gardens that they have chosen; that is, the images, the dunghill gods, which they have worshipped in their groves and under the green trees, which they were fond of, and wedded to; for which they forsook the true God, and which they worshipped privately in their own gardens, even then when idolatry was publicly discountenanced. This was the practice of the transgressors and the sinners; but they shall be ashamed of it, not with a show of repentance, but of despair, ver. 29. They shall have cause to be ashamed of them; for after all the court they have made to them they shall find no benefit by them, but the idols themselves shall go into captivity, Isa. xlvi. 1, 2. Note, They that make creatures their confidence are but preparing confusion for themselves. You were fond of the oaks and the gardens, but you yourselves shall be, 1st. Like an oak without leaves, withered and blasted, and stripped of all its ornaments. Justly do those wear no leaves that bear no fruit, as the fig-tree that Christ cursed. 2nd. Like a garden without water, that is neither rained upon nor watered with the foot, Deu. xi. 10, that has no fountain, Cant. iv. 15, and consequently is parched, and all the fruits of it gone to decay. Thus shall they be that trust in idols, or in an arm of flesh, Jer. xvii. 5, 6; but they that trust in God never find him as a wilderness, or as waters that fail, Jer. ii. 31. Secondly. They shall not be able to help themselves; ver. 31, "Even the strong man shall be as tow," not only soon broken and pulled to pieces, but easily catching fire; and his work, (so the margin reads it,) that by which he hopes to fortify and secure himself, shall be as a spark to his own tow, shall set him on fire, and he and his work shall burn together; his own counsels shall be his ruin; his own sin kindles the fire of God's wrath, which shall burn to the lowest hell, and none shall quench it. When the sinner has made himself as tow and stubble, and God makes himself to him as a consuming fire, what can prevent the utter ruin of the sinner?

Now all this is applicable, 1. To the blessed work of reformation which was wrought in Hezekiah's time, after the abominable corruptions of the reign of Ahaz. Then good men came to be preferred, and the faces of the wicked were filled with shame. 2. To their return out of their captivity in Babylon, which had thoroughly cured them of idolatry. 3. To the gospel kingdom, and the pouring out of the Spirit, by which the New Testament church should be made a New Jerusalem, a city of righteousness. 4. To the second coming of Christ, when he shall throughly purge his floor, his field; shall gather the wheat into his barn, into his garner, and burn the chaff, the tares, with unquenchable fire.

CHAPTER II.

With this chapter begins a new sermon, which is continued in the two following chapters. The subject of this discourse is Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 1. In this chapter the prophet speaks, I. Of the glory of the Christians' Jerusalem, the gospel church, in the latter days, in the accession of many to it, ver. 2, 3, and the great peace it should introduce into the world, ver. 4; whence he infers the duty of the house of Jacob, ver. 5. II. Of the shame of the Jews' Jerusalem, as it then was, and as it would be, after its rejecting of the Gospel, and being rejected of God. 1. Their sin was their shame, ver. 6—9. 2. God, by his judgments, would humble them, and put them to shame, ver. 10—17. 3. They should themselves be ashamed of their confidence in their idols, and in an arm of flesh, ver. 18—22. And now which of these Jerusalems will we be the inhabitants of? That which is full of the knowledge of God, which will be our everlasting honour; or that which is full of horses and chariots, and silver and gold, and such idols, which will in the end be our shame?

THE word that Isaiah the son of Amoz saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.

2 And it shall come to pass in the last days,
That the mountain of the LORD's house
Shall be established in the top of the mountains,
And shall be exalted above the hills;
And all nations shall flow unto it.

3 And many people shall go and say,
Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD,
To the house of the God of Jacob;
And he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths
For out of Zion shall go forth the law,
And the word of the LORD from Jerusalem

4 And he shall judge among the nations,
And shall rebuke many people:
And they shall beat their swords into plowshares,
And their spears into pruninghooks:
Nation shall not lift up sword against nation,
Neither shall they learn war any more.

5 O house of Jacob, come ye,
And let us walk in the light of the LORD

The particular title of this sermon, ver. 1, is the same with the general title of the book, ch. i. 1, only that what is there called the vision is here called the word which Isaiah saw, or the matter or thing which he saw, the truth of which he had as full an assurance of in his own mind as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes. Or, this word was brought to him in a vision; something he saw when he received this message from God. St. John turned to see the voice that spake with him, Rev. i. 12. This sermon begins with the prophecy relating to the last days, that is, the days of the Messiah, when his kingdom should be set up in the world at the latter end of the Mosaic economy. In the last days of the earthly Jerusalem, just before the destruction of it, this heavenly Jerusalem should be erected, Heb. xii. 22; Gal. iv. 26. Note, Gospel times are the last days; for, 1. They were long in coming, were a great while waited for by the Old Testament saints, and came at last. 2. We are not to look for any other dispensation of Divine grace, but what we have in the Gospel, Gal. i. 8, 9. 3. We are to look for the second coming of Jesus Christ at the end of time, as the Old Testament saints did for his first coming. This is the last time, 1 Jno. ii. 18. Now the prophet here foretells,

First. The setting up of the Christian church, and the planting of the Christian religion in the world. Christianity shall then be "the mountain of the Lord's house." Where that is professed, God will grant his presence, receive his people's homage, and grant instruction and blessing, as he did of old in the temple on mount Zion. The gospel church, incorporated by Christ's charter, shall then be the rendezvous of all the spiritual seed of Abraham. Now it is here promised, 1. That Christianity shall be openly preached and professed. It 'shall be prepared' (so the margin reads it) 'in the tops of the mountains,' in the view and hearing of all. Hence Christ's disciples are compared to a city on a hill, which cannot be hid, Mat. v. 14. They had many eyes upon them. Christ himself spake openly to the world, Jno. xviii. 20. What the apostles did was not done in a corner, Acts xxvi. 26. It was the lighting of a beacon, the setting up of a standard. Its being everywhere spoken against supposeth that it was everywhere spoken of. 2. That it shall be firmly fixed and rooted. It "shall be established on the top of the" everlasting "mountains," built upon a rock, so that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, unless they could pluck up mountains by the roots. He that dwells safely is said to dwell on high, Isa. xxxiii. 16; "The Lord has founded" the Gospel "Zion." 3. That it shall not only overcome all opposition, but overtop all competition; it shall be exalted above the hills. This wisdom of God in a mystery shall outshine all the wisdom of this world, all its philosophy, and all its politics. The spiritual worship which it shall introduce shall put down the idolatries of the heathen, and all other institutions in religion shall appear mean and despicable in comparison with this: see Ps. lxviii. 16, "Why leap ye, ye high hills? This is the hill which God desires to dwell in."

Secondly. The bringing in of the Gentiles into it. 1. The nations shall be admitted into it, even the uncircumcised, which were forbidden to come into the courts of the temple at Jerusalem; the partition wall which kept them out, kept them off, shall be taken down. 2. "All nations shall flow into it." Having liberty of access, they shall improve their liberty, and multitudes shall embrace the Christian faith. They shall flow into it, as streams of water, which notes the abundance of converts that the Gospel should make, and their speed and cheerfulness in coming into the church. They shall not be forced into it, but shall naturally flow into it. "Thy people shall be willing," all volunteers, Ps. cx. 3. To "Christ shall the gathering of the people be," Gen. xlix. 10: see Isa. lx. 4, 5.

Thirdly. The mutual assistance and encouragement which this confluence of converts shall give to one another. Their pious affections and resolutions shall be so intermixed as that they shall come in one full stream. As when the Jews from all parts of the country went up thrice a year to worship at Jerusalem, they called on their friends in the road, and excited them to go along with them; so shall many of the Gentiles court their relations, friends, and neighbours, to join with them in embracing the Christian religion; ver. 3, "Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord;" though it be uphill, and against heart, yet it is the mountain of the Lord, who will assist the ascent of our souls towards him. Note, Those that are entering into covenant and communion with God themselves should bring as many as they can along with them. It becomes Christians to provoke one another to good works, and to further the communion of saints, by inviting one another into it. Not, Do you go up to the mountain of the Lord, and pray for us, and we will stay at home; nor, We will go, and do you do as you will; but, Come and let us go, let us go in concert, that we may strengthen one another's hands, and support one another's reputation. Not, We will consider of it, and advise about it, and go hereafter; but, Come, and let us go forthwith, Ps. cxxii. 1. Many shall say this; those that have had it said to them shall say it to others. The gospel church is here called not only the mountain of the Lord, but the house of the God of Jacob; for in it God's covenant with Jacob and his praying seed is kept up and hath its accomplishment; for to us now, as unto them, he never said, "Seek ye me in vain," Isa. xlv. 19.

Now see here, 1. What they promise themselves in going up to the mountain of the Lord; there "he will teach us of his ways." Note, God's ways are to be learned in his church, in communion with his people, and in the use of instituted ordinances,—the ways of duty which he requires us to walk in, the ways of grace in which he walks towards us. It is God that teacheth his people by his word and Spirit. And it is worth while to take pains to go up to his holy mountain, to be taught his ways; and those who are willing to take that pains, shall never find it labour in vain. "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord." 2. What they promise for themselves and one another. If he will teach us his ways, we will walk in his paths; if he will let us know our duty, we will, by his grace, make conscience of doing it. And those who attend may translate "his work;" i.e., the work of the strong man, who will be consumed with his work.

ii. 1. The prophecy contained in this and the two following chapters forms one discourse. Dr. Lowth says, "It was probably delivered in the time of Jotham, or perhaps in that of Uzziah." Others, however, as Ewald, Gesenius, and Dr. Henderson, refer it to the reign of Ahaz.

2—4. It is worth observing that these verses also occur with little change in Micah iv. 1—3. Dr. Alexander on this says, "To explain which, some suppose that a motto or quotation has been accidentally transferred from the margin to the text of Isaiah; others, that both prophets quote from Joel; others, that both quote from an older writer, now unknown; others, that Micah quotes from Isaiah; others, that Isaiah quotes from Micah. This diversity of judgment may, at least, suffice to show how vain conjecture is in such a case." The question is really rather curious than important, for, as the author

God's word with this humble resolution, shall not be sent away without their lesson.

Fourthly. The means by which this shall be brought about. "Out of Zion shall go forth the law," the New Testament law, the law of Christ, as of old the law of Moses from mount Sinai; even "the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." The Gospel is a law, a law of faith; it is the word of the Lord; it went forth from Zion, where the temple was built, and from Jerusalem. Christ himself began in Galilee, Mat. iv. 23; Lu. xxiii. 5; but when he commissioned his apostles to preach the Gospel to all nations, he appointed them to begin at Jerusalem, Lu. xxiv. 47: see Rom. xv. 19. Though most of them had their home in Galilee, yet they must stay at Jerusalem, there to receive the promise of the Spirit, Acts i. 4; and in the temple, on mount Zion, they preached the Gospel, Acts v. 20. This honour was allowed to Jerusalem, even after Christ was crucified there, for the sake of what it had been. And it was by this Gospel, which took rise from Jerusalem, that the gospel church was established on the top of the mountains. This was the rod of Divine strength that was sent forth out of Zion, Ps. cx. 2.

Fifthly. The erecting of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world; "He shall judge among the nations." He whose word goes forth out of Zion shall by that word not only subdue souls to himself, but rule in them, ver. 4. He shall in wisdom and justice order and overrule the affairs of the world, for the good of his church; and rebuke and restrain those that oppose his interest. By his Spirit working on men's consciences he shall judge and rebuke, shall try men, and check them. His kingdom is spiritual, and not of this world.

Sixthly. The great peace which should be the effect of the success of the Gospel in the world; ver. 4, "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares;" their instruments of war shall be converted into implements of husbandry; as on the contrary, when war is proclaimed, ploughshares are beaten into swords, Joel iii. 10. "Nation shall then not lift up sword against nation," as now they do, "neither shall they learn war any more," for they shall have no more occasion for it. This doth not make all war absolutely unlawful among Christians, nor is it a prophecy that in the days of the Messiah there shall be no wars. The Jews urge this against Christians, as an argument that Jesus is not the Messiah, because this promise is not fulfilled. But, 1. It was in part fulfilled in the peaceableness of the time in which Christ was born, when wars were in a great measure ceased; witness the taxing, Lu. ii. 1. 2. The design and tendency of the Gospel is to make peace, and to slay all enmities. It has in it the most powerful obligations and inducements to peace; so that one might reasonably have expected it should have had this effect; and it would have had it if it had not been for those lusts of men from which come wars and fightings. 3. Jews and Gentiles were reconciled and brought together by the Gospel, and there were no more such wars between them as had been; for they became one sheepfold under one shepherd, Eph. ii. 15. 4. The Gospel of Christ, as far as it prevails, disposeth men to be peaceable, softens men's spirits, and sweetens them; and the love of Christ shed abroad in the heart constrains men to love one another. 5. The primitive Christians were famous for brotherly love; their very adversaries took notice of it. 6. We have reason to hope that this promise shall yet have a more full accomplishment in the latter times of the Christian church, when the Spirit shall be poured out more plentifully from on high. Then there shall be on earth peace. "Who shall live when God doth this?" But do it he will in due time, for he is not a man that he should lie.

Lastly. Here is a practical inference drawn from all this; ver. 5, "O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." By the house of Jacob is meant either, 1. Israel, according to the flesh. Let them be provoked by this to a holy emulation, Rom. xi. 14. Seeing the Gentiles are thus ready and resolved for God, thus forward to go up to the house of the Lord, let us stir up ourselves to go too. Let it never be said that the sinners of the Gentiles were better friends to the holy mountain than the house of Jacob. Thus the zeal of some should provoke many. Or, 2. Spiritual Israel; all that are brought to the God of Jacob. Shall there be such great knowledge in gospel times? ver. 3, and such great peace? ver. 4, and shall we share in these privileges? Come, then, and let us live accordingly. Whatever others do, "Come, O come! let us walk in the light of the Lord." 1st. Let us walk circumspectly in the light of this knowledge. Will God teach us his ways? Will he shew us his glory in the face of Christ? Let us then "walk as the children of the light and of the day," Eph. v. 8; 1 Thes. v. 8; Rom. xiii. 12. 2nd. Let us walk comfortably in the light of this peace. Shall there be no more war? Let us then go on our way rejoicing, and let this joy terminate in God, and be our strength, Neh. viii. 10; walk in the beams of the Sun of righteousness.

6 Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people the house of Jacob,
Because they be replenished from the east,
And are soothsayers like the Philistines,
And they please themselves in the children of strangers
7 Their land also is full of silver and gold,
Neither is there any end of their treasures;
Their land is also full of horses,
Neither is there any end of their chariots:
8 Their land also is full of idols;
They worship the work of their own hands,
That which their own fingers have made:
9 And the mean man boweth down,
And the great man humbleth himself:
Therefore forgive them not.

The calling in of the Gentiles was accompanied with the rejection of the Jews. It was their fall, and the diminishing of them, that was the riches of the Gentiles, and the casting off of them that was the reconciling of the world, Rom. xi. 12—15; and it should seem that these verses have reference to that, and are designed to justify God therein. And yet it is probable, they are primarily intended for the convincing and awakening of the men of that generation in which the prophet lived; it being usual with the prophets to speak of the things that then were, both in mercy and judgment, as types of the things that should be hereafter. Here is,

First. Israel's doom. This is set forth in two words, the first and the last of this paragraph, but they are two dreadful words, and which speak, 1. Their case sad, very sad; ver. 6, "Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people." Miserable is the condition of that people whom God hath forsaken, and great certainly must the provocation be if he forsake those that have been his own people. This was the deplorable case of the Jewish church after they had rejected Christ. Migremus hinc,—'Let us go hence;" "Your house is left unto you desolate," Mat. xxii. 38. Whenever any sore calamity came upon the Jews, thus far the Lord might be said to forsake them, that he withdrew his help and succour from them, else they had not fallen into the hands of their enemies: but God never leaves any till they first leave him. 2. Their case desperate, wholly desperate; ver. 9, "therefore forgive them not." This prophetical prayer amounts to a threatening, that they should not be forgiven, and so some think it may be read; 'and thou wilt not forgive them.' This refers not to particular persons, many of whom repented and were pardoned, but to the body of that nation, against whom an irreversible doom was passed, that they should be wholly cut off, and their church quite dismantled, never to be formed into such a body again, nor ever to have their old charter restored to them.

Secondly. Israel's desert of this doom, and the reasons upon which it is grounded. And in general it is sin; that is it, and nothing but that, which provokes God to forsake his people. The particular sins he instanceth in are such as abounded among them at that time, which he makes mention of for the conviction of those to whom he then preached, rather than that which afterwards proved the measure-filling sin, their crucifying Christ, and persecuting his followers; for the sins of every age contributed towards the making up of the dreadful account at last. And there was a partial and temporary rejection of them by the captivity in Babylon hasting on, which was a type of their final destruction by the Romans, and which the sins here mentioned brought upon them. Their sins were such as directly contradicted all God's kind and gracious designs concerning them.

1. God set them apart for himself, as a peculiar people, distinguished from, and dignified above, all other people, Num. xxiii. 9. But they were "replenished from the east;" they naturalized foreigners, not proselyted, and encouraged them to settle among them, and mingle with them, Hos. vii. 8. Their country was peopled with Syrians and Chaldeans, Moabites and Ammonites, and other Eastern nations; and with them they admitted the fashions and customs of those nations, "and pleased themselves in the children of strangers;" were fond of them, preferred their country before their own, and thought that the more they conformed to them the more polite and refined they were; thus did they profane their crown and their covenant. Note, Those are in danger of being estranged from God who please themselves with those that are strangers to him; for we soon learn the ways of those whose company we love.

2. God gave them his oracles, which they might ask counsel of; not only the Scriptures, and the seers, but the breastplate of judgment. But they slighted these, and became "soothsayers like the Philistines;" introduced their art of divination, and hearkened to those who, by the stars, or the clouds, or the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts, or other magic superstitions, pretended to discover things secret, or foretell things to come; the Philistines were noted for diviners, 1 Sam. vi. 2. Note, Those that slight true divinity are justly given up to lying divinations; and they will certainly be forsaken of God, who thus forsake him and their own mercies for lying vanities.

3. God encouraged them to put their confidence in him, and assured them that he would be their wealth and strength. But, distrusting his power and promise, they made gold their hope, and furnished themselves with horses and chariots, and relied upon them for their safety, ver. 7. God had expressly forbidden even their kings to multiply horses to themselves, and greatly to multiply silver and gold, because he would have them to depend upon himself only. But they did not think their interest in God made them a match for their neighbours unless they had as full treasures of silver and gold, and as formidable hosts of chariots and horses, as they had. It is not having silver and gold, horses and chariots, that is a provocation to God; but, 1st. Desiring them insatiably, so that there is no end of the treasures, no end of the chariots, no bounds or limits set to the desire of them. Those shall never have enough in God, who alone is all-sufficient, that never know when they have enough of this world, which at the best is insufficient. 2nd. Depending upon them, as if we could not be safe, and easy, and happy, without them, and could not but be so with them.

4. God himself was their God, the sole object of their worship, and he himself instituted ordinances of worship for them. But they slighted both him and his institutions, ver. 8; their land was full of idols; every city had its god, Jer. xi. 13; and according to the goodness of their lands they made goodly images, Hos. x. 1. They that think one God too little will find two too many, and yet hundreds not enough; for they that love idols will multiply them. So sottish were they, and so wretchedly infatuated, that they worshipped the work of their own hands, as if that could be a God to them which was not only a creature, but their creature, and that which their own fancies had devised, and their own fingers had made. It was an aggravation of their idolatry that God had enriched them with silver and gold, and yet of that silver and gold they made idols; so it was, "Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked," Hos. ii. 8.

5. God had advanced them, and put honour upon them, but they basely diminished and disparaged themselves; ver. 9, "The mean man boweth down" to his idol; a thing below the meanest, that have any spark of reason left them. Sin is a disparagement to the poorest, and those of the lowest rank. It becomes the mean man to bow down to his superiors, but it ill becomes him to bow down to the stock of a tree, Isa. xliv. 19. Nor is it only the illiterate and poor-spirited that do this, but even "the great man" forgets his grandeur, and "humbleth himself" to worship idols, deified men no better than himself, and consecrated stones so much baser than himself. Idolaters are said to debase themselves even to hell, Isa. lvii. 9. What a shame is it that great men think the service of the true God below them, and will not stoop to it, and yet will humble themselves to bow down to an idol! Some make this a threatening, that the mean men shall be brought down, and the great men humbled, by the judgments of God, when they come with commission.

10 Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust,
For fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty
11 The lofty looks of man shall be humbled,
And the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down,
And the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day.
12 For the day of the LORD of hosts shall be Upon every one that is proud and lofty,
And upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low: [lifted up.
13 And upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and
And upon all the oaks of Bashan,
14 And upon all the high mountains,
And upon all the hills that are lifted up, just cited says, "So long as we have reason to regard both places as authentic and inspired, it matters little what is the literary history of either." In verse 2 "all nations" certainly refers to the Gentiles, and is literally "all the nations." In verse 3 "many people" should be rendered "many peoples," the allusion being still to the Gentiles. The same remark applies to "many people" in verse 4.

ii. 6. Barnes here has "for" in the place of "therefore," and correctly so. The words rendered "replenished from the east" have been translated in many ways, and they are ambiguous. We might read, "they are full of the east," i.e., of the east wind, or of delusion. (Compare Job xv. 2.) The more usual view, however, is that Isaiah refers to the introduction of Eastern superstitions and other vanities. The phrase "they please themselves in" rather means "they form compacts with" foreigners, to their great risk and hurt, as the following verses are designed to prove. Worldly wealth is not the best possession, especially when it turns the heart from God.

15 And upon every high tower,
And upon every fenced wall,
16 And upon all the ships of Tarshish,
And upon all pleasant pictures.
17 And the loftiness of man shall be bowed down,
And the haughtiness of men shall be made low:
And the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day.
18 And the idols he shall utterly abolish.
19 And they shall go into the holes of the rocks,
And into the caves of the earth,
For fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty,
When he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.
20 In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold,
Which they made each one for himself to worship,
To the moles and to the bats;
21 To go into the clefts of the rocks,
And into the tops of the ragged rocks,
For fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty,
When he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.
22 Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils:
For wherein is he to be accounted of?

The prophet here goes on to shew what desolations would be brought upon their land, when God had forsaken them, which may refer particularly to their destruction by the Chaldeans first, and afterwards by the Romans; or may have a general respect to the method God takes to awaken and humble proud sinners, and to put them out of conceit with that which they delighted in, and depended on more than God. We are here told, that sooner or later God will find out a way,

First. To startle and awaken secure sinners, that cry peace to themselves, and bid defiance to God and his judgments; ver. 10, "Enter into the rock," that is, God will attack you with such terrible judgments, and strike you with such terrible apprehensions of them, that you shall be forced to "enter into the rock, and hide you in the dust, for fear of the Lord." You shall lose all your courage, and tremble at the shaking of a leaf; your hearts shall fail you for fear, Lu. xxi. 26; and you shall flee when none pursues, Pr. xxviii. 1. To the same purpose, ver. 19, they shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth,—the darkest, the deepest places. They shall "call to the rocks and mountains to fall on them," and rather crush them than not cover them, Hos. x. 8. It was so, particularly at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, Lu. xxiii. 30, and of the persecuting pagan powers, Rev. vi. 16. And all "for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty," looking upon him then to be a consuming fire, and themselves as stubble before him, "when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth," to "shake the wicked out of it," Job xxxviii. 13, and to shake those earthly props and supports which they have buoyed themselves up with, to shake them from under them. Note, 1. With God is terrible majesty, and the glory of it is such as sooner or later will oblige us all to flee before him. 2. Those that will not fear God, and flee to him, will be forced to fear him, and flee from him to a refuge of lies. 3. It is a folly for those that are pursued by the wrath of God to think to escape it, and to hide or shelter themselves from it. 4. The things of the earth are things that will be shaken; they are subject to concussions, and hastening towards a dissolution. 5. The shaking of the earth is, and will be, a terrible thing to those who set their affections wholly on things of the earth. 6. It will be in vain to think of finding refuge in the caves of the earth, when the earth itself is shaken; there will be no shelter then but in God, and in things above.

Secondly. To humble and abase proud sinners, that look big, and think highly of themselves, and scornfully of all about them; ver. 11, "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled," the eyes that aimed high, the countenance in which the pride of the heart shewed itself, these shall be cast down in shame and despair. "And the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down," their spirits shall be broken, and they shall be crest-fallen, and those things which they were proud of they shall be ashamed of. It is repeated again, ver. 17, "The loftiness of men shall be bowed down." Note, Pride will, one way or other, have a fall. Men's haughtiness will be brought down, either by the grace of God convincing them of the evil of their pride, and clothing them with humility, or by the providence of God depriving them of all those things they were proud of, and laying them low. Our Saviour often laid it down for a maxim that, "He that exalteth himself shall be abased;" he shall either abase himself in true repentance, or God will abase him, and pour contempt upon him. Now here we are told,

1. Why this shall be done. Because "The Lord alone will be exalted." Note, Therefore proud men shall be vilified, because the Lord alone will be magnified. It is for the honour of God's power to humble the proud; by this he proves himself to be God, and disproves Job's pretensions to rival with him; Job xl. 11—14, "Behold every one that is proud, and abase him, then will I also confess unto thee." It is likewise for the honour of his justice. Proud men stand in competition with God, who is jealous for his own glory, and will not suffer men either to take that to themselves or give it to another which is due to him only. They likewise stand in opposition to God; they resist him, and therefore he resists them; for he will be exalted among the heathen, Ps. xlvi. 10; and there is a day coming in which he alone will be exalted, when he shall have put down all opposing rule, principality, and power, 1 Cor. xv. 24.

2. How this shall be done. By humbling judgments, that shall mortify men, and bring them down; ver. 12, "The day of the Lord of hosts," the day of his wrath and judgment, "shall be upon every one that is proud," and therefore he now laughs at their insolence, "because he sees that his day is coming;" this day which will be upon them ere they are aware, Ps. xxxvii. 13. This day of the Lord is here said to be upon "all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up." Jerome observes, that the cedars are said to praise God, Ps. cxlviii. 9, and are trees of the Lord, Ps. civ. 16, of his planting, Isa. xl. 19, and yet here God's wrath fastens upon the cedars, which notes, saith he, that some of every rank of men, some great men, will be saved, and some perish. It is brought in as an instance of the strength of God's voice, that it breaks the cedars, Ps. xxix. 5; and here the day of the Lord is said to be upon the cedars, those of Lebanon, that were the straightest and stateliest; upon the oaks, those of Bashan, that were the strongest and sturdiest; and, ver. 14, upon the natural elevations and fortresses, the high mountains, and the hills that are lifted up, that overtop the valleys, and seem to push the skies; and, ver. 15, upon the artificial fastnesses, every high tower, and every fenced wall. Understand these,

1st. As representing the proud people themselves, that are like the cedars and the oaks in their own apprehension, firmly rooted, and not to be stirred by any storm, and looking on all around them as shrubs. These are the high mountains and the lofty hills that seem to fill the earth, that are gazed on by all, and think themselves immovable, but lie most obnoxious to God's thunder strokes; feriuntque summos fulmina montes,—'the highest hills are the most exposed to lightning.' And before the power of God's wrath these mountains are scattered, and these hills bow, and melt like wax, Hab. iii. 6; Ps. lxviii. 8. These topping men, that are as high towers in which the noisy bells are hung, on which the thundering, murdering cannon are planted,—these fenced walls, that fortify themselves with their native hardiness, and entrench themselves in their fastnesses,—they shall be brought down.

2nd. As particularizing the things they are proud of, in which they trust, and of which they make their boasts. The day of the Lord shall be upon those very things which they put their confidence in, as their strength and security. He will "take from them all their armour wherein they trusted." Did the inhabitants of Lebanon glory in their cedars, and those of Bashan in their oaks, such as no country could shew the like? the day of the Lord should rend those cedars, those oaks, and the houses built of them. Did Jerusalem glory in the mountains that were round about it, as its impregnable fortifications, or in its walls and bulwarks? These should be levelled and laid low in the day of the Lord. Besides those things that were for their strength and safety, they were proud, First. Of their trade abroad. But the day of the Lord shall be "upon all the ships of Tarshish;" they shall be broken, as Jehoshaphat's were, shall founder at sea, or be shipwrecked in the harbour; Zebulun was a haven of ships, but should now no more rejoice in his going out. When God is bringing ruin upon a people, he can sink all the branches of their revenue. Secondly Of their ornaments at home. But the day of the Lord shall be "upon all pleasant pictures," the painting of their ships, so some understand it, or the curious pieces of painting they brought home in their ships from other countries, perhaps from Greece, which afterwards was famous for painters. 'Upon every thing that is beautiful to behold,'—so some read it. Perhaps they were the pictures of their relations, and for that reason pleasant, or their gods, which to the idolaters were delectable things, or they admired them for the fineness of the colours, or strokes. There is no harm in making pictures, or in adorning our rooms with them, provided they transgress not either the second or the seventh commandment; but to place our pictures among our pleasant things, to be fond of them, and proud of them, to spend that upon them that should be laid out in charity, and to set our hearts upon them, as it ill becomes those that have so many substantial things to take pleasure in, so it is a provocation to God to strip us of all such vain ornaments.

Thirdly. To make idolaters ashamed of their idols, and of all the affection they have had for them, and the respect they have paid to them; ver. 18, "The idols he shall utterly abolish." When the Lord alone shall be exalted, ver. 17, he will not only pour contempt upon proud men, that, like Pharaoh, exalt themselves against him, but much more upon all pretended deities, that are rivals with him for Divine honours. They shall be abolished, utterly abolished, their friends shall desert them, their enemies shall destroy them, so that one way or other an utter riddance shall be made of them. See here, 1. The vanity of false gods. They cannot secure themselves, so far are they from being able to secure their worshippers. 2. The victory of the true God over them; for great is the truth, and will prevail. Dagon fell before the ark, and Baal before the Lord God of Elijah. The gods of the heathen shall be famished, Zeph. ii. 11, and by degrees shall perish, Jer. x. 11. The rightful sovereign will triumph over all pretenders.

And as God will abolish idols, so their worshippers shall abandon them, either from a gracious conviction of their vanity and falsehood, as Ephraim when he said, "What have I to do any more with idols?" or from a late and sad experience of their inability to help them, and a woful despair of relief by them, ver. 20. When men are themselves frightened by the judgments of God into "the holes of the rocks, and the caves of the earth," and find that they do thus in vain shift for their own safety, they shall "cast their idols," which they had made their gods, and hoped to make their friends in the time of need, "to the moles and to the bats," any whither out of sight, that, being freed from the incumbrance of them, they may "go into the clefts of the rocks, for fear of the Lord," ver. 21. Note, 1st. Those that will not be reasoned out of their sins, sooner or later shall be frightened out of them. 2nd. God can make men sick of those idols that they have been most fond of, even the idols of silver and the idols of gold, the most precious. Covetous men make silver and gold their idols, money their god; but the time may come when they may feel it as much their burthen as ever they made it their confidence, and may find themselves as much exposed by it as ever they hoped they should be guarded by it, when it tempts their enemy, sinks their ship, or retards their flight. There was a time when the mariners threw the wares, and even the wheat, into the sea, Jonah i. 5; Acts xxvii. 38, and the Syrians cast away their garments for haste, 2 Kin. vii. 15. Or, men may cast it away out of an indignation at themselves for leaning upon such a broken reed: see Eze. vii. 19. The idolaters here throw away their idols, because they are ashamed of them, and of their own folly in trusting to them; or because they are afraid of having them found in their possession when the judgments of God are abroad; as the thief throws away his stolen goods when he is searched for or pursued. 3rd. The darkest holes, where the moles and the bats lodge, are the fittest place for idols that have eyes and see not; and God can force men to cast their own idols there, ch. xxx. 22, when they are "ashamed of the oaks which they have desired," ch. i. 29. "Moab shall be ashamed of Chemosh, as the house of Israel was ashamed of Bethel," Jer. xlviii. 13, 14. It is possible that sin may be both loathed and left, and yet not truly repented of, loathed because surfeited on, left because no opportunity of committing it; yet not repented of out of any love to God, but only from a slavish fear of his wrath.

Fourthly. To make those that have trusted in an arm of flesh ashamed of their confidence; ver. 22, "Cease ye from man." The providences of God concerning you shall speak this aloud to you, and therefore take warning beforehand, that you may prevent the uneasiness and shame of a disappointment. And consider, 1. How weak man is. "His breath is in his nostrils," puffed out every moment, soon gone for good and all. Man is a dying creature, and may die quickly; our nostrils, in which our breath is, are of the outward parts of body; what is there is like one standing at the door ready to depart. Nay, the doors of the nostrils are always open; the breath in them may slip away ere we are aware, in a moment: wherein then is man to be accounted of?

ii. 12. It is not uncommon in Scripture for the word "day" to mean judgment, or a day of judgment; and here "day of the Lord" may be explained "judgment of the Lord." In 1 Cor. iv. 3 the word "day" is actually translated "judgment" in our version. From this verse onward there is a poetical admixture of the literal with the figurative, the idea being that the Lord's judgments would descend upon the men, their wealth, their all.

ii. 15. A "fenced wall" is a "fortified wall."

ii. 16. "Ships of Tarshish" were merchant-ships, and the name seems to have been given to all vessels accustomed to take long voyages. The so-called "pleasant pictures" were probably costly and attractive ornaments.

ii. 20. The words "which they made each one for himself to worship" may mean, "which others made for him to worship." Furst and others think mice, and not moles, are referred to here. What is called a mole-rat is found in Syria, but no true

Alas, no reckoning is to be made of him! for he is not what he seems to be,—what he pretends to be, what we fancy him to be. Man is like to vanity, nay, he is vanity,—he is altogether vanity, he is less, he is lighter than vanity, when weighed in the balances of the sanctuary. 2. How wise therefore they are that cease from man; it is our duty, it is our interest, to do so. "Put not your trust in man," nor make even the greatest and mightiest of men your confidence; cease to do so. Let not your eye be to the power of man; for it is finite and limited, derived and depending; it is not from him that your judgment proceeds. Let not him be your fear, let not him be your hope, but look up to the power of God, to which all the powers of men are subject and subordinate; dread his wrath, secure his favour, take him for your help, and let your hope be in the Lord your God.

CHAPTER III.

The prophet in this chapter goes on to foretell the desolations that were coming upon Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, both that by the Babylonians and that which completed their ruin by the Romans, with some of the grounds of God's controversy with them. God threatens, I. To deprive them of all the supports both of their life and of their government, ver. 1—3. II. To leave them to fall into confusion and disorder, ver. 4, 5, 12. III. To deny them the blessing of magistracy, ver. 6—8. IV. To strip the daughters of Zion of their ornaments, ver. 17—24. V. To lay all waste by the sword of war, ver. 25, 26. The sins that provoked God to deal thus with them were, 1. Their defiance of God, ver. 8; 2. Their impudence, ver. 9; 3. The abuse of power to oppression and tyranny, ver. 12—15; 4. The pride of the daughters of Zion, ver. 16. And in the midst of the chapter the prophet is directed how to apply himself to particular persons, 1st. To assure good people that it should be well with them, notwithstanding those general calamities, ver. 10; 2nd. To assure wicked people that, however God might in judgment remember mercy, yet it should go ill with them, ver. 11. Oh that the nations of the earth at this day would hearken to the rebukes and warnings which this chapter gives!

The prophet, in the close of the foregoing chapter, had given a necessary caution to all, not to put confidence in man or any creature, and had given a general reason for that caution, taken from the frailty of human life, and the vanity and weakness of human powers. Here he gives a particular reason for it, because God was now about to ruin all their creature confidences, so that they should meet with nothing but disappointment in all their expectations from them; ver. 1. "The stay and the staff" shall be taken away; all their supports, of what kind soever, all the things they trusted to and looked for help and relief from. Their church and kingdom was now grown old, and going to decay, and it was, as old men used to be, Zec. viii. 4, leaning on a staff. Now God threatens to take away their staff, and then they must fall of course; to take away the stays both of the city and of the country, of Jerusalem and of Judah, which are indeed stays to one another, and if one fail the other fails from it. He that doth this is "the Lord, the Lord of hosts;" Adon, the Lord that is himself the stay, or foundation. If that stay depart, all other stays certainly break under us, for he is the strength of them all. He that is "the Lord," the ruler that has authority to do it, and "the Lord of hosts," that has ability to do it, he shall "take away the stay and the staff." St. Jerome refers this to the sensible decay of the Jewish nation, after they had crucified our Saviour, Rom. xi. 9, 10. I rather take it as a warning to all nations not to provoke God, for if they make him their enemy he can and will thus make them miserable. Let us view the particulars:

First. Was their plenty a support to them? It is so to any people; bread is the staff of life. But God can "take away the whole stay of bread, and the whole stay of water," and it is just with him to do so, when fulness of bread becomes an iniquity, Eze. xvi. 49, and that which was given to be provision for the life is made provision for the lusts. He can take away the bread and water, by withholding the rain, Deu. xxviii. 23, 24. Or, if he allow them he can take away the stay of bread and the stay of water, by withholding his blessing, by which man lives, and not by bread only, and which is the staff of bread, Mat. iv. 4; and then the bread is not nourishing, the water refreshing, Hag. i. 6. Christ is the bread of life and the water of life: if he be our stay, we shall find that this is a good part not to be taken away, Job vi. 27; ch. iv. 14.

Secondly. Was their army a support to them? their generals and commanders, and military men? These shall be taken away; either cut off by the sword, or so discouraged with the defeats they meet with, that they shall throw up their commissions, and resolve to act no more; or they shall be disabled by sickness, or dispirited, so as to be unfit for business: "the mighty man and the man of war," and even the inferior officer, "the captain of fifty," shall be removed. It bodes ill with a people when their valour is lost and their valiant men. Let not the strong man, therefore, glory in his strength, nor any people trust too much to their mighty men, but let the "strong people glorify God, and the city of the terrible nations fear him," who can make them weak and despicable, ch. xxv. 3.

Thirdly. Were their ministers of state a support to them? their learned men, their politicians, their clergy, their wits, and virtuosos? These also should be taken away; "the judges" that were skilled in the laws and expert in administering justice, and "the prophets," whom they used to consult in difficult cases; "the prudent," that were celebrated as men of sense and sagacity above others, and were assistants to the judges; 'the diviners,' (so the word is,) those that used unlawful arts, who, though rotten stays, yet were stayed on. But it may be taken, as we read it, in a good sense; the ancients, elders in age, in office, "the honourable man," the gravity of whose aspect commands reverence, and whose age and experience makes him fit to be a counsellor. Trade is one great support to a nation, even manufactures and handicraft trades; and therefore, when the whole stay is to be broken, "the cunning artificer" too shall be taken away. And the last is, "the eloquent orator, the man skilful of speech, who in some cases may do good service, though he be none of the prudent or the ancient, by putting others' sense in good language. Moses cannot speak well, but Aaron can. God threatens to take these away; that is, 1. To disable them for the service of their country, "making the judges fools, taking away the speech of the trusty, and the understanding of the aged," Job xii. 17, &c. Every creature is that to us that God makes it to be; and we cannot be sure that those who have been serviceable to us shall always be so. 2. To put an end to their days; for princes are therefore not to be trusted in, because their breath goeth forth, Ps. cxlvi. 3, 4. Note, The removal of useful men by death in the midst of their usefulness is a very threatening symptom to any people.

Fourthly. Was their government a support to them? It ought to be so; it is the business of the sovereign to bear up the pillars of the land, Ps. lxxv. 3. But it is here threatened that this stay should fail them; when the mighty men and the prudent are removed, children shall be their princes; children in age, that must be under tutors and governors, who will be clashing with one another, and making a prey of the young king and his kingdom; children in understanding and disposition, childish men, such as are babes in knowledge, no more fit to rule than a child in the cradle, yet shall rule over them, with all the folly, fickleness, and frowardness of a child. And "woe unto thee, O land, when thy king" is such a one, Eccl. x. 16.

Fifthly. Was the union of the subjects among themselves, their good order, and the good understanding and correspondence that they kept with one another, a stay to them? Where this is, a people may do the better, though their princes be not such as they should be. But it is here threatened that God would send an evil spirit among them too, as Jud. ix. 23, which would make them, 1. Injurious and unneighbourly one towards another; ver. 5, "The people shall be oppressed every one by his neighbour," and their princes, being children, take no care to restrain the oppressors or relieve the oppressed. Nor is it to any purpose to appeal to them, which is a temptation to every man to be his own avenger; and then they bite and devour one another, and will soon be consumed one of another. Then homo homini lupus,—'man becomes a wolf to man;' jusque datum sceleri,—'wickedness receives the stamp of law;' nec hospes ab hospite tutus,—'the guest and the host are in danger from each other.' 2. Insolent and disorderly towards their superiors. It is as ill an omen to a people as can be, when the rising generation among them is generally untractable, rude, and ungovernable, when "the child behaves himself proudly against the ancient;" whereas he should "rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man," Lev. xix. 32. When young people are conceited and pert, and carry it scornfully towards their superiors, it is not only a reproach to themselves, but of ill consequence to the public; it slackens the reins of government, and weakens the hands that hold them. It is likewise ill with a people when persons of honour cannot support their authority, but are affronted by the base and beggarly, when judges are insulted by the mob, and their power set at defiance. Those have a great deal to answer for that do this.

Sixthly. It is some stay, some support, to hope that though matters may now be ill managed, yet others may be raised up who may manage better. Yet this expectation also shall be frustrated, for the case shall be so desperate that no man of sense or substance will meddle with it.

1. The government shall go a begging. Here, 1st. It is taken for granted that there is no way of redressing all these grievances and bringing things into order again, but by good magistrates, that shall be invested with power by common consent, and shall exert that power for the good of the community. And it is probable this was in many places the true origin of government. Men found it necessary to unite in a subjection to one who was thought fit for such a trust, in order to the welfare and safety of them all, being aware that they must either be ruled or ruined. Here, therefore, is the original contract, "Be thou our ruler," and we will be subject to thee, "and let this ruin be under thy hand," to be repaired and restored, and then to be preserved and established, and the interests of it advanced, ch. lviii. 12. Take care to protect us by the sword of war from being injured from abroad, and by the sword of justice from being injurious to one another, and we will bear faith and true allegiance to thee. 2nd. The case is represented very deplorable, and things come to a sad pass; for, First. Children being their princes, every man will think himself fit to prescribe who shall be a magistrate, and will be for preferring his own relations; whereas, if the princes were as they should be, it would be left entirely to them to nominate the rulers, as it ought to be. Secondly. Men will find themselves under a necessity even of forcing power into the hands of those that are thought to be fit for it; a man shall take hold by violence of one to make him a ruler, perceiving him ready to overrun the motion. Nay, he shall urge it upon his brother; whereas, commonly, men are not willing that their equals should be their superiors; witness the envy of Joseph's brethren. Thirdly. It will be looked upon as ground sufficient for the preferring a man to be a ruler, that he hath clothing better than his neighbours; a very poor qualification to recommend a man to a place of trust in the government. It was a sign the country was much impoverished, when it was a rare thing to find a man that had good clothes, or that could afford to buy himself an alderman's gown or a judge's robes; and that the people were very unthinking, when they had so much respect to a man in gay clothing, with a gold ring, Jam. ii. 2, 3, that for the sake thereof they would make him their ruler. It had been some sense to have said, Thou hast wisdom, integrity, experience, be thou our ruler; but it was a jest to say, "Thou hast clothing, be mole occurs in Palestine. The group called rodents is represented by no fewer than twenty-three species in Palestine, and the Arabic name for them all is similar to one here thought to mean a single kind. There is no difficulty with regard to bats, which occur in countless numbers in the caves and ruins of the Holy Land.

ii. 22. This verse does not occur in the Greek.

iii. 1. Bread and water are called a staff or stay, because they are the chief support of life.

iii. 2. This verse might be rendered, "Hero and warrior, judge and prophet, diviner and elder."

iii. 3. "The eloquent orator" here is probably an expert enchanter.

iii. 7. The word rendered "swear" may mean only "declare," or lift up his voice. It is literally to "lift up." (Compare chap. xlii. 2.) The Greek and some modern authorities have "ruler" for "healer," but the idea may be that the speaker has no remedy for their grievances, and urges his friends not to appoint him their healer.

thou our ruler." A poor, wise man, though in vile raiment, delivered a city, Eccl. ix. 15. We may allude to this to shew how desperate the case of fallen man was, when our Lord Jesus was pleased to become our brother, and, though he was not courted, offered himself to be our ruler and Saviour, and to take this ruin under his hand.

2. Those that are thus pressed to come into office will swear themselves off, because, though they are taken to be men of some substance, yet they know themselves unable to bear the charges of the office, and to answer the expectations of those that choose them; ver. 7, "He shall swear,"—shall lift up the hand, the ancient ceremony used in taking an oath,—"I will not be a healer, make not me a ruler." Note, Rulers must be healers, and good rulers will be so, must study to unite their subjects, and not widen the differences that are among them; those only are fit for government that are of a meek, quiet, healing spirit. They must also heal the wounds that are given to any of the interests of their people, by suitable applications. But why will he not be a ruler? Because "in my house is neither bread nor clothing." 1st. If he saith true, it was a sign men's estates were sadly ruined, when even those that made the best appearance really wanted necessaries, a common case and a piteous one. Some that, having lived fashionably, are willing to put the best side outward, yet if the truth were known, are in great straits, and go with heavy hearts, for want of bread and clothing. 2nd. If he do not speak truth, it was a sign men's consciences were sadly debauched, when, to avoid the expence of an office, they would load themselves with the guilt of perjury, and, which is the greatest madness in the world, would damn their souls to save their money, Mat. xvi. 26. 3rd. However it were, it was a sign the case of the nation was very bad, when nobody was willing to accept a place in the government of it, as despairing to have either credit or profit by it, which are the two things aimed at in men's common ambition of preferment.

3. The reason why God brought things to this sad pass, even among his own people, which is given either by the prophet or by him that refused to be a ruler. It was not for want of goodwill to his country, but because he saw the case desperate, and past relief, and it would be to no purpose to attempt it; ver. 8, "Jerusalem is ruined, and Judah is fallen;" and they may thank themselves; they have brought the destruction upon their own heads, for "their tongue and their doings are against the Lord." In word and action they broke the law of God, and therein designed an affront to him; they wilfully intended to offend him, in contempt of his authority and defiance of his justice. Their tongue was against the Lord, for they contradicted his prophets; and their doings were no better, they acted as they talked. It was an aggravation of their sin that God's eye was upon them, and that his glory was manifested among them; but they provoked him to his face, as if, the more they knew of his glory, the greater pride they took in slighting it, and turning it into shame. And this, this is it for which Jerusalem is ruined. Note, The ruin both of persons and people is owing to their sins. If they did not provoke God, he would do them no hurt, Jer. xxv. 6.

9 The shew of their countenance doth witness against them;
And they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not.
Woe unto their soul! for they have rewarded evil unto themselves.
10 Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him:
For they shall eat the fruit of their doings.
11 Woe unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him:
For the reward of his hands shall be given him.
12 As for my people, children are their oppressors,
And women rule over them.
O my people, they which lead thee cause thee to err,
And destroy the way of thy paths.
13 The LORD standeth up to plead,
And standeth to judge the people.
14 The LORD will enter into judgment
With the ancients of his people, and the princes thereof:
For ye have eaten up the vineyard;
The spoil of the poor is in your houses.
15 What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces,
And grind the faces of the poor?
Saith the Lord GOD of hosts.

Here God proceeds in his controversy with his people. Observe,

First. The ground of this controversy. It was for sin that God contended with them; if they vex themselves, let them look a little farther, and they will see that they must thank themselves; 'Woe unto their souls,' (so it may be read in a way of lamentation,) 'for they have procured evil to themselves,' ver. 9. Note, 1. The condition of sinners is woful, and very deplorable. 2. It is the soul that is damaged and endangered by sin. Sinners may prosper in their outward estates, and yet at the same time there may be a woe to their souls. 3. Whatever evil befalls sinners, it is of their own procuring, Jer. ii. 19. That which is here charged upon them is,

1. That the shame that should restrain them from their sins was quite thrown off, and they were grown impudent, ver. 9. This hardens men against repentance, and ripens them for ruin as much as any thing, "The show of their countenance doth witness against them," that their minds are vain, and lewd, and malicious; their eyes speak it plain that they cannot cease from sin, 2 Pet. ii. 14. One may look them in the face, and guess at the desperate wickedness that there is in their hearts, "they declare their sin as Sodom;" so impetuous, so imperious, are their lusts, and so impatient of the least check, and so perfectly are all the remaining sparks of virtue extinguished in them. The Sodomites declared their sin, not only by the exceeding greatness of it, Gen. xiii. 13, so that it cried to heaven, Gen. xviii. 20, but by their shameless owning of that which was most shameful, Gen. xix. 5. And thus Judah and Jerusalem did. They are so far from hiding it, that they glory in it, in the bold attempts they have made upon virtue, and the victory they have gained over their own convictions; they have a whore's forehead, Jer. iii. 3, and cannot blush, Jer. vi. 15. Note, Those that are grown impudent in sin are ripe for ruin; they that are past shame, we say, are past grace, and then past hope.

2. That their guides, who should direct them in the right way, put them out of the way; ver. 12, "They which lead thee," the princes, priests, and prophets, they mislead thee, they "cause thee to err" either preaching to them that which was false and corrupt, or, if they preached that which was true and good, contradicting it by their practices; and the people would sooner follow a bad example than a good exhortation. Thus they destroyed the way of their paths, pulling down with one hand what they built up with the other. Qui te beatificant,—'They that call thee blessed cause thee to err,'—so some read it. Their priests applauded them, as if nothing were amiss among them, cried, Peace, peace to them, as if they were in no danger; and thus they caused them to go on in their errors.

3. That their judges, who should have patronised and protected the oppressed, were themselves the greatest oppressors, ver. 14, 15. The elders of the people and the princes, that had learning, and could not but know better things, that had great estates, and were not under the temptation of necessity, to encroach upon those about them; and that were men of honour, and should scorn to do a base thing, yet they "have eaten up the vineyard," God's vineyard, which they were appointed to be the dressers and keepers of. They burnt it, so the word signifies; they did as ill by it as its worst enemies could do, Ps. lxxx. 16. Or, the vineyards of the poor, they wrested them out of their possession, as Jezebel did Naboth's; or devoured the fruits of them, fed their lusts with that which should have been the necessary food of indigent families; the spoil of the poor was hoarded up in their houses. When God came to search for stolen goods, there he found it, and it was a witness against them. It was to be had, and they might have made restitution, but would not. God reasons with these great men; ver. 15, "What mean ye, that ye beat my people in pieces?" What cause have you for it? what good doth it do you? Or what hurt have they done you? Do you think you had power given you for such a purpose as this? Note, There is nothing more unaccountable, and yet nothing which must more certainly be accounted for, than the injuries and abuses that are done to God's people, by their persecutors and oppressors. Ye "grind the faces of the poor," put them to as much pain and terror as if they were ground in a mill, and as certainly reduce them to dust by one act of oppression after another. Or, their faces are bruised and crushed with the blows you have given them; you have not only ruined their estates, but given them personal abuses. Our Lord Jesus was smitten on the face, Mat. xxvi. 67.

Secondly. The management of this controversy. 1. God himself is the prosecutor; ver. 13, "The Lord stands up to plead," or he sets himself to debate the matter, and he "stands to judge the people," to judge for those that were oppressed and abused, and he will enter into judgment with the princes, ver. 14. Note, The greatest of men cannot exempt or secure themselves from the scrutiny and sentence of God's judgment, nor demur to the jurisdiction of the court of heaven. 2. The indictment is proved by the notorious evidence of the fact. Look upon the oppressors, and the show of their countenance witnesseth against them, ver. 9; look upon the oppressed, and you see how their faces are battered and abused, ver. 15. 3. The controversy is already begun in the change of the ministry. To punish those that had abused their power to ill purposes, God sets those over them that had not sense to use it to any good purposes: "Children are their oppressors, and women rule over them," ver. 12. Men that have as weak judgments and strong passions as women and children. This was their sin, that their rulers were such, and it became a judgment upon them.

Thirdly. The distinction that shall be made between particular persons in the prosecution of this controversy; ver. 10, 11, "Say to the righteous, It shall be well with him; woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him." He had said, ver. 9, they "have rewarded evil to themselves;" and to make that out he here shews that God will "render to every man according to his works." Had they been righteous, it had been well with them; but if it be ill with them, it is because they are wicked, and will be so. Thus God stated the matter to Cain, to convince him that he had no reason to be angry, Gen. iv. 7. Or it may be taken thus: God is threatening national judgments, which should ruin the public interests. Now, 1. Some good people might fear that they should be involved in that ruin, and therefore God bids the prophet comfort them against those fears. Whatever comes of the unrighteous nation, "Say ye to the righteous man," that he shall not be lost in the crowd of sinners, the "judge of all the earth will not slay the righteous with the wicked," Gen. xviii. 25. No, assure him in God's name, that "it shall be well with him." The property of the trouble shall be altered to him, and he "shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." He shall have Divine supports and comforts, which shall abound as afflictions abound, and so "it shall be well with him." When the whole stay of bread is taken away, yet in the day of famine they shall be satisfied, they "shall eat the fruit of their doings;" that is, they shall have the testimony of their consciences for them, that they kept themselves pure from the common iniquity, and therefore the common calamity is not the same thing to them as it is to others; they brought no fuel to the flame, and therefore are not themselves fuel for it. 2. Some wicked people might hope that they should escape that ruin, and therefore God bids the prophet shake their vain hopes, "Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him," ver. 11; to him the judgments shall have a sting, and there shall be wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery. There is a woe to wicked people; and though they may think to shelter themselves from public judgments, yet it shall be ill with them; it will grow worse and worse with them, if they repent not, and the worst of all will be at last; for "the reward of his hands shall be done to him" in the day when every man shall receive according to the things done in the body.

16 Moreover the LORD saith,
Because the daughters of Zion are haughty,
And walk with stretched forth necks
And wanton eyes,
Walking and mincing as they go,
And making a tinkling with their feet:
17 Therefore the Lord will smite with a scab
The crown of the head of the daughters of Zion,
And the LORD will discover their secret parts.
18 In that day the Lord will take away
The bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet,
And their cauls, and their round tires like the moon 19 The chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers,

iii. 8. The first clause may be translated, "For Jerusalem is tottering, and Judah is falling;" which is better, because not actual but impending ruin seems to be alluded to.

iii. 9. "The show" is the aspect or expression of the countenance, though its character is less stated in the first clause than implied in the second.

iii. 12. The sense of this verse is, "Children are the oppressors of my people, and women are their rulers; their leaders lead them astray, and destroy their paths." Children and women are put for the childish and effeminate. For leaders some understand "those who bless," i.e., congratulate or call blessed, but our version may remain as it is in that respect. They had rulers who were feeble and yet oppressive, who pretended to lead them aright, but led them astray to ruin.

iii. 16—26. "The daughters of Zion" are the women of Jerusalem, whose wanton, giddy gait is first described. "Mincing" means INDIAN WOMEN WITH ANKLETS.

The prophet's business was to shew all sorts of people what they had contributed to the national guilt, and what share they must expect in the national judgments that were coming. Here he reproves and warns the daughters of Zion, tells the ladies of their faults; and Moses, in the law, having denounced God's wrath against the tender and delicate woman, (the prophets being a comment upon the law,) Deu. xxviii. 56, he here tells them how they should smart by the calamities that were coming upon them. Observe,

First. The sin charged upon the daughters of Zion, ver. 16. The prophet expressly voucheth God's authority for what he said, lest it should be thought it was unbecoming him to take notice of such things, and should be ill resented by the ladies; The Lord saith it. Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, let them know that God takes notice of, and is much displeased with the folly and vanity of proud women; and his law takes cognizance even of their dress. Two things they here stand indicted for, haughtiness and wantonness, directly contrary to that modesty, shamefacedness, and sobriety with which women ought to adorn themselves, 1 Tim. ii. 9. They discovered the disposition of their mind by their gait and gesture, and the lightness of their carriage. They are haughty, for they "walk with stretched forth necks," that they may seem tall, or as thinking nobody good enough to speak to them, or to receive a look or a smile from them; their eyes are wanton, deceiving, so the word is; with their amorous glances they draw men into their snares; they affect a formal starched way of going, that people may look at them and admire them, and know they have been at the dancing school and had learned the minuet step; they go mincing or nicely tripping, not willing to set so much as the sole of their foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy; they make a tinkling with their feet, having, as some think, chains or little bells upon their shoes that made a noise; they go 'as if they were fettered,' so some read it; like a horse trammelled, that he may learn to pace. Thus Agag came delicately, 1 Sam. xv. 32. Such a nice affected mien is not only a force upon that which is natural, and ridiculous before men, men of sense, but, as it is an evidence of a vain mind, it is offensive to God. And two things aggravated it here: 1. That these were the daughters of Zion, the holy mountain, who should have carried themselves with the gravity that becomes women professing godliness. 2. That it should seem by the connexion they were the wives and daughters of the princes who spoiled and oppressed the poor, (ver. 14, 15,) that they might maintain this pride and luxury of their families.

Secondly. The punishments threatened for this sin, and they answer the sin as face answers to face in a glass, ver. 17, 18.

1. They "walked with stretched forth necks." But God "will smite with a scab the crown of their head," which shall lower their crests, and make them ashamed to shew their heads, being obliged by it to cut off their hair. Note, Loathsome diseases are often sent as the just punishment of pride, and are sometimes the immediate effect of lewdness, the flesh and the body being consumed by it.

2. They cared not what they laid out in furnishing themselves with great variety of fine clothes; but God will reduce them to such poverty and distress that they should not have clothes sufficient to cover their nakedness, but their uncomeliness should be exposed through their rags.

3. They were extremely fond and proud of their ornaments; but God will strip them of those ornaments, when their houses shall be plundered, their treasures rifled, and they themselves led into captivity. The prophet here instanceth in many of the ornaments which they used, as particularly as if he had been the keeper of their wardrobe, or had attended them in their dressing-room. It is not at all material to inquire what sort of ornaments each of these were, and whether the translations rightly express the original words; perhaps a hundred years hence the names of some of the ornaments that are now in use in our own land will be as little understood as some of those here are. Fashions alter, and so do the names of them; and yet the mention of them is not in vain, but is designed to expose the folly of the daughters of Zion; for, 1. Many of these things, we may suppose, were very odd and ridiculous, and if they had not been in the fashion would have been hooted at. They were fitter to be toys for children to play with than ornaments for grown people to go to mount Zion in. 2nd. Those things that were decent and convenient, as the linen, the hoods, and the veils, yet needed not to be provided in such abundance and variety as they had. It is necessary to have apparel, that each should have it according to their rank; but what occasion was there for so many changeable suits of apparel? ver. 22, that they might not be seen two days together in the same suit. 'They must have (as the homily against excess of apparel speaks) one gown for the day, another for the night; one long, another short; one for the workingday, another for the holiday; one of this colour, another of that colour; one of cloth, another of silk or damask; one dress before dinner, another after; one of the Spanish fashion, another Turkey, and never content with sufficient.' Which, as it is an evidence of pride and vain curiosity, so must needs spend a great deal in gratifying a base lust, which ought to be laid out in works of piety and charity. And it is well if poor tenants be not racked, or poor creditors defrauded, to support it. 3rd. The enumeration of these things intimates what care they were in about them, how much their hearts were upon them, what an exact account they kept of them, how nice and critical they were about them, how insatiable their desire was of them, and how much of their comfort was bound up in them. A maid could forget none of these ornaments, though they were never so many, Jer. ii. 31, but would repeat them as readily, and talk of them with as much pleasure, as if they had been things of the greatest moment. The prophet doth not speak of these things as in themselves sinful; they may lawfully be had and used; but as things which they were proud of, and should therefore be deprived of.

4. They were very nice and curious about their clothes, but God would make those bodies of theirs a reproach and burden to them which they were at such expence to beautify and make easy; ver. 24, "Instead of sweet smell," (those 'tablets,' or 'boxes of perfume, houses of the soul,' or 'breath,' as they are called, ver. 20, margin,) "there shall be stink," garments grown nasty with being long worn, or from some loathsome disease, or plaisters for the cure of it; instead of a rich embroidered girdle, used to make the clothes sit tight, there shall be a rent, a rending of the clothes for grief, or old rotten clothes rent into rags; instead of well set hair, curiously plaited and powdered, there shall be baldness, the hair being plucked off, or shaven, as was usual in times of great affliction, ch. xv. 2; Jer. xvi. 6; or in great servitude, Eze. xxix. 18. "Instead of a stomacher," or a scarf, or sash, "a girding of sackcloth," in token of deep humiliation; "and burning instead of beauty;" that is, those that had a good complexion, and were proud of it, when they are carried into captivity, shall be tanned and sun-burnt; and it is observed that the best faces are soonest injured by the weather. From all this let us learn, 1st. Not to be nice and curious about our apparel, nor to affect that which is gay and costly, or to be proud of it. 2nd. Not to be secure in the enjoyment of any of the delights of sense, because we know not how soon we may be stripped of them, nor what straits we may be reduced to.

5. They designed by these ornaments to charm the gentlemen, and win their affections, Pr. vii. 16, 17, but there shall be none to be charmed by them; ver. 25, "Thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty in the war." The fire shall consume them, and then the maidens shall not be given in marriage, as it is, Ps. lxxviii. 63. When the sword comes with commission, the mighty commonly fall first by it, because they are most forward to venture; and when Zion's guards are cut off, no marvel that Zion's gates lament and mourn, ver. 26. The enemies having made themselves masters of them, and the city itself being desolate, being emptied or swept, shall sit upon the ground like a disconsolate widow. If sin be harboured within the walls, lamentation and mourning are near the gates.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter we have, I. A threatening of the paucity and scarceness of men, ver. 1, which might fitly enough have been added to the close of the foregoing chapter, to which it hath a plain reference. II. A promise of the restoration of Jerusalem's peace and purity, righteousness and safety, in the days of the Messiah, ver. 2—6. Thus in wrath mercy is remembered, and gospel grace is a sovereign relief in reference to the terrors of the law, and the desolations made by sin.

tripping in a peculiar manner, to attract attention, as has often been the "fashion" in modern England. The "tinkling" refers to the noise of metal rings and the like about the ankles. Among other terms in these verses requiring some explanation are these:—"bravery," i.e., finery; "tinkling ornaments" are anklets, &c.; the "cauls" are, perhaps, spangled hair-nets; "round tires like the moon" are crescent-shaped ornaments for head and neck; "chains" should be pendants; "mufflers" are veils; "bonnets" are caps; "ornaments of the legs" probably mean chains from ankle to ankle, to regulate the length of the steps; "head-bands" may be girdles; "tablets" are boxes or bottles for perfume; "earrings" are amulets or charms; "nose jewels" are rings worn at the nose; "changeable suits of apparel" may be splendid dresses; "mantles" and "wimples" are some kind of loose robes; "crisping-pins" should most likely be purses; "glasses" may be metal mirrors, but some think a gauzy material is signified; "hoods" are rather

AND in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying,
We will eat our own bread,
And wear our own apparel:
Only let us be called by thy name,
To take away our reproach.

It was threatened, ch. iii. 25, that the mighty men should fall by the sword in war, and it was threatened as a punishment to the women that affected gaiety and a loose sort of conversation. Now here we have the effect and consequence of that great slaughter of men:

First. That though providence hath so wisely ordered that, communibus annis,—'on an average of years,' there is pretty near an equal number of males and females born into the world; yet, through the devastations made by war, there should scarce be one man in seven left alive. As there are deaths attending the bringing forth of children, which are peculiar to the woman, that was first in the transgression, so, to balance that, there are deaths peculiar to men, those by the sword in the high places of the field, which perhaps devour more than childbed doth. Here it is foretold that such multitudes of men should be cut off that there should be seven women to one man.

Secondly. That by reason of this scarcity of men, though marriage should be kept up for the raising of recruits, and the preserving of the race of mankind upon earth, yet the usual method of it should be quite altered. That whereas men ordinarily make their court to the women, now the women should take hold of the men, foolishly fearing (as Lot's daughters did, when they saw the ruin of Sodom, and perhaps thought it reached farther than it did) that in a little time there would be none left, Gen. xix. 31. And that, whereas women naturally hate to come in sharers with others, now seven should by consent become the wives of one man; and whereas by the law the husband was obliged to provide food and raiment for his wife, Ex. xxi. 10, which with many would be the most powerful argument against multiplying wives, these women will be bound to find themselves, they will eat bread of their own earning, and wear apparel of their own working; and the man they court shall be at no expence upon them, only they desire to be called his wives, to take away the reproach of a single life. They are willing to be wives upon any terms, though never so unreasonable, and perhaps the rather, because in these troublesome times it would be a kindness to them to have a husband for their protector. But St. Paul, on the contrary, in a time of distress, thinks the single state preferable, 1 Cor. vii. 26. I wish this do not come in here partly as a reflection upon the daughters of Zion, that, notwithstanding the humbling providences they were under, ch. iii. 18, they remained unhumbled; and instead of repenting of their pride and vanity, when God was contending with them for it, all their care was to get them husbands. That modesty, which is the greatest beauty of the fair sex, is forgotten, and with them the reproach of vice is nothing to the reproach of virginity. A sad symptom of the irrecoverable desolation of virtue.

2 In that day shall the branch of the LORD be beautiful and glorious,
And the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely
For them that are escaped of Israel.
3 And it shall come to pass, that he that is left in Zion,
And he that remaineth in Jerusalem,
Shall be called holy, [salem:
Even every one that is written among the living in Jeru-
4 When the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion, [midst thereof
And shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the
By the spirit of judgment, and by the spirit of burning.
5 And the LORD will create upon every dwelling place of
And upon her assemblies, [mount Zion,
A cloud and smoke by day,
And the shining of a flaming fire by night:
For upon all the glory shall be a defence.
6 And there shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat,
And for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain

By the foregoing threatenings Jerusalem is brought into a very deplorable condition, every thing looks melancholy; but here the sun breaks out from behind the cloud; many exceeding great and precious promises we have in these verses, giving assurance of comfort, which may be discerned through the troubles, and of happy days which shall come after them. And these certainly point at the kingdom of the Messiah, and the great redemption to be wrought out by him under the figure and type of the restoration of Judah and Jerusalem, by the reforming reign of Hezekiah after Ahaz, and the return out of their captivity in Babylon; to both which it may have some reference, but chiefly to Christ. It is here promised, as the issue of all these troubles,

First. That God will raise up a righteous Branch, which should produce fruits of righteousness; ver. 2, "In that day," that same day, at that very time, when Jerusalem shall be destroyed, and the Jewish nation extirpated and dispersed, the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up, and then shall be the reviving of the church, when everybody feared the utter ruin of it.

1. Christ himself shall be exalted. He is "the Branch of the Lord," "the Man the Branch;" it is one of his prophetical names, "my servant the Branch," Zec. iii. 18; vi. 12; "the Branch of righteousness," Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; "a Branch out of the stem of Jesse," ch. xi 1; and that, as some think, is alluded to when he is called a Nazarene, Mat. ii. 23. Here he is called the Branch of the Lord, because planted by his power, and flourishing to his praise. The ancient Chaldee paraphrase here reads it, 'The Christ, or Messiah of the Lord;' he shall be beauty, and glory, and joy. 1st. He shall himself be advanced to the joy set before him, and the glory which he had with the Father before the world was. He that was a reproach of men, and whose visage was marred more than any man's, is now in the upper world, beautiful and glorious as the sun in his strength, admired and adored by angels. 2nd. He shall be beautiful and glorious in the esteem of all believers, shall gain an interest in the world, and a name among men above every name. To them that believe he is precious, he is an honour, 1 Pet. ii. 7; "the fairest of ten thousand," Cant. v. 10, and altogether glorious. Let us rejoice that he is so, and let him be so to us.

2. His gospel shall be embraced. That is the fruit of the branch of the Lord; all the graces and comforts of the Gospel spring from Christ; but it is called the fruit of the earth, because it sprung up in this world, and was calculated for the present state. And Christ compares himself to a corn of wheat that falls into the ground and dies, and so brings forth much fruit, Jno. xii. 24. The success of the Gospel is represented by the earth's yielding her increase, Ps. lxvii. 6; and the planting of the Christian church, is God's sowing it to himself in the earth, Hos. ii. 23. We may understand it of both the persons and the things that are the products of the Gospel; they "shall be excellent and comely," shall appear very agreeable, and be very acceptable to them that are escaped of Israel, to that remnant of the Jews which were saved from perishing with the rest in unbelief, Rom. xi. 5. Note, If Christ be precious to us, his Gospel will be so, and all its truths and promises; his church will be so, and all that belong to it. These are the good fruit of the earth, in comparison with which all other things are but weeds. It will be a good evidence to us that we are of the chosen remnant, distinguished from the rest that are called Israel, and marked for salvation, if we are brought to see a transcendent beauty in Christ and holiness, and the saints, the excellent ones of the earth. As a type of this blessed day, Jerusalem, after Sennacherib's invasion, and after the captivity in Babylon, should again flourish as a branch, and be blessed with the fruits of the earth: compare ch. xxxvii. 31, 32, "The remnant shall again take root downward, and bear fruit upward." And if by "the fruit of the earth" here we understand the good things of this life, we may observe, that those have a peculiar sweetness in them to the chosen remnant, who, having a covenant right to them, have the most comfortable use of them. If the Branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious in our eyes, even the fruit of the earth also will be excellent and comely, because then we may take it as the fruit of the promise, Ps. xxxvii. 16; 1 Tim. iv. 8.

Secondly. That God will reserve to himself a holy seed, ver. 3. When the generality of those that have a place and a name in Zion and in Jerusalem shall be cut off as withered branches, by their own unbelief, yet some shall be left. Some shall remain, some shall still cleave to the church, when its property is altered, and it is become Christian; for God will not quite cast off his people, Rom. xi. 1. There is here and there one that is left. Now, 1. This "is a remnant according to the election of grace," as the apostle speaks, Rom. xi. 5; such as are "written among the living," marked in the counsel and foreknowledge of God for life and salvation; written to life, so the word is, designed and determined for it, unalterably, for "what I have written I have written." Those that are kept alive in killing, dying times, were written for life in the book of Divine providence; and shall we not suppose those who are rescued from a greater death to be such as were "written in the Lamb's book of life?" Rev. xiii. 8. "As many as were ordained unto eternal life believed" to the salvation of the soul, Acts xiii. 48. Note, All that were written among the living shall be found among the living, every one; for of all that were given to Christ he shall lose none. 2. It is a remnant under the dominion of grace; for, "every one that is written among the living," and is accordingly left, "shall be called holy;" that is, shall be holy, and shall be accepted of God accordingly. Those only that are holy shall be left, when "the Son of man shall gather out of his kingdom every thing that offends." And all that are chosen to salvation are chosen to sanctification: see 2 Thes. ii. 13; Eph. i. 4.

Thirdly. That God will reform his church, and will rectify and amend whatever is amiss in it, ver. 4. Then the remnant "shall be called holy," "when the Lord shall have washed away their filth," washed it from among them, by cutting off the wicked persons, washed it from within them by purging out the wicked thing. They shall not be called so till they are in some measure made so. Gospel times are times of reformation, Heb. ix. 10, typified by the reformation in the days of Hezekiah, and that after the captivity, to which this promise refers. Observe, 1. The places and persons to be reformed. Jerusalem, which, though the holy city, yet needed reformation; and, being the royal city, the reformation of that would have a good influence upon the whole kingdom. The daughters of Zion also must be reformed, the women in a particular manner, whom he had reproved, ch. iii. 16. When they were decked in their ornaments, they thought themselves wondrous clean; but, being proud of them, the prophet calls them their filth, for no sin is more abominable to God than pride. Or, by the daughters of Zion, may be meant the country, town, and villages, which were related to Jerusalem, as the mother city, and which needed reformation. 2. The reformation itself. The filth shall be washed away, for wickedness is filthiness, particularly bloodshed, for which Jerusalem was infamous, 2 Kin. xxi. 16, and which defiles the land more than any other sin. Note, The reforming of a city is the cleansing of it; when vicious customs and fashions are suppressed, and the open practice of wickedness is restrained, the place is made clean and sweet, which before was a dunghill. And this is not only for its credit and reputation among strangers, but for the comfort and health of the inhabitants themselves. 3. The author of the reformation. "The Lord shall do it." Reformation work is God's work; if any thing be done to purpose in it, it is his doing. But how? By the judgment of his providence the sinners were destroyed and consumed; but it is by the Spirit of his grace that they are reformed and converted This is work that is done, not by might, or by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zec. iv. 6, working both upon the sinners themselves that are to be reformed, and upon magistrates, ministers, and others, that are to be employed as instruments of reformation. The Spirit herein acts, 1st. As a Spirit of judgment, enlightening the mind, convincing the conscience; as a Spirit of wisdom, guiding us to deal prudently, Isa. lii. 13; as a discerning, distinguishing Spirit, separating between the precious and the vile. 2nd. As a Spirit of burning, quickening and invigorating the affections, and making men zealously affected in a good work. The Spirit works as fire, Mat. iii. 10. An ardent love to Christ and souls, and a flaming zeal against sin, will carry men on with resolution in their endeavours to "turn away ungodliness from Jacob:" see Isa. xxxii. 15, 16.

Fourthly. That God will protect his church, and all that belong to it, ver. 5, 6; when they are purified and reformed they shall no longer lie exposed, but God will take a particular care of them. They that are sanctified are well fortified; for God will be to them a guide and a guard.

1. Their tabernacles shall be defended, ver. 5. 1st. Their dwelling-places; the tabernacles of their rest, their own houses, where they worship God, alone, and with their families. That blessing which is upon the habitation of the just shall be a protection to it, Pr. iii. 33. In the tabernacle of the righteous shall the voice of rejoicing and salvation be, Ps. cxviii. 15. Note, God takes particular cognizance and care of the dwelling-places of his people, of every one of them, the poorest cottage as well as the stateliest palace. When iniquity is put far from the tabernacle, the Almighty shall be its defence, Job xxii. 23, 25. 2nd. Their assemblies, or tabernacles of meeting for religious worship. No mention is made of the temple, for the promise points at a time when not one turbans; a "sweet smell," i.e., a perfume; "a rent" should be a rope or cord; "burning" may be sun-burn, or the like. To fully illustrate and explain all the matters mentioned in these verses would require more space than we can spare.

iv. 1. This chapter continues the subject of the preceding. Verse 1 means that in the coming time of calamity so many men will perish, that there will be many women who must either remain unmarried or depart from all the ordinary customs of society, with a view to escape the reproach of celibacy. Not only will seven women implore one man to become their husband, but they will undertake to provide themselves with food and raiment. A Jew might be allowed to have so many wives, but it was not usual.

iv. 2. The Chaldee explains "the branch" of the Messiah, as many modern critics do.

iv. 3. "Written" means enrolled or registered.

iv. 4. "The blood of Jerusalem" is its guilt. The word "spirit" stone of that shall be left upon another; but all the congregations of Christians, though but two or three met together in Christ's name, shall be taken under the special protection of heaven. They shall no more be scattered, no more disturbed, nor shall any weapon formed against them prosper. Note, We ought to reckon it a great mercy if we have liberty to worship God in public, free from the alarms of the sword of war or persecution.

Now this writ of protection is drawn up, First. In a similitude taken from the safety of the camp of Israel, when they marched through the wilderness. God will give to the Christian church as real proofs, though not so sensible, of his care of them, as he gave to them then. The Lord will again "create a cloud and smoke by day," to screen them from the scorching heat of the sun, "and the shining of a flaming fire by night," to enlighten and warm the air, which in the night is cold and dark: see Ex. xiii. 21; Neh. ix. 19. This pillar of cloud and fire interposed between the Israelites and the Egyptians, Ex. xiv. 20. Note, Though miracles are ceased, yet God is the same to the New Testament church that he was to Israel of old; the very same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Secondly. In a similitude taken from the outside cover of rams' skins and badgers' skins, that was upon the curtains of the tabernacle, as if every dwelling-place of mount Zion, and every assembly, were as dear to God as that tabernacle was. "Upon all the glory shall be a defence," to save it from wind and weather. Note, The church on earth has its glory; gospel truths and ordinances, the Scriptures and the ministry, are the church's glory; and upon all this glory there is a defence, and ever shall be; for the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church. If God himself be the glory in the midst of it, he will himself be a wall of fire round about it, impenetrable, and impregnable. Grace in the soul is the glory of it, and those that have it are kept by the power of God as in a stronghold, 1 Pet. i. 5.

2. Their tabernacle shall be a defence to them, ver. 6. God's tabernacle was a pavilion to the saints, Ps. xxvii. 5. But when that is taken down, they shall not want a covert. The Divine power and goodness shall be a tabernacle to all the saints; God himself will be their hiding-place, Ps. xxxii. 7; they shall be at home in him, Ps. xci. 9. He will himself be to them "as the shadow of a great rock," ch. xxxii. 2; and his name a strong tower, Pr. xviii. 10. He will be not only a shadow from the heat in the daytime, but a covert from storm and rain. Note, In this world we must expect change of weather, and all the inconveniences that attend it; we shall meet with storm and rain in this lower region, and at other times the heat of the day no less burthensome. But God is a refuge to his people all weathers.

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter, the prophet, in God's name, shews the people of God their transgressions, even the house of Jacob their sins, and the judgments which were likely to be brought upon them for their sins, I. By a parable, under the similitude of an unfruitful vineyard, representing the great favours God had bestowed upon them, their disappointing of his expectations from them, and the ruin they had thereby deserved, ver. 1—7. II. By an enumeration of the sins that did abound among them, with a threatening of punishments that should answer the sins: 1. Covetousness, and greediness of worldly wealth, which shall be punished with famine, ver. 8—10; 2. Rioting, and revelling, and drunkenness, ver. 11, 12, 22, which shall be punished with captivity, and all the miseries that attend it, ver. 13—17; 3. Presumption in sin, and defying the justice of God, ver. 18, 19; 4. Confounding the distinctions between virtue and vice, and so undermining the principles of religion, ver. 20; 5. Self-conceit, ver. 21; 6. Perverting justice, for which, and the other instances of reigning wickedness among them, a great and general desolation is threatened, which should lay all waste, ver. 24, 25, and which should be effected by a foreign invasion, ver. 26—30; referring, perhaps, to the havoc made not long after by Sennacherib's army.

NOW will I sing to my wellbeloved
A song of my beloved touching his vineyard.
My wellbeloved hath a vineyard
In a very fruitful hill:
2 And he fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof,
And planted it with the choicest vine,
And built a tower in the midst of it,
And also made a winepress therein:
And he looked that it should bring forth grapes,
And it brought forth wild grapes.
3 And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah,
Judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard.
4 What could have been done more to my vineyard,
That I have not done in it?
Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes,
Brought it forth wild grapes?
5 And now go to; I will tell you
What I will do to my vineyard: [up;
I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten
And break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden
6 And I will lay it waste: [down:
It shall not be pruned, nor digged;
But there shall come up briers and thorns:
I will also command the clouds
That they rain no rain upon it. [Israel,
7 For the vineyard of the LORD of hosts is the house of
And the men of Judah his pleasant plant:
And he looked for judgment, but behold oppression;
For righteousness, but behold a cry.

See what variety of methods the great God takes to awaken sinners to repentance, by convincing them of sin, and shewing them their misery and danger by reason of it. To this purpose he speaks sometimes in plain terms, and sometimes in parables; sometimes in prose, sometimes in verse, as here. We have tried to reason with you, ch. i. 18, now let us put your case into a poem, inscribed to the honour of my well-beloved. God the Father dictates it to the honour of Christ, his well-beloved Son, whom he hath constituted Lord of the vineyard. The prophet sings it to the honour of Christ too, for he is his well-beloved. The Old Testament prophets were friends of the bridegroom. Christ is God's beloved Son, and our Saviour. Whatever is said or sung of the church must be intended to his praise, even that which, like this, tends to our shame. This parable is put into a song, that it might be the more moving and affecting, might be the more easily learned, and exactly remembered, and the better transmitted to posterity. And it is an exposition of the song of Moses, Deu. xxxii., shewing that what he then foretold was now fulfilled. Jerome saith, Christ the well-beloved did in effect sing this mournful song when he beheld Jerusalem, and wept over it, Lu. xix. 41, and had reference to it in the parable of the vineyard, Mat. xxi. 33; only here the fault was in the vines, there in the husbandmen. Here is,

First. The great things which God had done for the Jewish church and nation. When all the rest of the world lay in common—not cultivated by Divine revelation—that was his vineyard, they were his peculiar people. He owned them for his own, set them apart for himself; the soil they were planted in was extraordinary; it was "a very fruitful hill," 'the horn of the son of oil,' so it is in the margin. There was plenty, a cornucopia, and there was dainty; they did there eat the fat, and drink the sweet; and so were furnished with abundance of good things to honour God with, in sacrifices and freewill offerings. The advantages of our situation will be brought into the account another day. Observe farther what God did for this vineyard. 1. "He fenced it;" took it under his special protection, kept it night and day under his own eye, lest any should hurt it, ch. xxvii. 2, 3. If they had not themselves thrown down their fence, no inroad could have been made upon them, Ps. cxxv. 2; cxxi. 4. 2. He gathereth the stones out of it, that, as nothing from without might damage it, so nothing within might obstruct its fruitfulness. He proffered his grace to take away the stony heart. 3. He "planted it with the choicest vine;" set up a pure religion among them, gave them a most excellent law, instituted ordinances very proper for the keeping up of their acquaintance with God, Jer. ii. 21. 4. He "built a tower in the midst of it," either for defence against violence, or for the dressers of the vineyard to lodge in; or, rather, for the owner of the vineyard to sit in, to take a view of the vines, Cant. vii. 12, a summer-house. The temple was this tower, about which the priests lodged, and where God promised to meet his people, and gave them the tokens of his presence among them, and pleasure in them. 5. He "made a winepress therein;" set up his altar, to which the sacrifices, as the fruits of the vineyard, should be brought.

Secondly. The disappointment of his just expectations from them. "He looked that it should bring forth grapes," and a great deal of reason he had for that expectation. God expects vineyard fruit from those that enjoy vineyard privileges; not only leaves, as Mar. xi. 30. A bare profession, though never so green, will not serve; nor only buds and blossoms. Good purposes and good beginnings are good things, but not enough, there must be fruit,—a good heart, and a good life; vineyard-fruit; thoughts and affections, words and actions, agreeable to the Spirit, which is the fatness of the vineyard, Gal. v. 22, 23, answerable to the ordinances, which are the dressings of the vineyard; and acceptable to God, the Lord of the vineyard, and fruit according to the season. Such fruits as this God expects from us; grapes, the fruit of the vine, with which they honour God and man, Jud. ix. 13; and his expectations are neither high nor hard, but righteous and very reasonable. Yet see how his expectations are frustrated; it brought forth wild grapes, not only no fruit at all, but naughty fruit, worse than none; grapes of Sodom, Deu. xxxii. 33. 1. Wild grapes are the fruit of the corrupt nature; fruit according to the crab-stock, not according to the engrafted imp; from the root of bitterness, Heb. xii. 15. Where grace doth not work, corruption will. 2. Wild grapes are hypocritical performances in religion, that look like grapes, but are sour or bitter, and are so far from being pleasing to God, that they are provoking, as theirs, ch. i. 11. Counterfeit graces are wild grapes.

Thirdly. An appeal to themselves, whether upon the whole matter God must not be justified, and they condemned, ver. 3, 4. And now the case is plainly stated: "O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard." This implies that God was blamed about them; there was a controversy between them and him. But the equity was so plain on his side, that he could venture to put the decision of the controversy to their own consciences; Let any inhabitant of Jerusalem, any man of Judah, that hath but the use of his reason, and a common sense of equity and justice, speak his mind impartially in this matter. Here is a challenge to any man to shew,

1. Any instance wherein God had been wanting to them. "What could have been done more to my vineyard that I have not done in it?" He speaks of the external means of fruitfulness, and such as might be expected from the dresser of a vineyard, from whom it is not required that he should change the nature of the vine. 'What ought to have been done more,' so it may be read; they had every thing requisite for instruction and direction in their duty, for the quickening of them to it, and putting them in mind of it. No inducements were wanting to persuade them to it; but all arguments were used, proper to work either upon hope or fear; and they had all the opportunities they could desire for the performance of their duty, the new moons, and the sabbaths, and solemn feasts; they had the Scriptures, the lively oracles, a standing ministry in the priests and Levites, besides what was extraordinary, in the prophets. No nation had statutes and judgments so righteous.

2. Nor could any tolerable excuse be offered for their walking thus contrary to God. Wherefore, what reason can be given why it should bring forth wild grapes, when I looked for grapes? Note, The wickedness of those that profess religion, and enjoy the means of grace, is the most unreasonable, unaccountable thing in the world; and the whole blame of it must lie upon the sinners themselves. "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it," and shalt not have a word to say for thyself in the judgment of the great day. God will prove his own ways equal, and the sinners' ways unequal.

Fourthly. Their doom read, and a righteous sentence passed upon them for their ill carriage towards God, ver. 5, 6. "And now go to," since nothing can be offered in excuse for the crime, or arrest of the judgment, "I will tell you what" I am now determined "to do to my vineyard;" I will be vexed and troubled with it no more, since it will be good for nothing, it shall be good for nothing. In short, it shall cease to be a vineyard, and be turned into a wilderness; the church of the Jews shall be unchurched, their charter shall be taken away, and they shall become "Lo-ammi, not my people." 1. They shall no longer be distinguished as a peculiar people, but be laid in common. "I will take away the hedge thereof," and then it will soon be eaten up, and become as bare as other ground. They mingled themselves with the nations, and therefore were justly scattered among them. 2. They shall no longer be protected as God's people, but left exposed. God will not only suffer the wall to go to decay, but he will break it down, will remove all their defences from them; and then they become an easy prey to their enemies, who had long is twice feebly rendered "influence" by Barnes and some others. But the opinion that the operation of the Holy Spirit is meant is strongly urged by others; and if rightly, the words offer a remarkable parallel to Matt. iii. 10—12. That the word rendered "burning" means "sifting" or "removal" is conjectural, but even if one or other of them could be established, the fundamental idea of the destruction of evil would remain.

v. 1. The curious idiom, "the horn of the son of oil," as the margin puts it, for "a very fruitful hill," deserves notice. Those who suggest that horn is here put for "the sharp peak of a mountain" forget that in such a situation vines would not grow. In Zech iv. 14 a similar phrase, "sons of oil," is rendered "anointed ones;" but a place and not a person must be meant here. We strongly incline to believe that the idea is of a vineyard in a prominent place in an olive-garden. If the Hebrew had gan shamen, instead of ben shamen, this explanation would be necessary.

waited for an opportunity to do them a mischief, and will now tread them down and trample upon them. 3. They shall no longer have the face of a vineyard, the form and shape of a church and commonwealth; but shall be levelled and laid waste. This was fulfilled when Jerusalem, for their sakes, was ploughed as a field, Mic. iii. 12. 4. No more pains shall be taken with them by magistrates or ministers, the dressers and keepers of their vineyard. "It shall not be pruned nor digged," but everything shall run wild, and nothing shall come up but briars and thorns, the products of sin and the curse, Gen. iii. 18. When errors and corruptions, vice and immorality, go without check or control, no testimony borne against them, no rebuke given them, or restraint put upon them, the vineyard is unpruned, is not dressed or ridded; and then it will soon be like the vineyard of the man void of understanding—all grown over with thorns. 5. That which completes its woe is, that the dews of heaven shall be withheld. He that hath the key of the clouds will command them "that they rain no rain upon it;" and that alone is sufficient to turn it into a desert. Note, God, in a way of righteous judgment, denies his grace to those that have long received it in vain. The sum of all is, they that would not bring forth good fruit should bring forth none. The curse of barrenness is the punishment of the sin of barrenness, as Mar. xi. 14. This had its accomplishment in part in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; its full accomplishment in the final rejection of the Jews; and has its frequent accomplishment in the departure of God's Spirit from those persons that have long resisted him and striven against him; and the removal of his Gospel from those places that have been long a reproach to it, while it hath been an honour to them. It is no loss to God to lay his vineyard waste; for he can, when he pleaseth, turn a wilderness into a fruitful field; and when he does thus dismantle a vineyard, it is but as he did by the garden of Eden, which, when man had by sin forfeited his place in, it was soon levelled with common soil.

Fifthly. The reddition of this parable, or a key to it, ver. 7, where we are told, 1. What is meant by the vineyard. It is the house of Israel, the body of the people, incorporated in one church and commonwealth; and what by the vines, the pleasant plants, the plants of God's pleasure, which he had been pleased in and delighted in doing good to, they are the men of Judah; these he had dealt graciously with, and from them he expected suitable returns. 2. What is meant by the grapes that were expected, and the wild grapes that were produced. He "looked for judgment and righteousness," that the people should be honest in all their dealings, and the magistrates should strictly administer justice. This might reasonably be expected among a people that had such excellent laws, and rules of justice given them, Deu. iv. 8. But it was quite otherwise; instead of judgment there was the cruelty of the oppressors, and instead of righteousness the cry of the oppressed. Every thing was carried by clamour and noise, and not by equity, and according to the merits of the cause. It is sad with a people when wickedness hath usurped the place of judgment, Eccl. iii. 16; very sad with a soul when, instead of the grapes of humility, meekness, patience, love, and contempt of the world, which God looks for, there are the wild grapes of pride, passion, discontent, malice, and contempt of God; instead of the grapes of praying and praising, the wild grapes of cursing and swearing, which are a great offence to God. Some of the ancients apply this to the Jews in Christ's time, among whom God looked for righteousness; that is, that they should have received and embraced Christ, but behold a cry, that cry, "Crucify him, crucify him."

8 Woe unto them that join house to house,
That lay field to field,
Till there be no place,
That they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth!
9 In mine ears said the LORD of hosts,
Of a truth many houses shall be desolate,
Even great and fair, without inhabitant.
10 Yea, ten acres of vineyard shall yield one bath,
And the seed of an homer shall yield an ephah.
11 Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink;
That continue until night, till wine inflame them!

EGYPTIAN FEAST.

12 And the harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe,
And wine, are in their feasts:
But they regard not the work of the LORD,
Neither consider the operation of his hands 13 Therefore my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge:
And their honourable men are famished,
And their multitude dried up with thirst
14 Therefore hell hath enlarged herself,
And opened her mouth without measure:
And their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp,
And he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it.
15 And the mean man shall be brought down,
And the mighty man shall be humbled
And the eyes of the lofty shall be humbled:
16 But the LORD of hosts shall be exalted in judgment,
And God that is holy shall be sanctified in righteousness.
17 Then shall the lambs feed after their manner,
And the waste places of the fat ones shall strangers eat.

The world and the flesh are the two great enemies that we are in danger of being overpowered by, and yet in no danger, if we do not ourselves yield to them. Eagerness of the world, and indulgence of the flesh, are the two sins against which the prophet in God's name here denounceth woe; sins which then abounded among the men of Judah, and were some of the wild grapes they brought forth, ver. 4, and for which God threatens to bring ruin upon them; and sins which we have all need to stand upon our guard against, and dread the consequences of.

First. Here is a woe to those that set their hearts upon the wealth of the world, and place their happiness in that, and increase it to themselves by indirect and unlawful means; ver. 8, "that join house to house, and lay field to field, till there be no place," no room for any body to live by them; but by their good-will they would "be placed alone in the midst of the earth," would monopolize possessions and preferments, and engross all profits and employments to themselves. Not that it is a sin for those that have a house and a field, if they have wherewithal, to purchase another. But their fault is, 1. That they are inordinate in their desires to enrich themselves, and make it their whole care and business to raise an estate, as if they had nothing to mind, nothing to seek, nothing to do in this world but that. They never know when they have enough; but the more they have the more they would have; and, like the daughters of the horseleech, they cry, Give, give; cannot enjoy what they have, nor do good with it, for contriving and studying to make it more. They must have variety of houses, a winter-house, and a summer-house; and, if another man's house or field lie convenient to theirs, as Naboth's vineyard to Ahab's, they must have that too, or they cannot be easy; and, 2. That they are herein careless of others; nay, and injurious to them. They would live so as to let no body live but themselves; so that their insatiable covetings be gratified they matter not what becomes of all about them, what encroachments they make upon their neighbour's rights, what hardships they put upon those that they have power over, or advantage against, nor what base and wicked arts they use to heap up treasure to themselves. They would swell so big as to fill all space, and yet are still unsatisfied, Eccl. v. 10. As Alexander who, when he fancied he had conquered the world, wept because he had not another world to conquer; Deficiente terra, non impletur Avaritia,—'If the whole earth were monopolized, Avarice would thirst for more.' 'What, will you be placed alone in the midst of the earth?' so some read it. Will you be so foolish as to desire it, when we have so much need of others' service, and so much comfort in others' society? So foolish as to expect it, that the earth should be forsaken for us? Job xviii. 4; when it is by multitudes that the earth is to be replenished? An propter vos solos tanta terra creata est?—'Was the wide world created merely for you?'—Lyra.

Now that which is threatened as the punishment of this sin is, that neither the houses nor the fields they were thus greedy of should turn to any account, ver. 9, 10. God whispered it to the prophet in his ear, as he speaks in a like case, ch. xxii. 14, "It was revealed in mine ears by the Lord of hosts;" as God told Samuel a thing in his ear, 1 Sam. ix. 15; he thought he heard it still sounding in his ears; but he proclaims it as he ought to do, upon the housetops, Mat. x. 27. 1. That the houses they were so fond of should be untenanted, should stand long empty, and so should yield them no rent, and go out of repair. "Many houses shall be desolate," the people that should dwell in them being cut off by sword, famine, or pestilence, or carried into captivity; or, trade being dead, and poverty coming upon the country like an armed man, those that had been housekeepers, were forced to become lodgers, or shift for themselves elsewhere. Even great and fair houses that would invite tenants, and there being a scarcity of tenants, might be taken at low rates, yet shall stand empty without inhabitants. God created not the earth in vain; he formed it to be inhabited, ch. xlv. 18; but men's projects are often frustrated, and what they frame answers not the intention. We have a saying, that fools build houses for wise men to live in; but sometimes it proves, for no man to live in. God has many ways to empty the most populous cities. 2. That the fields they were so fond of should be unfruitful, ver. 10. Ten acres of vineyard shall yield only such a quantity of grapes as will make but one bath of wine, which was about eight gallons; and the seed of an homer, a bushel's sowing of ground, shall yield but an ephah, which was the tenth part of an homer. So that, through the barrenness of the ground, or the unseasonableness of the weather, they should not have beyond a tenth part of their seed again. Note, Those that set their hearts upon the world will justly be disappointed in their expectations from it.

Secondly. Here is a woe to those that dote upon the pleasures and delight of sense, ver. 11, 12. Sensuality ruins men as certainly as worldliness and oppression. As Christ pronounced a woe against those that are rich, so also against those that laugh now, and are full, Lu. vi. 24, 25; and fare sumptuously Lu. xvi. 19.

1. Who the sinners are against whom this woe is denounced. 1st. They are such as are given to drink, they make it their business, have their hearts upon it, and overcharge themselves with it. They rise early to follow strong drink, as husbandmen and tradesmen do to follow their employments, as if they were afraid of losing time from that which is the greatest mispending of time. Whereas commonly they that are drunk are drunk in the night, when they have despatched the business of the day, these neglect business, abandon it, and give up themselves to the service of the flesh; for they sit at their cups all day, and "continue till night, till wine inflame them," inflame their lusts, (chambering and wantonness follow upon rioting and drunkenness,) inflame their passions; for who but they have contentions and wounds without cause? Pr. xxiii. 29—33. They make a perfect trade of drinking. Nor seek they the shelter of the night for this work of darkness, as men ashamed of it, but "count it a pleasure to riot in the daytime:" see 2 Pet. ii. 13. 2nd. They are such as are given to mirth. They have their feasts, and they are so merrily disposed that they cannot dine or sup without music; musical instruments of all sorts, like David, Am. vi. 5; like Solomon, Eccl. ii. 8. The harp and the viol, the tabret and pipe, must accompany the wine, that every sense may be gratified to a nicety; they take the timbrel and harp, Job xxi. 12. The use of

v. 2. The permanent character of a vineyard, and its importance in other respects, called for such special outlay of labour and money as this verse implies. For "wild grapes" Barnes has "poisonous berries," but not with good reason. No doubt the word means fruit of bad quality—late, small, sour, &c. The wild crabs and pears of this country differ in the same way from good, cultivated fruit. The wine-press was made (Heb. hewed) in the vineyard in accordance with custom, and such wine-presses still remain among the antiquities of the country—hewn out of the solid rock, and in excellent preservation.

v. 10. The Hebrew for "acre" is a yoke, signifying perhaps the average quantity of land ploughed in one day by a yoke of oxen. Ten acres would be a large piece of land. A bath was a measure of liquids equal to about seven gallons and a half. As wine is meant, the produce of the vineyard would be only three quarts per acre—a merely nominal quantity. A homer is roughly estimated at eight bushels.

music is lawful in itself; but when it is excessive, when we set our hearts upon it, mispend time in it, so that it crowds our spiritual and divine pleasures, and draws away the heart from God, then it turns into sin to us. 3rd. They are such as never give their mind to any thing that is serious; "They regard not the works of the Lord," they observe not his power, wisdom, and goodness, in those creatures which they abuse, and subject to vanity; nor the bounty of his providence, in giving them those good things which they make the food and fuel of their lusts. God's judgments have already seized them, and they are under the tokens of his displeasure; but they regard not, they consider not the hand of God in all these things; his hand is lifted up, but they will not see, because they will not disturb themselves in their pleasures, nor think what God is doing with them.

2. What the judgments are, which are denounced against them, and in part executed. It is here foretold,

1st. That they should be dislodged. The land should spue out these drunkards; ver. 13, "My people" (so they called themselves, and were proud of it,) "are therefore gone into captivity;" are as sure to go as if they were gone already, "because they have no knowledge." How should they, when by their excessive drinking they make sots and fools of themselves? They set up for wits; but because they regard not God's controversy with them, nor take any care as to their peace with him, they may truly be said to have no knowledge, and the reason is, because they will have none; inconsiderate and wilful, and therefore "destroyed for lack of knowledge."

2nd. That they should be impoverished, and come to want that which they had wasted and abused to excess. Even their 'glory are men of famine,' subject to it, and slain by it, "and their multitude are dried up with thirst:" both the great men and the common people are ready to perish for want of bread and water. This is the effect of the corn failing; ver. 10, for "the king himself is served of the field," Eccl. v. 9; and when the vintage fails the drunkards are called upon to weep, because "the new wine is cut off from their mouth," Joel i. 5; and not so much because now they want it as because when they had it they abused it. It is just with God to make men want that for necessity which they have abused to excess.

3rd. That multitudes should be cut off by famine and sword; ver. 14, "Therefore hell hath enlarged herself." Tophet, the common burying-place, proves too little, and so many are there to be buried, that they shall be forced to enlarge it; the grave hath opened her mouth without measure, never saying, It is enough, Pr. xxx. 15, 16. It may be understood of the place of the damned. Luxury and sensuality fill those regions of darkness and horror; there they are tormented who made a god of their belly, Lu. xvi. 25; Phil. iii. 19.

4th. That they should be humbled and abased, and all their honours laid in the dust. This will be done effectually by death and the grave; their glory shall descend, not only to the earth, but into it; it shall not descend after them, Ps. xlix. 17, to stand them in any stead on the other side death, but it shall die and be buried with them; poor glory, which will thus wither! Did they glory in their numbers? their multitude shall go down to the pit, Eze. xxxi. 18; xxxii. 32. Did they glory in the figure they made? their pomp shall be at an end; their shouts with which they triumphed and were attended. Did they glory in their mirth? death will turn it into mourning. He that rejoiceth and revelleth, and never knows what it is to be serious, shall go thither where there is weeping and wailing. Thus the mean man and the mighty man meet together in the grave, and under mortifying judgments. Let a man be never so high, death will bring him low; never so mean, death will bring him lower; in the prospect of which the eyes of the lofty should now be humbled, ver. 15. It becomes those to look low that must shortly be laid low.

3. What the fruit of these judgments shall be.

1st. God shall be glorified, ver. 16. He that is the Lord of hosts, and the holy God, shall be exalted and sanctified in the judgment and righteousness of these dispensations. His justice must be owned in bringing those low that exalted themselves, and herein he is glorified, First. As a God of irresistible power. He will herein be exalted as the Lord of hosts, that is able to break the strongest, humble the proudest, and tame the most unruly. Power is not exalted but in judgment. It is the honour of God that, though he has a mighty arm, yet judgment and justice are always the habitation of his throne, Ps. lxxxix. 13, 14. Secondly. As a God of unspotted purity. He that is holy, infinitely holy, shall be sanctified; that is, shall be owned and declared to be so in the righteous punishment of all proud men. Note, When proud men are humbled, the great God is honoured, and ought to be honoured by us.

2nd. Good people shall be relieved and succoured; ver. 17, "Then shall the lambs feed after their manner." The meek ones of the earth, who follow the Lamb, that were persecuted and put into fear by those proud oppressors, shall feed quietly, feed in the green pastures, and there shall be none to make them afraid: see Eze. xxxiv. 14. When the enemies of the church are cut off, then have the churches rest; they shall 'feed at their pleasure,' so some read it. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth, and delight themselves in abundant peace." They shall feed according to their order or capacity, so others read it; as they are able to hear the word, that bread of life.

3rd. The country should be laid waste, and become a prey to the neighbours. "The waste places of the fat ones," the possessions of those rich men that lived at their ease, those shall be eaten by strangers, that were nothing akin to them. In the captivity the poor of the land were left for vine-dressers and husbandmen, 2 Kin. xxv. 12; those were the lambs that fed in the pastures of the fat ones, which were laid in common for strangers to eat. When the church of the Jews, those fat ones, was laid waste, their privileges were transferred to the Gentiles, who had been long strangers; and the lambs of Christ's flock were welcome to them.

18 Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity,
And sin as it were with a cart rope:
19 That say, Let him make speed, and hasten his work,
That we may see it: [and come,
And let the counsel of the Holy One of Israel draw nigh
That we may know it!
20 Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil;
That put darkness for light, and light for darkness;
That put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!
21 Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes,
And prudent in their own sight!
22 Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine,
And men of strength to mingle strong drink:
23 Which justify the wicked for reward,
And take away the righteousness of the righteous from [him!
24 Therefore as the fire devoureth the stubble,
And the flame consumeth the chaff,
So their root shall be as rottenness,
And their blossom shall go up as dust:
Because they have cast away the law of the LORD of hosts,
And despised the word of the Holy One of Israel.
25 Therefore is the anger of the LORD kindled against his people,
And he hath stretched forth his hand against them,
And hath smitten them: and the hills did tremble,
And their carcases were torn in the midst of the streets.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.
26 And he will lift up an ensign to the nations from far
And will hiss unto them from the end of the earth;
And, behold, they shall come with speed swiftly:
27 None shall be weary nor stumble among them;
None shall slumber nor sleep;
Neither shall the girdle of their loins be loosed,
Nor the latchet of their shoes be broken:
28 Whose arrows are sharp,
And all their bows bent,
Their horses' hoofs shall be counted like flint,
And their wheels like a whirlwind:
29 Their roaring shall be like a lion,
They shall roar like young lions:
Yea, they shall roar, and lay hold of the prey,
And shall carry it away safe, and none shall deliver it.
30 And in that day they shall roar against them like the roaring of the sea: [sorrow,
And if one look unto the land, behold darkness and
And the light is darkened in the heavens thereof.

Here is, First. Sins described which will bring judgments upon a people; and this, perhaps, is not only a charge drawn up against the men of Judah that lived at that time, and the particular articles of that charge, though it may relate primarily to them, but is rather intended for warning to all people in all ages to take heed of these sins, as destructive both to particular persons and to communities, and exposing men to God's wrath, and his righteous judgments. Those are here said to be in a woful condition,

1. That are eagerly set upon sin, and violent in their sinful pursuits; ver. 18, "that draw iniquity with cords of vanity;" that take as much pains to sin as the cattle do that draw in a team; put themselves to the stretch for the gratifying of their inordinate appetites, and to humour a base lust offer violence to nature itself! They think themselves as sure of compassing their wicked projects as if they were pulling it to them with strong cart-ropes; but will find themselves disappointed, for they will prove cords of vanity, which will break when they come to any stress; for "the righteous Lord will cut in sunder the cords of the wicked," Ps. cxxix. 4; Job iv. 8; Pr. xxii. 8. They are by long custom and confirmed habits so hardened in sin that they cannot get clear of it. Those that sin through infirmity, are drawn away by sin; those that sin presumptuously draw it to them, in spite of the oppositions of providence, and the checks of conscience. Some by sin understand the punishment of sin, they pull God's judgments upon their own heads, as it were, with cart-ropes.

2. That set the justice of God at defiance, and challenge the Almighty to do his worst; ver. 19, "They say, Let him make speed and hasten his work." This is the same language with that of the scoffers of the last days, that say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" And therefore it is that, like them, they "draw iniquity with cords of vanity," are violent and daring in sin, and walk after their own lusts, 2 Pet. iii. 1, 3, 4. 1st. They ridicule the prophets, and banter them. It is in scorn that they call God the Holy One of Israel, because the prophets used with great veneration to call him so. 2nd. They will not believe the revelation of God's wrath from heaven, against their ungodliness and unrighteousness; unless they see it executed they will not know it; as if the curse were brutum fulmen,—'a mere flash,' and all the threatenings of the Word bugbears to frighten fools and children. 3rd. If God should appear against them, as he hath threatened, yet they think themselves able to make their part good with him, and provoke him to jealousy, as if they were stronger than he, 1 Cor. x. 22. We have heard his word, but it is all talk; let him hasten his work, we shall shift for ourselves well enough. Note, Those that wilfully persist in sin consider not the power of God's anger.

3. That confound and overthrow the distinctions between moral good and evil; "that call evil good, and good evil," ver. 25; that not only live in the omission of that which is good, but condemn it, argue against it; and, because they will not practise it themselves, run it down in others, and fasten ill characters upon it; not only do that which is evil, but justify it and applaud it, and recommend it to others as safe and good. Note, 1st. Virtue and piety is good, for it is light and sweet, it is pleasant and right; but sin and wickedness is evil, it is darkness, all the fruit of ignorance and mistake, and it will be bitterness in the latter end. 2nd. Those do a great deal of wrong to God, and religion, and conscience, to their own souls, and to the souls of others, who misrepresent these, and put false colours upon them, who call drunkenness 'good fellowship,' and covetousness 'good husbandry,' and when they per-

Now eight bushels of seed would ordinarily yield some hundreds of bushels as a crop, whereas here the result is but one ephah, or the tenth part of the seed sown. The lesson is obvious.

v. 11. The word for "strong drink" does not mean ardent spirits, which were then unknown; but, like "wine" here, it may include intoxicating liquors generally.

v. 17. For "after their manner" some explain "without restraint," and others "according to (or, as in) their pasture," which last we prefer. The second clause may mean that what fat or wealthy sinners have deserted shall be consumed by strangers: other flocks shall feed where they once revelled.

v. 18. The idea is, "Woe unto them who proceed from one degree of sinful violence to another."

v. 25. For "torn" the margin reads "as dung," and probably filth or refuse is meant.

v. 26. Hissing or whistling is by some referred to the calling of secute the people of God, think they do him good service; and, on the other hand, who call seriousness ill-nature, and sober singularity ill-breeding; who say all manner of evil falsely concerning the ways of godliness, and do what they can to form in men's minds prejudices against them. And this in defiance of evidence as plain and convincing as that of sense, by which we distinguish beyond contradiction between light and darkness, and that which to the taste is sweet or bitter.

4. That, though they are guilty of such gross mistakes as these, yet they have a great opinion of their own judgments, and value themselves mightily upon their understanding; ver. 21, "they are wise in their own eyes;" they think themselves able to disprove and baffle the reproofs and convictions of God's word, and to evade and elude both the searches and the reaches of his judgments; that they can outwit Infinite Wisdom, and countermine Providence itself. Or it may be taken more generally: God resists the proud, those particularly that are conceited of their own wisdom, and lean to their own understanding; such must become fools, that they may be truly wise, or else at the end they shall appear to be fools before all the world.

5. That they gloried in it as a great accomplishment, that they were able to bear a great deal of strong liquor, without being overcome by it; ver. 22, "that are mighty to drink wine," and use their strength and vigour, not in the service of their country, but in the service of their lusts. Let drunkards know from this scripture that, 1st. They ungratefully abuse their bodily strength, which God hath given them for good purposes, and by degrees cannot but weaken it. 2nd. It will not excuse them from the guilt of drunkenness, that they can drink hard and yet keep their feet. 3rd. Those that boast of their drinking down others glory in their shame. 4th. How light soever men make of their drunkenness, it is a sin which will certainly lay them open to the wrath and curse of God.

6. That their judges in their administrations perverted justice, and went counter to all the rules of equity, ver. 23. This followed upon the former; they "drink and forget the law," Pr. xxxi. 5, and "err through wine," Isa. xxviii. 7, and "take bribes," that they may have wherewithal to maintain their luxury. They "justify the wicked for reward," and find some pretence or other to clear him from his guilt, and shelter him from punishment; and they condemn the innocent, and "take away their righteousness" from them, that is, overrule their pleas, deprive them of the means of clearing up their innocency, and give judgment against them. In causes between man and man, might and money would at any time prevail against right and justice; and he that was never so plainly in the wrong, yet with a small bribe should carry the cause and recover costs. In criminal causes, though the prisoner never so plainly appeared to be guilty, yet for a reward they would acquit him; if he were innocent, yet if he did not fee them well, nay, if they were feed by the malicious prosecutor, or they themselves had spleen against him, they would condemn him.

Secondly. The judgments described which these sins would bring upon them. Let not those expect to live easily that live thus wickedly, for the righteous God will take vengeance, ver. 24—30. Where we may observe,

1. How complete this ruin will be, and how necessarily and unavoidably it will follow upon their sins. He had compared this people to a vine, ver. 7, well fixed, and which it was hoped would be flourishing and fruitful. But the grace of God towards it was received in vain, and then the root became rottenness, being dried up from beneath, and the blossom would of course blow off as dust, as a light and worthless thing, Job xviii. 16. Sin weakens the strength, the root of a people, so that they are easily rooted up; it defaceth the beauty, the blossoms of a people, and takes away the hopes of fruit. The sin of unfruitfulness is punished with the plague of unfruitfulness. Sinners make themselves as stubble and chaff, combustible matter, proper fuel to the fire of God's wrath, which then of course devours and consumes them, "as the fire devours the stubble," and nobody can hinder it, or cares to hinder it. Chaff is consumed unhelped and unpitied.

2. How just the ruin will be. "Because they have cast away the law of the Lord of hosts," and would not have him to reign over them; and, as the law of Moses was rejected and thrown off, so "the word of the Holy One of Israel," by his servants the prophets, putting them in mind of his law, and calling them to obedience, was despised and disregarded. God doth not reject men for every transgression of his law and word, but when his word is despised, and his law cast away, what can they expect but that God should utterly abandon them?

3. Whence this ruin should come; ver. 25, it is destruction from the Almighty. 1st. The justice of God appoints it; for that is the anger of the Lord which is kindled against his people, his necessary vindication of the honour of his holiness and authority. 2nd. The power of God effects it. He "hath stretched forth his hand against them;" that hand which had many a time been stretched out for them against their enemies is now stretched out against them, at full length, and in its full strength; and "who knows the power of his anger?" Whether they are sensible of it or no, it is God that hath smitten them, hath blasted their vine, and made it wither.

4. The consequences and continuance of this ruin. When God comes forth in wrath against a people, "the hills tremble;" fear seizeth even their great men, that are strong and high; the earth shakes under men, and is ready to sink; and as this feels dreadful, (what doth more so than an earthquake?) so what sight can be more frightful than the carcases of men torn with dogs, or thrown 'as dung' (so the margin reads it) 'in the midst of the streets.' This intimates that great multitudes should be slain, not only soldiers in the field of battle, but the inhabitants of their cities put to the sword in cold blood, and that the survivors should neither have hands nor hearts to bury them. This is very dreadful, and yet such is the merit of sin, that "for all this God's anger is not turned away;" that fire will burn as long as there remains any of the stubble and chaff to be fuel for it; and his hand which he stretched forth against his people to smite them, because they do not by prayer take hold of it, nor by reformation submit themselves to it, is stretched out still.

5. The instruments that should be employed in bringing this ruin upon them. It should be done by the incursions of a foreign enemy, that should lay all waste. No particular enemy is named, and therefore we are to take it as a prediction of all the several judgments of this kind which God brought upon the Jews: Sennacherib's invasion soon after, and the destruction of Jerusalem, by the Chaldeans first, and at last by the Romans; and I think it is to be looked upon also as a threatening of the like desolation of those countries which harbour and countenance those sins mentioned in the foregoing verses; it is an exposition of those woes. When God designs the ruin of a provoking people,

1st. He can send a great way off for instruments to be employed in it. He can raise forces from afar, and summon them "from the end of the earth" to attend his service, ver. 26. Those that know him not yet are made use of to fulfil his counsel, when by reason of their distance they can scarce be supposed to have any ends of their own to serve. If God set up his standard, he can incline men's hearts to enlist themselves under it, though perhaps themselves know not why or wherefore. When the Lord of all hosts is pleased to make a general muster of the forces he has at his command, he hath a great army presently, Joel ii. 2. 11. He needs not sound a trumpet or beat a drum to give them notice, or to animate them; no, he doth but hiss to them, or rather, whistle to them, and that is enough; they hear that, and that puts courage into them. Note, God has all his creatures at his beck.

2nd. He can make them come into the service with incredible expedition; "Behold, they shall come with speed swiftly." Note, First. Those that will do God's work must not loiter, must not linger, nor shall they, when his time is come. Secondly. Those that defy God's judgments will be ashamed of their insolence when it is too late; they said scornfully, ver. 19, "Let him make speed, let him hasten his work," and they shall find to their terror and confusion that so he will. "In one hour is the judgment come."

3rd. He can carry them on in the service with amazing forwardness and fury. This is described here in very elegant and lofty expressions, ver. 27—30. First. Though their marches be very long, yet "none among them shall be weary;" so desirous shall they be to engage, that they shall forget their weariness, and make no complaints of it. Secondly. Though the way be rough, and perhaps embarrassed by the usual policies of war, yet "none among them shall stumble," but all the difficulties in their way shall easily be got over. Thirdly. Though they are forced to keep constant watch, yet "none shall slumber or sleep;" so intent shall they be upon their work, in prospect of having the plunder of the city for their pains. Fourthly. They shall not desire any rest or relaxation; they shall not put off their clothes, not "loose the girdle of their loins," but shall always have their belts on, and swords by their sides. Fifthly. They shall not meet with the least hindrance to retard their march, or oblige them to halt; not a "latchet of their shoes shall be broken," which they must stay to mend, as Jos. ix. 13. Sixthly. Their arms and ammunition should all be fixed, and in good posture; their arrows sharp, to wound deep, and "all their bows bent," none unstrung, for they expect to be upon action presently. Seventhly. Their horses and chariots of war all fit for service; "their horses" so strong, so hardy, that their "hoofs should be like flint," far from being beaten, or made tender by their long march; and "the wheels" of their chariots, not broken or battered, or out of repair, but swift "like a whirlwind," turning round so strongly upon their axle-trees. Eighthly. All the soldiers bold and daring; ver. 29, "their roaring," or shouting before a battle, "shall be like a lion," who with his roaring animates himself, and terrifies all about him. They that would not hear the voice of God speaking to them by his prophets, but stopped their ears against their charms, shall be made to hear the voice of their enemies roaring against them, and shall not be able to turn a deaf ear to it; "they shall roar like the roaring of the sea" in a storm, it roars and threatens to swallow up, as the lion roars and threatens to tear in pieces. Ninthly. There shall not be the least prospect of relief or succour. The enemy shall come in like a flood, and there shall be none to lift up a standard against him; he shall seize the prey, and none shall deliver it, none shall be able to deliver it, nay, none shall so much as dare to attempt the deliverance of it, but give it up for gone. Let the distressed look which way they will, every thing appears dismal; for if God frown upon us how can any creature smile? 1*st*. Look round to the earth, to the land, to that land that used to be a land of light, and the joy of the whole earth, and behold darkness and sorrow, all frightful, all mournful, nothing hopeful. 2*nd*. Look up to heaven, and there the light is darkened, where one would expect to have found it. If the light is darkened in the heavens, how great is that darkness! If God hide his face, no marvel the heavens hide theirs, and appear gloomy, Job xxxiv. 29. It is our wisdom, by keeping a good conscience, to keep all clear between us and heaven, that we may have light from above, when clouds and darkness are round about us.

CHAPTER VI.

Hitherto, it should seem, Isaiah had prophesied as a candidate, having only a virtual and implicit commission; but here we have him, if I may so speak, solemnly ordained and set apart to the prophetical office by a more express, explicit commission, as his work grew upon his hands; or, perhaps, having seen little success of his ministry, he began to think of giving it up; and therefore God saw fit to renew his commission here in this chapter, in such a manner as might excite and encourage his zeal and industry in the execution of it, though he seem to labour in vain. In this chapter we have, I. A very awful vision which Isaiah saw of the glory of God, ver. 1—4; the fright it put him into, ver. 5; and the relief given him against that fright by an assurance of the pardon of his sins, ver. 6, 7. II. A very awful commission which Isaiah received, to go as a prophet in God's name, ver. 8, by his preaching to harden the impenitent in sin, and ripen them for ruin, ver. 9—12, yet with a reservation of mercy for a remnant, ver. 13. And it was as an evangelical prophet that these things were shewed him, and said to him.

IN the year that king Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple. 2 Above it stood the seraphims: each one had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. 3 And one cried unto another, and said,

Holy, holy, holy, is the LORD of hosts:
The whole earth is full of his glory.

4 And the posts of the door moved at the voice of him that cried, and the house was filled with smoke.

This vision, which Isaiah saw when he was, as is said of Samuel, "established to be a prophet of the Lord," 1 Sam. iii. 20, was intended, 1. To confirm his faith, that he might himself be abundantly satisfied of the truth of those things which should afterwards be made known to him. Thus God opened the communications of himself to him, but such visions needed not to be afterwards repeated upon every revelation. Thus God appeared at first as a God of glory to Abraham, Acts vii. 2; and to Moses, Ex. iii. 2. Ezekiel's prophecies, and St. John's, begin with visions of the Divine glory. 2. To work upon his affections, that he might be possessed with such a reverence of God as would both quicken him and fix him to his service. They that are to teach others the knowledge of God ought to be well acquainted with him themselves. This vision is dated, for the greater certainty of it; it was "in the year that king Uzziah died," who had reigned for the most part as prosperously and as well as any of the kings of Judah, and reigned very long, above fifty years. About the time that he died Isaiah saw the vision of God upon a throne; for when the birds, but more usually it is thought to allude to the ancient mode of collecting swarms of bees. Here the word refers to the summoning of strong invading hosts, who are described in the following verses.

v. 30. The latter half of this verse is obscure, and translators accordingly differ; but if we substitute "clouds" for "heavens," our version may stand: "The light is darkened in (or, by) the clouds thereof, i.e., the clouds over the land."

vi. 1. When Isaiah says, "I saw the Lord," it is evident we must understand him to record a vision; but whether he was awake or asleep is not indicated. "Train" here means the train or skirts of a robe, and not a train of followers.

vi. 2. "Above it" should be "above him," according to some, though others think the throne is alluded to. The seraphim were manifestly angelical beings in a human form, but each having six wings. Such symbolical creations appear in the remains of Egypt and Assyria. (See also Ezek. i. 5, 6, &c.)

breath of princes goeth forth, and they return to the earth, this is our comfort, that the Lord shall reign for ever, Ps. cxlvi. 3, 4, 10. Israel's king dies, but Israel's God still lives. From the mortality of great and good men, we should take occasion to look up with an eye of faith to the King eternal, immortal. King Uzziah died under a cloud, for he was shut up as a leper till the day of his death. As the lives of princes have their periods, so their glory is often eclipsed; but as God is everliving, so his glory is everlasting. King Uzziah dies in an hospital, but the King of kings still sits upon his throne. What the prophet here saw is revealed to us, that we, mixing faith with that revelation, may in it, as in a glass, behold the glory of the Lord; let us turn aside therefore, and see this great sight with humble reverence.

First. See God "upon his throne," and that throne "high and lifted up," not only above other thrones, as it transcends them, but over other thrones, as it rules and commands them. Isaiah saw not Jehovah the essence of God, no man hath seen that, or can see it, but Adonai,—'his dominion.' He saw the Lord Jesus; so this vision is explained, Jno. xii. 41, that Esaias now saw Christ's "glory, and spake of him;" which is an incontestable proof of the divinity of our Saviour. He it is, who when, after his resurrection, he sat down on the right hand of God, did but sit down where he was before, Jno. xvii. 5. See the rest of the Eternal Mind; he saw "the Lord sitting," Ps. xxix. 10: see the sovereignty of the Eternal Monarch; he sits "upon a throne," a throne of glory, before which we must worship; a throne of government, under which we must be subject; and a throne of grace, to which we may come boldly. This throne is high, and lifted up above all competition and contradiction.

Secondly. See his temple, his church on earth, filled with the manifestations of his glory. His throne being erected at the door of the temple, (as princes sat in judgment in the gates,) "his train," the skirts of his robes, "filled the temple," the whole world; for it is all God's temple; and as "the heaven is his throne," so "the earth is his footstool." Or, rather, the church; which is filled, enriched, and beautified with the tokens of God's special presence.

Thirdly. See the bright and blessed attendants on his throne, in and by whom his glory is celebrated, and his government served; ver. 2, "Above the throne," as it were hovering about it, or nigh to the throne, bowing before it, with an eye to it, the seraphim stood; the holy angels, who are called seraphim, 'burners;' for "he maketh his ministers a flame of fire," Ps. civ. 4; they burn in love to God, and zeal for his glory against sin, and he makes use of them as instruments of his wrath, when he is a consuming fire to his enemies. Whether there were only two or four, or, as I rather think, "an innumerable company of angels," that Isaiah saw, is uncertain: see Dan. vii. 10. Note, It is the glory of the angels that they are seraphim, have heat proportionable to their light, have not only abundance of Divine knowledge, but of holy love. Special notice is taken of their wings, and of no other part of their appearance, because of the use they made of them, which is designed for instruction to us. They had "each of them six wings," not stretched upward, as those whom Ezekiel saw, ch. i. 11; but, 1. Four were made use of for covering, as the wings of a fowl sitting are; with the two upper wings, next the head, they covered their faces, and with the two lowest wings they covered their feet, or lower parts. This speaks their great humility and reverence in their attendance upon God, for he is greatly feared in the assembly of those saints, Ps. lxxxix. 7. They not only cover their feet, those members of the body which are less honourable, 1 Cor. xii. 23, but even their faces; though angels' faces doubtless are much fairer than those of the children of men, Acts vi. 15, yet in the presence of God they cover them, because they cannot bear the dazzling lustre of the Divine glory, and because, being conscious of an infinite distance from the Divine perfection, they are ashamed to shew their faces before the holy God, who chargeth even his angels with folly, if they should offer to vie with him, Job iv. 11. If angels be thus reverent in their attendance on God, with what godly fear should we approach his throne! else we do not the will of God as the angels do it. Yet Moses, when he went into the mount with God, took the veil from off his face, 2 Cor. iii. 18. 2. Two were made use of for flight. When they are sent on God's errand they fly swiftly, Dan. ix. 21; more swiftly with their own wings than if they flew on the wings of the wind. This teaches us to do the work of God with cheerfulness and expedition. Do angels come upon the wing from heaven to earth to minister for our good, and shall not we soar upon the wing from earth to heaven to share with them in their glory? Lu. xx. 36.

Fourthly. Hear the anthem, or song of praise, which the angels sing to the honour of Him that sits upon the throne, ver. 3. Observe, 1. How this song was sung. With zeal and fervency, they cried aloud; and with unanimity, they cried one to another, or one with another; they sung alternately, but in concert, and without the least jarring voice to interrupt the harmony. 2. What the song was; it is the same with that which is sung by the four living creatures, Rev. iv. 8. Note, 1st. Praising God always was, and will be to eternity, the work of heaven, and the constant employment of blessed spirits above, Ps. lxxxiv. 4. 2nd. The church above is the same in its praises; there is no change of time or notes there. Two things the seraphim here give God the praise of: First. His infinite perfection in himself. Here is one of his most glorious titles praised, he "is the Lord of hosts," of their hosts, of all hosts; and one of his most glorious attributes, his holiness, without which his being the Lord of hosts (or, as it is in the parallel place, Rev. iv. 8, the Lord Almighty) could not be so much as it is the matter of our joy and praise; for power, without purity to guide it, would be a terror to mankind. None of all the Divine attributes are celebrated in Scripture so as this is. God's power was spoken twice, Ps. lxii. 10, but his holiness thrice, "Holy, holy, holy." This speaks, 1*st.* The zeal and fervency of the angels in praising God; they even want words to express themselves, and therefore repeat the same again. 2*nd.* The particular pleasure they take in contemplating the holiness of God; this is a subject they love to dwell upon, to harp upon, and are loath to leave it. 3*rd.* The superlative excellency of God's holiness above that of the purest creatures. He is holy, thrice holy, infinitely holy, originally, perfectly, and eternally so. 4*th.* It may refer to the three persons in the Godhead, holy Father, holy Son, and holy Spirit; for it follows, ver. 8, "Who will go for us?" Or perhaps to that which was, and is, and is to come; for that title of God's honour is added to this song, Rev. iv. 8. Some make the angels here to applaud the equity of that sentence which God was now about to pronounce upon the Jewish nation: herein he was, and is, and will be, holy: "His ways are equal." Secondly. The manifestation of these to the children of men; "the earth is full of his glory," of the glory of his power and purity; for he is holy in all his works. Ps. cxlv. 17. The Jews thought the glory of God should be confined to their land; but it is here intimated, that in Gospel times (which are pointed to in this chapter) the glory of God should fill all the earth; the glory of his holiness, which is indeed the glory of all his other attributes. This then filled the temple, ver. 1, but in the latter days the earth shall be full of it.

Fifthly. Observe the marks and tokens of terror with which the temple was filled upon this vision of the Divine glory, ver. 4. 1. The house was shaken; not only the door, but even "the posts of the door," which were firmly fixed, "moved at the voice of him that cried," at the voice of God, that called to judgment, Ps. l. 4, at the voice of the angel that praised him. There are voices in heaven sufficient to drown all the noises of the many waters in this lower world, Ps. xciii. 3 4. This violent concussion of the temple was an indication of God's wrath and displeasure against the people for their sin; it was an earnest of the destruction of it and the city, by the Babylonians first, and afterwards by the Romans. And it was designed to strike in awe upon us. Shall walls and posts tremble before God, and shall not we tremble? 2. The house was darkened; it was filled with smoke, which was as a cloud spread upon the face of his throne, Job xxvi. 9; we cannot take a full view of it, nor order our speech concerning it, by reason of darkness. In the temple above there will be no smoke; but every thing will be seen clearly. There God dwells in light, here he makes darkness his pavilion, 2 Chr. vi. 1.

5 Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the LORD of hosts. 6 Then flew one of the seraphims unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar: 7 And he laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged. 8 Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me.

SERAPH, FROM SCULPTURES OF NINUS.

Our curiosity would lead us to inquire farther concerning the seraphims, their songs, and their services; but here we leave them, and must attend to what passed between God and his prophet. Secret things belong not to us, the secret things of the world of angels, but things revealed to and by the prophets, which concern the administration of God's kingdom among men. Now here we have,

First. The mighty consternation that the prophet was put into by the vision which he saw of the glory of God; ver. 5, "Then said I, Woe is me." I should have said, Blessed art thou who hast been thus highly favoured, highly honoured, and dignified for a time, with the privilege of those glorious beings that always behold the face of our Father. Blessed were those eyes which saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and those ears which heard the angels' praises. And one would think he should have said, Happy am I, for ever happy; nothing now shall trouble me, nothing make me blush or tremble; no, quite contrary, he cries out, "Woe is me, for I am undone." Alas! for me, I am a gone man, I shall surely die, Jud. xiii. 22, and vi. 22; I am silenced, I am struck dumb, struck dead. Thus Daniel, when he heard the words of the angel, became dumb; and there was no strength, no breath left in him, Dan. x. 15, 17. Observe,

1. What the prophet reflected upon in himself, which terrified him. "I am undone," if God deal with me in strict justice, for I have made myself obnoxious to his displeasure, "because I am a man of unclean lips." Some think he refers particularly to some rash word he had spoken, or to his sinful silence in not reproving sin with the boldness and freedom that was necessary; a sin which God's ministers have too much cause to charge themselves with, and to blush at the remembrance of it. But it may be taken more generally: I am a sinner, particularly I have offended in word, and who is there that doth not? Jas. iii. 2. We have all reason to bewail it before the Lord. 1st. That we are of unclean lips ourselves; our lips not consecrated to God. He has not had the firstfruits of our lips, Heb. xiii. 15; and, therefore, they are counted common and unclean, uncircumcised lips, Ex. vi. 30. Nay, they have been polluted with sin, we have spoken the language of an unclean heart; that evil communication which corrupts good manners, and whereby many have been defiled. We are unworthy and unmeet to take God's name into our lips. With what a pure lip did the angels praise God? But, saith the prophet, I cannot praise him so, "for I am a man of unclean lips." The best men in the world have reason to be ashamed of themselves and the best of their services, when they come to compare with the holy angels. The angels had celebrated the purity and holiness of God; and, therefore, the prophet when he reflects upon sin, calls it uncleanness; for that is the sinfulness of sin, its contrariety to the holy nature of God, and upon that account especially it should appear both hateful and frightful to us. The impurity of our lips ought to be the grief of our souls, for by our words we shall be justified or condemned. 2nd. That we dwell among those that are so too. We have reason to lament it, that not we ourselves only are polluted, but that the nature and race of mankind is so, the disease is hereditary and epidemical; which is so far from lessening our guilt, that it should rather increase our grief, especially considering that we have not done what we might have done for the cleansing of the pollutions of other people's lips; nay, we have rather learned their way, and spoken their language, as Joseph in Egypt learned the courtier's oath, Gen. xlii. 16. "I dwell in the midst of a people," who by their impudent sinnings are pulling down desolating judgments upon the land, which I, who am a sinner too, may justly expect to be involved in.

2. What gave occasion for these sad reflections at this time. "Mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts;" he saw God's sovereignty inconteatable, he is "the King;" and his power irresistible, he is "the Lord of hosts." These are comfortable truths to God's people, and yet they ought to strike an awe upon us. Note, A believing sight of God's glorious majesty should affect us all with reverence and godly fear. We have reason to be abased in the sense of that infinite distance that there is betwixt us and God; and our own sinfulness and vileness before him, and to be afraid of his displeasure. We are

vi. 4. It is now admitted by eminent critics that the words rendered "the posts of the door" mean the foundation or supports of the thresholds. The idea is that of the thresholds trembling under the feet of the prophet, as he stood on them and looked into the sacred edifice.

vi. 5. For "undone" the margin has "cut off," but there is no doubt that the general sense is that of being ruined or lost, as intended by the translators. The phrase "unclean lips," denoting sinfulness, may be accounted for by the fact that the wickedness of men's hearts is very apt to be declared by the tongue. The seraphim are beings of pure lips, who proclaim the divine holiness.

vi. 6. "A live coal" is doubtless a glowing ember, and not "a stone," as the Latin Vulgate has it. This is so evident that even the Douay translation has "a hot coal." The altar of burnt-offering here meant was not within the Temple, but in front of it, in the court of the priests. (See Lev. vi. 12.)

undone if there be not a Mediator between us and this holy God, 1 Sam. vi. 20. Isaiah was thus humbled to prepare him for the honour he was now to be called to as a prophet. Note, Those are fittest to be employed for God that are low in their own eyes, and are made deeply sensible of their own weakness and unworthiness.

Secondly. The silencing of the prophet's fears by the good and comfortable words with which the angel answered him, ver. 6, 7; one of the seraphims immediately flew to him, to purify him, and so to pacify him. Note, 1. God hath strong consolations ready for holy mourners. They that humble themselves in penitential shame and fear shall soon be encouraged and exalted. They that are struck down with the visions of God's glory shall soon be raised up again with the visits of his grace; he that tears will heal. 2. Angels are ministering spirits for the good of the saints, for their spiritual good. Here was one of the seraphims dismissed for a time from attending on the throne of God's glory, to be a messenger of his grace to a good man; and so well pleased was he with the office that he came flying to him. To our Lord Jesus himself, in his agony, "there appeared an angel from heaven strengthening him," Lu. xxii. 43. Here is,

1. A comfortable sign given him of the purging away of his sin. The seraph brought "a live coal from the altar," and touched his lips with it, not to hurt them, but to heal them; not to cauterize, but to cleanse them; for there were purifications by fire as well as by water, and the filth of Jerusalem was purged by the spirit of burning, ch. iv. 4; the blessed Spirit works as fire, Mat. iii. 11. The seraph being himself kindled with a Divine fire, put life into the prophet to make him also zealously affected; for the way to purge the lips from the uncleanness of sin is to fire the soul with the love of God. This live coal was taken from off the altar, either the altar of incense, or that of burnt offerings; for they had both of them fire burning on them continually. Nothing is powerful to cleanse and comfort the soul, but what is taken from Christ's satisfaction, and the intercession he ever lives to make in the virtue of that satisfaction. It must be a coal from his altar that must put life into us and be our peace; it will not be done with strange fire.

2. An explication of this sign. "Lo, this hath touched thy lips," to assure thee of this, that "thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged." The guilt of thy sin is removed by pardoning mercy, the guilt of thy tongue-sins, thy corrupt disposition to sin, is removed by renewing grace; and, therefore, nothing can hinder thee from being accepted with God as a worshipper, in concert with the holy angels, or from being employed for God as a messenger to the children of men. Those only who are thus purged from an evil conscience are prepared to serve the living God, Heb. ix. 14. The taking away of sin is necessary to our speaking with confidence and comfort, either to God in prayer or from God in preaching. Nor are any so fit to display to others the riches and power of gospel grace as those who have themselves tasted the sweetness and felt the influence of that grace. And those shall have their sin taken away who complain of it as a burthen, and see themselves in danger of being undone by it.

Thirdly. The renewing of the prophet's mission, ver. 8. Here is a communication between God and Isaiah about this matter. Those that would assist others in their correspondence with God must not themselves be strangers to it; for how can we expect that God should speak by us, if we never heard him speaking to us? or that we should be accepted as the mouth of others to God, if we never spoke to him heartily for ourselves? Observe here,

1. The counsel of God concerning Isaiah's mission. God is here brought in after the manner of men, deliberating and advising with himself, "Whom shall I send? and who will go for us?" God needs not either to be counselled by others or to consult with himself; he knows what he will do. But thus he would shew us that there is a counsel in his whole will; and teach us to consider our ways, and particularly that the sending forth of ministers is a work not to be done but upon mature deliberation.

Observe, 1st. Who it is that is consulting. It is the Lord God in his glory, whom he saw upon the throne high and lifted up. It puts an honour upon the ministry, that when God would send a prophet to speak in his name, he appeared in all the glories of the upper world. Ministers are the ambassadors of the King of kings; how mean soever they are, he that sends them is great. It is God in three persons; "Who will go for us?" as Gen. i. 26, "Let us make man:" Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They all concur, as in the creating, so in the redeeming and governing of man. Ministers are ordained in the same name to which all Christians are baptized. 2nd. What the consultation is. "Whom shall I send? and who will go?" some think it refers to the particular message of wrath against Israel, ver. 9, 10. Who will be willing to go on such a melancholy errand? on which they will go in the bitterness of their souls, Eze. iii. 14. But I rather take it more largely for all those messages which he was intrusted to deliver in God's name to that people, in which that hardening work was by no means the primary intention, but secondary effect of them, 2 Cor. ii. 14. "Whom shall I send?" intimating that the business was such that required a choice and well-accomplished messenger, Jer. xlix. 19. God now appeared attended with holy angels, and yet asks, "Whom shall I send?" for he would send them a prophet from among their brethren, Heb. ii. 5. Note, First. It is the unspeakable favour of God to us, that he is pleased to send us his mind by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid, and who are themselves concerned in the messages they bring. They are workers together with God, who are sinners and sufferers together with us. Secondly. It is a rare thing to find one that is fit to go for God, and to carry his messages to the children of men; "Whom shall I send?" who is sufficient? Such a degree of courage for God, and concern for the souls of men as is necessary to make a man faithful, and withal such an insight into the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven as is necessary to make a man skilful, are seldom to be met with. Such an interpreter of the mind of God is one of a thousand, Job xxxiii. 23. Thirdly. None are allowed to go for God but those that are sent by him; he will own none but those whom he appoints, Rom. x. 15. It is Christ's work to put men into the ministry, 1 Tim. i. 13.

2. The consent of Isaiah to it. "Then said I, Here am I, send me." He was to go on a melancholy errand; the office seemed to go a begging, and everybody declined it, and yet Isaiah offered himself to the service. It is an honour to be singular in appearing for God, Jud. v. 17, 18. We must not say, I would go if I thought I should have good success; but I will go, and leave the success to God: "Here am I now, send me." Isaiah had been himself in a melancholy frame, ver. 5, full of doubts and fears; but now he had the assurance of the pardon of his sin, the clouds were blown over, and he was fit for service, and forward to it. What he saith speaks, 1st. His readiness; "Here am I," a volunteer, not pressed into the service. 'Behold me,' so the word is; God saith to us, "Behold me," ch. lxv. 1, and "Here I am," ch. lviii. 9, even before we call; let us say so to him when he doth call. 2nd. His resolution; "Here I am," ready to encounter the greatest difficulties. "I have set my face as a flint," compare this with ch. l. 4—7. 3rd. His referring himself to God; Send me whither thou wilt, make what use thou pleasest of me. Send me, that is, Lord, give me commission, and full instruction; send me, and then no doubt thou wilt stand by me. And it is a great comfort to those whom God sends, that they go for God; and may therefore speak in his name, as having authority and be assured that he will bear them out.

9 And he said, Go, and tell this people,
Hear ye indeed, but understand not;
And see ye indeed, but perceive not.
10 Make the heart of this people fat,
And make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes;
Lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears,
And understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed
11 Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered,
Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant,
And the houses without man,
And the land be utterly desolate,
12 And the LORD have removed men far away,
And there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land.
13 But yet in it shall be a tenth,
And it shall return, and shall be eaten:
As a teil tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves:
So the holy seed shall be the substance thereof.

God takes Isaiah at his word, and here sends him on a strange errand, to foretell the ruin of his people, and even to ripen them for that ruin; to preach that which, by their abuse of it, would be to them a savour of death unto death. And this was to be a type and figure of the state of the Jewish church in the days of the Messiah, when they should obstinately reject the Gospel, and should thereupon be rejected of God. These verses are quoted in part, or referred to, six times in the New Testament; which intimates, that in gospel times these spiritual judgments would be most ordinarily inflicted; and though they make the least noise, and come not with observation, yet they are of all other the most dreadful. Isaiah is here given to understand these four things:

First. That the generality of the people to whom he was sent would turn a deaf ear to his preaching, and wilfully shut their eyes against all the discoveries of the mind and will of God he had to make to them; ver. 9, "Go, and tell this people," this foolish, wretched people, tell them their own, tell them how stupid and sottish they are. Isaiah must preach to them, and they will hear him indeed, but that is all; they will not heed him, they will not understand him, that is, they will not take any pains, nor use that application of mind, which is necessary to the understanding of him. They are prejudiced against that which is the true intent and meaning of what he saith, and therefore they will not understand him, or pretend they do not. They see indeed; for the vision is made plain on tables, so that he that runs may read it, but they perceive not their own concern in it; it is to them as a tale that is told. Note, There are many who hear the sound of God's word, but do not feel the power of it.

Secondly. That forasmuch as they would not be made better by his ministry, they should be made worse by it. They that were wilfully blind should be judicially blinded, ver. 10. They will not understand or perceive thee; and, therefore, thou shalt be instrumental to make their hearts fat, senseless and sensual, and so to make their ears yet more heavy, and to shut their eyes the closer, so that at length their recovery and repentance will become utterly impossible; they shall no more "see with their eyes" the danger they are in, the ruin they are upon the brink of, or the way of escape from it; they shall no more "hear with their ears" the warnings and instructions that are given them, nor "understand with their heart" the things that belong to their peace, so as to be converted from the error of their ways, and so healed. Note, 1. The conversion of sinners is the healing of them. 2. A right understanding is necessary to conversion. 3. God sometimes in a way of righteous judgment gives men up to blindness of mind, and "strong delusions, because they would not receive the truth in the love of it," 2 Thes. ii. 11, 12. "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." 4. Even the word of God oftentimes proves a means of doing this. The evangelical prophet himself "makes the heart of this people fat," not only as he foretells it, passeth this sentence upon them in God's name, and seals them under it; but as his preaching had a tendency to it, rocking some asleep in security, to whom it was a lovely song, and making others more outrageous, to whom it was a reproach, they were not able to bear it. Some looked upon the word as a privilege, and their convictions were smothered by it, Jer. vii. 4; others looked upon it as a provocation, and their corruptions were exasperated by it.

Thirdly. That the consequence of this would be their utter ruin, ver. 11, 12. The prophet had nothing to object against the justice of this sentence, nor doth he refuse to go upon such an errand, but asks, "Lord, how long?" An abrupt question; Shall it always be thus? Must I and other prophets always labour in vain among them; and will things never be better? Or, (as should seem by the answer,) Lord, what will it come to at last? What will be in the end hereof? In answer to which he is told, that it should issue in the final destruction of the Jewish church and nation. When the word of God, especially the word of the Gospel, hath been thus abused by them, they shall be unchurched, and consequently undone. Their cities shall be uninhabited, and their country houses too; the land shall be untilled, 'desolate with desolation,' as it is in the margin. The people that should replenish the houses, and cultivate the ground, being all cut off by the sword, famine, or pestilence, and those that escape with their lives being removed far away into captivity, so that there shall be a great and general forsaking in the midst of the land, that populous country shall become desert, and that glory of all lands shall be abandoned. Note, Spiritual judgments often bring temporal judgments along with them upon persons and places. This was in part fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, when the land, being left desolate, enjoyed her sabbaths seventy years; but, the foregoing predictions being so expressly applied in the New Testament to the Jews in our Saviour's time, doubtless this points at the final destruction of that people by the Romans, in which it had a complete accomplishment. And the effects of it that people and that land remain under to this day.

Fourthly. That yet a remnant should be reserved to be the monuments of mercy, ver. 13. There was so in the last destruction of the Jewish nation, Rom. xi. 5, "at this present time there is a remnant;" for so it was written vi. 7. As the smoke in verse 4 has been sometimes thought symbolic of worship, so the fire here is taken to be an emblem of purity or of purification. There can be little doubt of this, and the action is therefore regarded as an expression of the pardoning love of God.

vi. 8. The meaning of the words, "Who will go for us?" has been canvassed. Jerome thought the mystery of the Trinity was involved in them. By others it has been supposed that the phrase was in regal style, or a plural of excellence; that it indicates self-consultation; that it means God and the seraphim, &c. The ancient versions vary. Whatever the precise explanation, it seems most reasonable to regard the "us" as applicable to the Lord alone, and significant of that plurality in the divine being which is implied in the sacred names, Elohim, Adonai, and Shaddai, and declared in such texts as Gen. i. 26.

vi. 9. On this verse Professor Alexander says, "Not only is their insensibility described in the strongest terms, implying extreme folly here. "But in it shall be a tenth," a certain number, but a very small number in comparison with the multitude that shall perish in their unbelief. And it is that which under the law was God's proportion; they shall be consecrated to God, as the tithes were, and shall be for his service and honour. Concerning this tithe, this saved remnant, we are here told, 1. That it shall return, ch. vii. 3, and x. 23; shall return from sin to God and duty, shall return out of captivity to their own land. God will turn them, and they shall be turned. 2. That it shall be eaten, that is, it shall be accepted of God as the tithe was, which was meat in God's house, Mal. iii. 10. The saving of this remnant shall be meat to the faith and hope of those that wish well to God's kingdom. 3. That it shall be like a timber tree in winter, which has life though it has no leaves; "As a teil tree, and as an oak whose substance is in them," even then "when they cast their leaves." So this remnant, though they may be stripped of their outward prosperity, and share with others in common calamities, yet they shall recover themselves, as a tree in the spring, and flourish again; though they fall, they shall not be utterly cast down. "There is hope of a tree, though it be cut down, that it will sprout again," Job xiv. 7. 4. That this distinguished remnant shall be the stay and support of the public interests. The holy seed in the soul is the substance of the man; a principle of grace reigning in the heart will keep life there. He that is born of God hath his seed remaining in him, 1 Jno. iii. 9. So the holy seed in the land is the substance of the land, keeps it from being quite dissolved, and bears up the pillars of it, Ps. lxxv. 3: see ch. i. 9. Some read the foregoing clause with this, thus: 'As the support at Shallecheth is in the elms and oaks, so the holy seed is the substance thereof.' As the trees that grow on either side of the causeway, the raised way, or terrace walk that leads from the king's palace to the temple, 1 Kin. x. 5, at the gate of Shallecheth, 1 Chr. xxvi. 16, support the causeway by keeping up the earth, which would otherwise be crumbling away, so the small residue of religious, serious, praying people, are the support of the state; and help to keep things together, and save them from going to decay. Some make the holy seed to be Christ; the Jewish nation was therefore saved from utter ruin, because out of it as concerning the flesh Christ was to come, Rom. ix. 5. "Destroy it not, for that blessing is in it," ch. lxv. 8; and when that blessing was come, it was soon destroyed. Now the consideration of this is designed for the support of the prophet in his work; though far the greater part should perish in their unbelief, yet to some his word should be a savour of life unto life. Ministers do not wholly lose their labour if they be but instrumental to save one poor soul.

CHAPTER VII.

This chapter is an occasional sermon, in which the prophet sings both of mercy and judgment to those that did not perceive or understand either. He piped unto them, but they danced not; mourned unto them, but they wept not. Here is, I. The mighty fright that Ahaz was in upon an attempt of the confederate forces of Syria and Israel against Jerusalem, ver. 1, 2. II. The assurance which God, by the prophet, sent him for his encouragement, that the attempt should be defeated, and Jerusalem should be preserved, ver. 3—9. III. The confirmation of this by a sign which God gave to Ahaz, when he refused to ask one, referring to Christ and our redemption by him, ver. 10—16. IV. A threatening of the great desolation that God would bring upon Ahaz and his kingdom by the Assyrians, notwithstanding their escape of this present storm, because they went on still in their wickedness, ver. 17—25 And this is written both for our comfort and for our admonition

AND it came to pass in the days of Ahaz the son of Jotham, the son of Uzziah, king of Judah, that Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah, king of Israel, went up toward Jerusalem to war against it, but could not prevail against it. 2 And it was told the house of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim. And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind. 3 Then said the LORD unto Isaiah, Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou, and Shear-jashub thy son, at the end of the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field; 4 And say unto him,

Take heed, and be quiet;
Fear not, neither be fainthearted
For the two tails of these smoking firebrands,
For the fierce anger of Rezin with Syria, and of the son of Remaliah
5 Because Syria, Ephraim, and the son of Remaliah,
Have taken evil counsel against thee, saying,
6 Let us go up against Judah, and vex it,
And let us make a breach therein for us,
And set a king in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal:
7 Thus saith the Lord GOD,
It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass.
8 For the head of Syria is Damascus,
And the head of Damascus is Rezin;
And within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken, that it be not a people.
9 And the head of Ephraim is Samaria.
And the head of Samaria is Remaliah's son.
If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established.

The prophet Isaiah had his commission renewed in the year that king Uzziah died, ch. vi. 1. Jotham his son reigned, and reigned well, sixteen years. All that time, no doubt, Isaiah prophesied as he was commanded, and yet we have not in this book any of his prophecies dated in the reign of Jotham; but this, which is put first, was in the days of Ahaz the son of Jotham. Many excellent, useful sermons he preached, which were not published and left on record; for if all that was memorable had been written, the world could not have contained the books, Jno. xxi. 25. Perhaps in the reign of Ahaz, a wicked king, he had not opportunity to preach so much at court as in Jotham's time; and therefore then he wrote the more for a testimony against them. Here is,

First. A very formidable design laid against Jerusalem by Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel, two neighbouring potentates, who had of late made descents upon Judah severally. At the end of the reign of Jotham, "the Lord began to send against Judah, Rezin, and Pekah," 2 Kin. xv. 37; but now in the second or third year of the reign of Ahaz, encouraged by their former successes, they entered into an alliance against Judah; because Ahaz, though he found the sword over his head, began his reign with idolatry: "God delivered him into the hand of the king of Syria, and of the king of Israel," 2 Chr. xxviii. 5, and a great slaughter they made in his kingdom, ver. 6, 7. Flushed with this victory, they "went up to Jerusalem," the royal city, "to war against it," to besiege it, and make themselves masters of it; but it proved in the issue they could not gain their point. Note, The sin of a land brings foreign invasions upon it, and betrays the most advantageous posts and passes to the enemy. And God sometimes makes one wicked nation a scourge to another; but judgment ordinarily begins at the house of God.

Secondly. The great distress that Ahaz and his court were in when they received advice of this design; "It was told the house of David" that Syria and Ephraim had signed a league against Judah, ver. 2. This degenerate royal family is called the house of David, to put us in mind of that article of God's covenant with David; "If his children forsake my law, I will chasten their transgression with the rod; but my lovingkindness will I not utterly take away," which is remarkably fulfilled in this chapter, Ps. lxxxix. 30. News being brought that the two armies of Syria and Israel were joined, and had taken the field, both court, city, and country, were in a mighty consternation upon the alarm. "The heart of Ahaz was moved" with fear, and then no wonder that "the heart of his people" was so; "as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind," they were tossed and shaken, and put into a great disorder and confusion; were wavering and uncertain in their counsels, hurried hither and thither, and could not fix in any steady resolution. They yielded to the storm, and gave up all for gone, concluding it in vain to make any resistance. Now, that which caused this fight was the sense of guilt, and the weakness of their faith. They had made God their enemy, and knew not how to make him their friend, and therefore their fears tyrannized over them; while those whose consciences are kept void of offence, and whose hearts are fixed trusting in God, need not be afraid of evil tidings: though the earth be removed, yet will not they fear; but the wicked flees at the shaking of a leaf, Lev. xxvi. 36.

Thirdly. The orders and directions given to Isaiah to go and encourage Ahaz in his distress; not for his own sake, he deserved to hear nothing from God but words of terror, which might add affliction to his grief, but because he was a son of David, and king of Judah. God had kindness for him for his father's sake, who must not be forgotten, and for his people's sake, who must not be abandoned, but would be encouraged if Ahaz were. Observe,

1. God appointed the prophet to meet Ahaz, though he did not send to the prophet to speak with him, nor desire him to inquire of the Lord for him; ver. 3, "Go to meet Ahaz." Note, God is often found of those that seek him not, much more will he be found of those that seek him diligently. He speaks comfort to many who not only are not worthy of it, but do not so much as inquire after it.

2. He ordered him to take his little son with him, because he carried a sermon in his name; "Shear-jashub, a remnant shall return." The prophets sometimes recorded what they preached in the significant names of their children, as Hos. i. 4, 6, 9, therefore Isaiah's children are said to be for signs, ch. viii. 18. This son was so called for the encouragement of those of God's people who were carried captive, assuring them that they should return, at least a remnant of them, which is more than we can pretend to merit; yet at this time God was better than his word, for he not only took care that a remnant should return, but the whole number of those whom the confederate forces of Syria and Israel had taken prisoners, 2 Chr. xxviii. 15.

3. He directed him where he should find Ahaz. He was to meet with him, not in the temple, or the synagogue, or royal chapel, but "at the end of the conduit of the upper pool," where he was probably with many of his servants about him, contriving how to order the waterworks, so as to secure them to the city, or deprive the enemy of the benefit of them, ch. xxii. 9, 11; 2 Chr. xxxii. 3, 4; or giving some necessary directions for the fortifying of the city as well as they could; and perhaps finding every thing in a very bad posture of defence, the conduit out of repair, as well as other things gone to decay, his fears increased, and he was now in greater perplexity than ever; therefore go meet him there. Note, God sometimes sends comforts to his people very seasonably; and what time they are most afraid encourageth them to trust in him.

4. He puts words in his mouth, else the prophet would not have known how to bring a message of good to such an ill man, a sinner in Zion, that ought to be afraid. But God intended it for the support of faithful Israelites.

1st. The prophet must rebuke their fears, and advise them by no means to yield to them; but keep their temper, and preserve the possession of their own souls; ver. 4, "Take heed, and be quiet." Note, In order to comfort, there is need of caution; that we may be quiet, it is necessary that we take heed, and watch against those things that threaten us to disquiet us. Fear not with this amazement, this fear that weakens, and hath torment; neither "let thy heart be tender," so as to melt and fail within thee; but pluck up thy spirits, have a good heart on it, and be courageous. Let not fear betray the succours which reason and religion offer for thy support. Note, Those who expect God should help them must help themselves, Ps. xxvii. 14.

2nd. He must teach them to despise their enemies, not in pride, or security, or incogitancy, nothing more dangerous than so to despise an enemy; but in faith, and dependence upon God. Ahaz's fear called them two powerful politic princes, for either of which he was an unequal match; but, if united, he durst not look them in the face, or make head against them. No, saith the prophet, they are "two tails of smoking firebrands;" they are angry, they are fierce, they are furious as firebrands, as fireballs, and they make one another worse by being in a confederacy, as sticks of fire put together burn the more violently. But they are only smoking firebrands; and where there is smoke there is some fire, but it may not be so much as was feared; their threatenings will vanish into smoke. Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise, Jer. xlvi. 17, and as well as extreme guilt, but, as if to provoke them to an opposite course, they are exhorted, with a sort of solemn irony, to do the very thing which would inevitably ruin them, but with an explicit intimation of that issue in the verse ensuing." Two other views may be noticed, one of them treating the imperatives as futures, "Ye will hear, but ye will not understand," or "If ye hear, ye will not understand;" the second modifies the words, "Hear ye who do not understand," &c. If the language is not that of irony, as Professor Alexander says, it may be and is that of lofty indignation, and points to judicial chastisements in the withdrawal of grace, as signified in the verse which follows. There are men who are made worse by that which in itself is fitted to benefit and bless them.

vi. 11—13. The apostacy of Israel was to be long-continued and general, and to be accompanied by severe judgments; but a remnant was to be preserved, that the ruin might not be complete. The teil tree of verse 13 was probably the terebinth, a common evergreen.

Rezin king of Syria but a smoke; and such are all the enemies of God's church, smoking flax, that will soon be quenched. Nay, they are but tails of smoking firebrands, in a manner burnt out already; their force is spent, they have consumed themselves with the heat of their own anger; you may put your foot on them and tread them out. The two kingdoms of Syria and Israel were now near expiring. Note, The more we have an eye to God as a consuming fire, the less reason we shall have to fear men, though they are never so furious; nay, we shall be able to despise them as smoking firebrands.

3rd. He must assure them that the present design of these high allies (so they thought themselves) against Jerusalem should certainly be defeated, and come to nothing, ver. 5—7. First. That very thing which Ahaz thought most formidable is made the ground of their defeat, and that was the depth of their designs, and the height of their hopes. Therefore they shall be baffled, and sent back with shame, "because they had taken evil counsel against thee," which is an offence to God; these firebrands are a smoke in his nose, ch. lxv. 5, and therefore must be extinguished. 1*st.* They are very spiteful and malicious, and therefore they shall not prosper. Judah had done them no wrong, they had no pretence to quarrel with Ahaz; but, without any reason, "Let us go up against Judah, and vex it." Note, Those that are vexatious cannot expect to be prosperous; that love to do mischief, cannot expect to do well. 2*nd.* They are very secure, and confident of success. They will vex Judah by going up against it; yet that is not all: they do not doubt but to make a breach in the wall of Jerusalem, wide enough for them to march their army in at; or they count upon dissecting or dividing the kingdom into two parts, one for the king of Israel, the other for the king of Syria, who had agreed in one viceroy; a king to be set in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal, some obscure person, uncertain whether a Syrian or an Israelite. So sure were they of gaining their point, that they divided the prey before they caught it. Note, Those that are most scornful are commonly least successful; for surely God scorneth the scorners. Secondly. God himself gives them his word that the attempt should not take effect; ver. 7, "Thus saith the Lord God," the sovereign Lord of all, who "bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought," Ps. xxxiii. 10; he saith, "It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass." Their measures shall all be broken, and they shall not be able to bring to pass their enterprise. Note, Whatever stands against God, or thinks to stand without him, cannot stand long. Man purposeth, but God disposeth; and "who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, if the Lord commandeth it not," or countermandeth it? Lam. iii. 37: see Pr. xix. 21.

4th. He must give them a prospect of the destruction of these enemies at last, that were now such a terror to them. First. They should neither of them enlarge their dominions, nor push their conquests any farther. The head city of Syria is Damascus, and the head man of Damascus is Rezin. This he glories in, and this let him be content with, ver. 8. The head city of Ephraim hath long been Samaria, and the head man in Samaria is now Pekah the son of Remaliah; each of these shall be made to know their own; their bounds are fixed, and they shall not pass them, to make themselves masters of the cities of Judah, much less to make Jerusalem their prey. Note, As God hath appointed men the bounds of their habitation, Acts xvii. 26, so he hath appointed princes the bounds of their dominion, within which they ought to confine themselves, and not encroach upon their neighbours' rights. Secondly. Ephraim, which perhaps was the more malicious and forward enemy of the two, should shortly be quite rooted out, and should be so far from seizing other people's lands that they should not be able to hold their own. Interpreters are much at a loss how to compute the sixty-five years within which "Ephraim shall cease to be a people;" for the captivity of the ten tribes was but eleven years after this. And some make it a mistake of the transcriber, and think it should be read, 'within six and five years,' just eleven; but it is hard to allow that. Others make it to be sixty-five years from the time that the prophet Amos first foretold the ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes. And some later interpreters make it to look as far forward as the last desolation of that country by Esar-haddon, which was about sixty-five years after this; then Ephraim was so broken, that it was no more a people. Now, it was the greatest folly in the world for them to be ruining their neighbours, who were themselves marked for ruin, and so near to it. See what a prophet told them at this time, when they were triumphing over Judah, 2 Chr. xxviii. 10, "Are there not with you, even with you, sins against the Lord your God?"

5th. He must urge them to mix faith with those assurances which he had given them; ver. 9, "If ye will not believe" what is said to you, "surely ye shall not be established;" your shaken and disordered state shall not be established, your unquiet and unsettled spirits shall not. Though the things told you are very encouraging, yet they will not be so to you unless you believe them, and be willing to take God's word. Note, The grace of faith is absolutely necessary to the quieting and composing of the mind in the midst of all the tosses of this present time, 2 Chr. xx. 20.

10 Moreover the LORD spake again unto Ahaz, saying,
11 Ask thee a sign of the LORD thy God;
Ask it either in the depth, or in the height above, 12 But Ahaz said, I will not ask, neither will I tempt the 13 And he said, [LORD.
Hear ye now, O house of David;
Is it a small thing for you to weary men,
But will ye weary my God also?
14 Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign;
Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son,
And shall call his name Immanuel.
15 Butter and honey shall he eat,
That he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good 16 For before the child shall know
To refuse the evil, and choose the good,
The land that thou abhorrest
Shall be forsaken of both her kings.

Here, First. God by the prophet makes a gracious offer to Ahaz, to confirm the foregoing predictions, and his faith in them, by such sign or miracle as he should choose; ver. 10, 11, "Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God." See here the Divine faithfulness and veracity; God tells us nothing but what he is able and ready to prove. See his wonderful condescension to the children of men, in that he is so "willing to shew to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel," Heb. vi. 17. He considers our frame, and that living in a world of sense, we are apt to require sensible proofs, which therefore he has favoured us with in sacramental signs and seals. Ahaz was an ill man, yet God is called the Lord his God, because he was a child of Abraham and David, and of the covenants made with them. See how gracious God is even to the evil and unthankful. Ahaz is bidden to choose his sign, as Gideon about the fleece, Jud. vi. 37. Let him ask for a sign either in the air, or earth, or water, for God's power is the same in each.

Secondly. Ahaz rudely refuseth this gracious offer, and (which is not mannerly towards any superior) kicks at the courtesy, and puts a slight upon it; ver. 12; "I will not ask." The true reason why he would not ask for a sign was, because, having a dependence upon the Assyrians, their forces and their gods, for help, he would not thus far be beholden to the God of Israel, or lay himself under obligations to him. He would not ask a sign for the confirming of his faith, because he resolved to persist in his unbelief, and would indulge his doubts and distrusts; yet he pretends a pious reason, "I will not tempt the Lord;" as if it would be a tempting of God to do that which God himself invited and directed him to do. Note, A secret disaffection to God is often disguised with the specious colours of respect to him; and those that are resolved they will not trust God yet take on them they will not tempt him.

Thirdly. The prophet reproves him and his court, nim and the house of David, the whole royal family, for their contempt of prophecy, and the little value they had for Divine revelation; ver. 13, "Is it a small thing for you to weary men" by your oppression and tyranny, with which you make yourselves burthensome and odious to all mankind; but "will you weary my God also," with the affronts you put upon him? as the unjust judge, that "neither feared God, nor regarded man," Lu. xviii. 1. "Ye have wearied the Lord with your words," Mal. ii. 17. Nothing is more grievous to the God of heaven than to be distrusted. "Will ye weary my God?" that is, will ye suppose him to be tired and unable to help you, or to be weary of doing you good? Whereas "the youths may faint and be weary," you may have tired all your friends; but "the Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, neither is weary," ch. xl. 30, 31. Or thus, In affronting the prophets, you think you put a slight only upon men like yourselves, and consider not that you affront God himself, whose messengers they are, and put a slight upon him, who will resent it accordingly. The prophet here calls God his God, with a great deal of pleasure. Ahaz would not say, He is my God, though the prophet had invited him to say so; ver. 11, "The Lord thy God;" but Isaiah will say, He is mine. Note, Whatever others do, we must avouch the Lord for ours, and abide by him.

Fourthly. The prophet, in God's name, gives them a sign. You will not ask a sign; but the unbelief of man shall not make the promise of God of none effect, "The Lord himself shall give you a sign," ver. 14, a double sign.

1. A sign in general of his good-will to Israel and to the house of David. You may conclude he hath mercy in store for you, and that you are not forsaken of your God, how great soever your present distress and danger is; for of your nation, of your family, the Messiah is to be born, and you cannot be destroyed while that blessing is in you, which shall be introduced, 1st. In a glorious manner; for, whereas you have been often told that he should be born among you, I am now farther to tell you that he shall be born of a virgin, which will signify both the Divine power and the Divine purity with which he shall be brought into the world; that he shall be an extraordinary person, for he shall not be born by ordinary generation; and that he shall be a holy thing, not stained with the common pollutions of the human nature; therefore incontestably fit to have the throne of his father David given him. Now this, though it was to be accomplished above five hundred years after, yet was a most encouraging sign to the house of David, (and to them under that title this prophecy is directed, ver. 13,) and an assurance that God would not cast them off. Ephraim did indeed envy Judah, ch. xi. 13, and sought the ruin of that kingdom, but could not prevail, for the sceptre should never depart from Judah till the coming of Shiloh, Gen. xlix. 10. Those whom God designs for the great salvation may take that for a sign to them that they shall not be swallowed up by any trouble they may meet with in the way. 2nd. The Messiah shall be introduced on a glorious errand, wrapt up in his glorious name. They shall call his name Immanuel; that is, God with us, God in our nature, God at peace with us, in covenant with us. This was fulfilled in their calling him Jesus, a Saviour, Mat. i. 21—23; for if he had not been Immanuel, God with us, he could not have been Jesus, a Saviour. Now, this was a farther sign of God's favour to the house of David and the tribe of Judah; for he that intended to work this great salvation among them no doubt would work out for them all those other salvations which were to be the types and figures of this, and as it were preludes to this. Here is a sign for you, not in the depth or in the height, but in the prophecy, in the promise, in the covenant, made with David, which you are no strangers to; the promised seed shall be "Immanuel, God with us." Let that word comfort you, ch. viii. 10, God is with us; and ver. 8, that your land is Immanuel's land. Let not the heart of the house of David be moved thus, ver. 2; nor let Judah fear the setting up of the son of Tabeal, ver. 6; for nothing can cut off the entail on the Son of David that shall be Immanuel. Note, The strongest consolations in time of trouble are those which are borrowed from Christ, our relation to him, our interest in him, and our expectations of him and from him.

Of this child it is farther foretold, ver. 15, that though he shall not be born like other children, but of a virgin, yet he shall be really and truly man, and shall be nursed and brought up like other children; "butter and honey shall he eat," as other children do, particularly the children of that land which flowed with milk and honey. Though he be conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, yet he shall not therefore be fed with angel's food; but, as it becomes him, shall be made "in all things like unto his brethren," Heb. ii. 17. Nor shall he, though born thus by extraordinary generation, be a man immediately; but, as other children, shall advance gradually through the several states of infancy, childhood, and youth, to that of manhood, and growing in wisdom and stature, shall at length wax strong in spirit, and come to that maturity as to "know how to refuse the evil and choose the good:" see Lu. ii. 40, 52. Note, Children are fed when they are little, that they may be taught and instructed when they are grown up; they have their maintenance in order to their education.

2. Here is another sign in particular of the speedy destruction of these potent princes that were now a terror to Judah, ver. 16. "Before this child," so it should be read, this child I have now in my arms, (he means not Immanuel, but Shear-jashub his own son, whom he was ordered to take with him for a sign, ver. 3,) "before this child shall know how to refuse the evil, and choose the good," (and those who saw what his present stature and forwardness was would easily conjecture how long that would be,) before this child be three or four years older, "the land that thou abhorrest," that is, these confederate forces of Israelites and Syrians whom thou hast such an enmity to, and standest in such dread of, "shall be forsaken of both their kings," both Pekah and Rezin, who were in so close an alliance that they seemed as if they were the kings but of one kingdom. This was fully accomplished: for within two or three years after this Hoshea conspired against Pekah and slew him, 2 Kin. xv. 30; and

vii. 2. Ephraim here means the kingdom of the ten tribes, and the sense of the clause is that the Syrian invaders depended upon Israel for support in their march against Jerusalem. The preceding verse and this are illustrated by 2 Kings xvi. 5. The house of David here seems to be put for the representative ruler of the house, or Ahaz, whose heart was moved.

vii. 3. The site of the upper pool has been much discussed; but it may have been near the Jaffa gate, on the west side of Jerusalem.

vii. 4. Tails of smoking firebrands are the ends or remains of firebrands which have been burning but are approaching extinction.

vii. 6. It is not known who the son of Tabeal was, whom the allied enemies meant to make king of Judah.

vii. 8. Damascus was still to be the metropolis of Syria only; but the kingdom of Ephraim, or Israel, was to be broken up. As a fact, within sixty-five years of this date Tiglath-Pileser invaded the kingdom, the ten tribes were carried away by Shalmaneser, and foreigners before that the king of Assyria took Damascus and slew Rezin, 2 Kin. xvi. 19. Nay, there was a present event which happened immediately, and which this child carried the prediction of in his name, which was a pledge and earnest of this farther event. Shear-jashub signifies the 'remnant shall return,' which doubtless points at the wonderful return of those two hundred thousand captives which Pekah and Rezin had carried away; who were brought back, not by might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts. Read the story, 2 Ch. xxviii. 8—15. The prophetical naming of this child having thus had its accomplishment, no doubt this which was farther added concerning him should have its accomplishment likewise, that Syria and Israel should be deprived of both their kings. One mercy from God encourageth us to hope for another, if it engageth us to prepare for another.

17 The LORD shall bring upon thee,
And upon thy people, and upon thy father's house,
Days that have not come,
From the day that Ephraim departed from Judah;
Even the king of Assyria.
18 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall hiss [Egypt,
For the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of
And for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.
19 And they shall come, and shall rest all of them
In the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks,
And upon all thorns, and upon all bushes.
20 In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired,
Namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria,

KING OF NINEVEH—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

The head, and the hair of the feet:
And it shall consume the beard.
21 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That a man shall nourish a young cow, and two sheep,
22 And it shall come to pass, [eat butter:
For the abundance of milk that they shall give he shall
For butter and honey shall every one eat
That is left in the land
23 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That every place shall be, [lings,
Where there were a thousand vines at a thousand silver-
It shall even be for briers and thorns.
24 With arrows and with bows shall men come thither;
Because all the land shall become briers and thorns.
25 And on all hills that shall be digged with the mattock,
There shall not come thither the fear of briers and thorns:
But it shall be for the sending forth of oxen,
And for the treading of lesser cattle.

After the comfortable promises made to Ahaz, as a branch of the house of David, here follow terrible threatenings against him as a degenerate branch of that house; for though the lovingkindness of God shall not be utterly taken away for the sake of David, and the covenant made with him, yet his iniquity shall be chastened with the rod, and his sin with stripes. Let those that will not mix faith with the promises of God expect to hear the alarms of his threatenings.

First. The judgment threatened is very great, ver. 17. It is very great, for it is general; it shall be brought upon the prince himself,—as high as he is he shall not be out of the reach of it; and upon the people, the whole body of the nation; and upon the royal family, "upon all thy father's house;" it shall be a judgment entailed on posterity, and shall go along with the royal blood. It is very great, for it shall be unprecedented, "days that have not come;" so dark, so gloomy, so melancholy, as never were the like since the revolt of the ten tribes, when Ephraim departed from Judah, which was indeed a sad time to the house of David. Note, The longer men continue in sin the sorer punishments they have reason to expect. It is the Lord that will bring these days upon them, for our times are in his hand; and who can resist or escape the judgments he brings?

Secondly. The enemy that should be employed as the instrument of this judgment is the king of Assyria. Ahaz reposed a mighty confidence in that prince for help against the confederate powers of Israel and Syria, and minded the less what God said to him by his prophet for his encouragement, because he built much upon his interest in the king of Assyria, and had sneakingly promised to be his servant if he would send him some succours; and made him a present of gold and silver, for which he drained the treasures both of church and state, 2 Kin. xvi. 7, 8. Now God threatens that that king of Assyria whom he made his stay instead of God should become a scourge to him. He was so presently; for when he "came to him he distressed him, but strengthened him not." The reed not only broke under him, but ran into his hand and pierced it, 2 Chr. xxviii. 20; and from thenceforward the kings of Assyria were long grieving thorns to Judah, and gave them a great deal of trouble. Note, The creature that we make our hope commonly proves our hurt. The king of Assyria, not long after this, made himself master of the ten tribes, carried them captive, and laid their country waste, so as fully to answer this prediction here; and perhaps it may refer to that, as an explication of ver. 8, where it is foretold that Ephraim shall be broken, that it shall not be a people; and it is easy to suppose that the prophet, at ver. 17, turns his speech to the king of Israel, denouncing God's judgments against him for invading Judah; but the expositors universally understand it of Ahaz and his kingdom. Now observe,

1. Summons given to the invaders; ver. 18, "the Lord shall whistle for the fly and the bee:" see ch. v. 26. Enemies that seem as contemptible as a fly or a bee, and as easily crushed, yet when God pleaseth they shall do his work as effectually as lions and young lions. Though they are as far distant from one another as the rivers of Egypt and the land of Assyria, yet they shall punctually meet to join in this work when God commands their attendance; for when God hath work to do, he will not be to seek for instruments to do it with.

2. Possession taken by them, ver. 19. It should seem as if the country were in no condition to make resistance, they find no difficulties in forcing their way; but "come and rest all of them in the desolate valleys," which the inhabitants had deserted upon the first alarm, and left them a cheap and easy prey to the invaders. They shall "come and rest" in the low grounds like swarms of flies and bees, and shall render themselves impregnable by taking shelter in the holes of the rocks as bees often do; and shew themselves formidable by appearing openly "upon all thorns, and all bushes;" so generally shall the land be overspread with them. These bees shall knit upon the thorns and bushes, and there rest undisturbed.

3. Great desolations made, and the country generally depopulated; ver. 20, "The Lord shall shave the hair of the head, and beard, and feet;" that is, shall sweep all away, as the leper when he was cleansed shaved off all his hair, Lev xiv. 8, 9. This is done "with a razor that is hired," which God has hired as if he had none of his own; but what he hires, and whom he employs in any service for him, he will pay: see Eze. xxix. 18, 19. Or which Ahaz has hired for his assistance; God will make that to be an instrument of his destruction which he hired into his service. Note, Many are beaten with that arm of flesh which they trusted to rather than to the arm of the Lord, and which they were at a great expense upon; when by faith and prayer they might have found cheap and easy succour in God.

Fourthly. The consequences of this general depopulation. 1. The stocks of cattle shall be all destroyed; so that a man that had herds and flocks in abundance shall be stripped of them all by the enemy, and shall with much ado save for his own use a young cow and two sheep, a poor stock, ver. 21; yet he shall think himself happy in having any left. 2. The few cattle that are left shall have such a large compass of ground to feed in, that "they shall give abundance of milk," and very good milk, such as shall produce butter enough, ver. 22. There shall also be such want of men that the milk of one cow and two sheep shall serve a whole family, which used to keep abundance of servants and consume a great deal, but is now reduced. 3. The breed of cattle shall be destroyed; so that those who used to eat flesh, as the Jews commonly did, shall be necessitated to confine themselves to butter and honey; for there shall be no flesh for them; and the country shall be so depopulated that there shall be butter and honey enough for the few that are left in it. 4. Good land that used to be set well shall be all overrun with briars and thorns, ver. 23; where there used to be a thousand vines planted, for which the tenants used to pay a thousand shekels, or pieces of silver, yearly rent, there shall be nothing now but briars and thorns, no profit either for landlord or tenant; all being laid waste by the army of the invaders. Note, God can soon turn a fruitful land into barrenness; and it is just with him to turn vines into briars if we, instead of bringing forth grapes to him, bring forth wild grapes, ch. v. 4. 5. The instruments of husbandry shall be turned into instruments of war, ver. 24. The whole land being become briars and thorns, the grounds that men used to come to with sickles and pruninghooks to gather in the fruits, they shall now come to with arrows and bows, either to hunt for wild beasts in the thickets, or to defend themselves from the rapparees that lurk in the bushes seeking for prey, or to kill the serpents and venomous beasts that are hid there. This speaks a very sad change of the face of that pleasant land; but what melancholy change is there which sin will not make with a people? 6. There where briars and thorns were wont to be of use, and to do good service, even in the hedges for the defence of the enclosed grounds, they shall be plucked up, and all laid in common. There shall be briars and thorns in abundance there where they should not be, but none where they should be; ver. 25, "the hills that shall be digged with the mattock," for special use, from which the cattle used to be kept off with the fears of briars and thorns, shall now be thrown open; the hedges broken down for the boar out of the wood to waste it, Ps. lxxx. 12, 13. It shall be left at large for oxen to run in, and lesser cattle.

See the effect of sin and the curse. It has made the earth a forest of thorns and thistles, farther than it is forced into some order by the constant care and labour of man. And see what folly it is to set our hearts upon possessions of lands, be they never so fruitful, never so pleasant; when, if they lie never so little neglected and uncultivated, or if they be abused by a wasteful, careless heir or tenant, or the country be laid waste by war, they will soon become frightful deserts. Heaven is a paradise not subject to such changes.

CHAPTER VIII.

This chapter, and the four next that follow it, to ch. xiii., are all one continued discourse or sermon, the scope of which is to shew the great destruction that should now shortly be brought upon the kingdom of Israel, and the great disturbance that should be given to the kingdom of Judah by the king of Assyria, and that both were for their sins; but rich provision is made of comfort for those that feared God in those dark times, refer-were planted in the country by Esarhaddon. Thus, step by step the prophecy was fulfilled, and Ephraim ceased to be a nation.

vii. 11. A sign may or may not be miraculous; here it means a visible token or pledge of the accuracy of the prophetic warning.

vii. 12. The language of Ahaz is pious enough in appearance, but its sincerity may be questioned, as he seems to have been actually arranging with the king of Assyria to come to his aid by attacking Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8).

vii. 21, 22. "A young cow and two sheep" may be a small number, to denote poverty. The ground will not be over-pastured, and consequently the few cattle there are will yield abundant profit.

vii. 23. The want of culture is shown by this verse yet more clearly. The vineyard which once contained a thousand vines, and brought in a thousand shekels, is to be covered with briars and thorns. The next two verses show that this neglect of cultivation would be general, and grazing cattle only left.

ring especially to the days of the Messiah. In this chapter we have, I. A prophecy of the destruction of the confederate kingdoms of Syria and Israel by the king of Assyria, ver. 1—4. II. Of the desolations that should be made by that proud victorious prince in the land of Israel and Judah, ver. 5—8. III. Great encouragement given to the people of God in the midst of these distractions. They are assured, 1. That the enemies shall not gain their point against them, ver. 9, 10; 2. That if they kept up the fear of God, and kept down the fear of man, they should find God their refuge, ver. 11—14; and while others stumbled and fell into despair, they should be enabled to wait on God, and should see themselves reserved for better times, ver. 15—18. Lastly, He gives a necessary caution to all, at their peril, not to consult with familiar spirits, for they would thereby throw themselves into despair, but to keep close to the word of God, ver. 19—22. And these counsels and these comforts will still be of use to us in time of trouble.

MOREOVER the LORD said unto me, Take thee a great roll, and write in it with a man's pen concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz. 2 And I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah. 3 And I went unto the prophetess; and she conceived, and bare a son. Then said the LORD to me, Call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz. 4 For before the child shall have knowledge to cry, My father, and my mother, the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria. 5 The LORD spake also unto me again, saying,

6 Forasmuch as this people refuseth
The waters of Shiloah that go softly,
And rejoice in Rezin and Remaliah's son;
7 Now therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them
The waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory:

ASSYRIAN WARRIORS—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

And he shall come up over all his channels,
And go over all his banks: [go over,
8 And he shall pass through Judah; he shall overflow and
He shall reach even to the neck;
And the stretching out of his wings shall fill
The breadth of thy land, O Immanuel.

In these verses we have a prophecy of the successes of the king of Assyria against Damascus, Samaria, and Judah; that the two former should be laid waste by him, and the last ill frightened. Here is,

First. Orders given to the prophet to write this prophecy, and publish it to be seen and read of all men, and to leave it upon record, that when the thing came to pass they might know that God had sent him; for that was one end of prophecy, Jno. xiv. 29. He must take a great roll, which would contain those five chapters, fairly written in words at length; and he must write in it all that he had foretold concerning the king of Assyria's invading the country; he must write it with a man's pen, in the usual way and style of writing, so as that it might be legible and intelligible by all: see Hab. ii. 2, "Write the vision, and make it plain." They that speak and write of the things of God should avoid obscurity, and study to speak and write so as to be understood, 1 Cor. xiv. 19. They that write for men should write with a man's pen, and not covet the pen or tongue of angels. And forasmuch as it is usual to put some short, but significant, comprehensive title before books that are published, the prophet is directed to call his book "Maher-shalal-hash-baz; make speed to the spoil, hasten to the prey;" intimating that the Assyrian army should come upon them with great speed, and make great spoil. By this title the substance and meaning of the book would be inquired after by those that heard of it, and remembered by those that had read it, or heard it read. It is sometimes a good help to memory to put much matter in few words, which serve as handles by which we take hold of more.

Secondly. The care of the prophet to get this record well attested; ver. 2, "I took unto me faithful witnesses to record;" wrote the prophecy in their sight and presence, and made them subscribe their names to it, that they might be ready, if afterwards there should be occasion, to make oath of it, that the prophet had foretold the descent which the Assyrians made upon that country so long before; he names his witnesses, for the greater certainty, that they might be appealed to by any. They were two in number, for "out of the mouth of two witnesses shall every word be established." One was Uriah the priest; he is mentioned in the story of Ahaz, but for none of his good deeds, for he humoured Ahaz with an idolatrous altar, 2 Kin. xvi. 10, 11; however, at this time no exception lay against him, but that he was a faithful witness. See what full satisfaction the prophets took care to give to all persons concerned, of the sincerity of their intentions, that we might know, with a full assurance, "the certainty of the things wherein we have been instructed," and that "we have not followed cunningly-devised fables."

Thirdly. The making of the title of his book the name of his child, that it might be the more taken notice of, and the more effectually perpetuated, ver. 3. His wife, because the wife of a prophet, is called "the prophetess," she "conceived and bare a son," another son, who must carry a sermon in his name, as the former had done, ch. vii. 3, but with this difference, that spoke mercy, "Shear-jashub, the remnant shall return;" but that being slighted, this speaks judgment, "Maher-shalal-hash-baz, in making speed to the spoil he shall hasten, or has hastened to the prey." The prophecy is doubled, even in this one name, for the thing was certain; "I will hasten my word," Jer. i. 12. Every time the child was called by his name, or any part of it, it would serve as a memorandum of the judgments approaching. Note, It is good for us often to put ourselves in mind of the changes and troubles we are liable to in this world, and which perhaps are at the door. When we look with pleasure on our children, it should be with the allay of this thought, we know not what they are yet reserved for.

Fourthly. The prophecy itself, which explains this mystical name.

1. That Syria and Israel, who were now in confederacy against Judah, should in a very little time become an easy prey to the king of Assyria and his victorious army, ver. 4. "Before the child," now newly born and named, "shall have knowledge to cry, My father and my mother," which are usually some of the first things that children know, and some of the first words that children speak, that is, in about a year or two, "the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria," those cities that were now so secure themselves and so formidable to their neighbours, "shall be taken away before the king of Assyria," who shall plunder both city and country, and send the best effects of both into his own land, to enrich that, and as trophies of his victory. Note, Those that spoil others must expect to be themselves spoiled, ch. xxxiii. 1, for the Lord is righteous, and those that are troublesome shall be troubled.

2. That forasmuch as there were many in Judah that were secretly in the interests of Syria and Israel, and were disaffected to the house of David, God would chastise them also by the king of Assyria, who should create a great deal of vexation to Judah, as was foretold, ch. vii. 17.

Observe, 1st. What was the sin of the discontented party in Judah; ver. 6, "This people," whom the prophet here speaks to, "refuse the waters of Shiloah that go softly," despise their own country and the government of it, and love to run it down, because it doth not make so great a figure and so great a noise in the world as some other kings and kingdoms do. They refuse the comforts which God's prophets offer them from the word of God, and speak to them in a still small voice, and make nothing of them; but "they rejoice in Rezin and Remaliah's son," who were the enemies of their country, and were now actually invading it; they cried them up as brave men, magnified their policies and strength, applauded their conduct, were well pleased with their successes, and were hearty well-wishers to their designs, and resolved to desert and go over to them. Such vipers doth many a state foster in its bosom, that eats its bread, and yet adheres to its enemies, and are ready to quit its interests, if they but seem to totter.

2nd. The judgment which God would bring upon them for this sin. The same king of Assyria that should lay Ephraim and Syria waste, should be a scourge and terror to those of their party in Judah, ver. 7, 9. Because they "refuse the waters of Shiloah," and will not accommodate the government God had set over them, but are uneasy under it; "therefore the Lord brings upon them the waters of the river, strong and many," the river Euphrates. They slighted the land of Judah because it had no river to boast of comparable to that; the river at Jerusalem was a very inconsiderable one. Well, saith God, if you be such admirers of Euphrates, you shall have enough of it; the king of Assyria, whose country lies upon that river, shall come with his glory, that is, with his great army, which you cry up as his glory, despising your own king because he cannot bring such an army as that into the field. God shall bring that army upon you. If we value men, if we overvalue them, for their worldly wealth and power, it is just with God to make them by that a scourge to us. It is used as an argument against magnifying rich men, that rich men oppress us, Jam. ii. 3, 6. Let us be best pleased with the waters of Shiloah, that go softly, for rapid streams are dangerous. It is threatened that the Assyrian army should break in upon them like a deluge or inundation of waters, bearing down all before it, shall "come up over all his channels, and overflow all his banks;" it would be to no purpose to oppose them, or give them a stand. Sennacherib and his army shall "pass through Judah," and meet with so little resistance that it shall look more like a march through the country than a descent upon it. He shall "reach even to the neck;" that is, he shall advance so far as to lay siege to Jerusalem, the head of the kingdom, and nothing but that shall keep out of his hands; for that was the holy city. Note, In the greatest deluge of trouble God can and will keep the head of his people above water, and so preserve their comforts and spiritual lives; the waters that come into their soul may reach to the neck, Ps. lxix. 1, but there shall their proud waves be stayed. And here is another comfortable intimation that though the stretching out of the wings of the Assyrian, that bird of prey, though the right and left wing of his army should fill the breadth of the land of Judah; yet still it was Immanuel's land. It is thy land, O Immanuel. It was to be Christ's land, for there he was to be born, and live, and preach, and work miracles; he was Zion's king, and therefore had a peculiar interest in, and concern for, that land. Note, The lands that Immanuel owns for his, as he doth all those lands that own him, though they may be deluged, shall not be destroyed, for "when the enemy shall come in like a flood," Immanuel shall secure his own, and "shall lift up a standard against him," ch. lix. 19.

9 Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces;
And give ear, all ye of far countries:
Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces;
Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces.
10 Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought;
Speak the word, and it shall not stand:
For God is with us.
11 For the LORD spake thus to me with a strong hand,

viii. 1. This verse commences a new section of the prophet's record. It is not quite accurately rendered, for the sense is, "And the Lord said unto me, Take thee a large tablet, and write upon it in popular characters, For Maher-shalal-hash-baz." It may have been an ordinary metal tablet for writing upon, or a brass plate to affix in public. That the words rendered "a man's pen" really mean such writing as could be easily deciphered—plain and common characters—is now generally admitted.

viii. 3. Tertullian, Jerome, and some others thought "the prophetess" meant the Virgin Mary, and that the speaker was the Holy Spirit. But the consent of the fathers is not unanimous. Probably the prophet's wife is meant. Calvin supposed these events occurred in vision.

viii. 4. There is no need for the marginal "or, he that is before the king of Assyria shall take away the riches of Damascus." The idea is that an indefinite "somebody," or "they," shall carry the

And instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying,

12 Say ye not, A confederacy,
To all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy;
Neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid.

13 Sanctify the LORD of hosts himself;
And let him be your fear, and let him be your dread.

14 And he shall be for a sanctuary;
But for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence
To both the houses of Israel,
For a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

15 And many among them shall stumble,
And fall, and be broken,
And be snared, and be taken.

The prophet here returns to speak of the present distress that Ahaz and his court and kingdom were in, upon account of the threatening confederacy of the ten tribes and the Syrians against them. And in these verses,

First. He triumphs over the invading enemies, and in effect sets them at defiance, and bids them do their worst; ver. 9, 10, "O ye people, ye of far countries, give ear" to what the prophet saith to you in God's name.

1. We doubt not but you will now make your utmost efforts against Judah and Jerusalem; you associate yourselves in a strict alliance, you gird yourselves, and again you gird yourselves; you prepare for action, you address yourselves to it with resolution, you gird on your swords, you gird up your loins, you animate and encourage yourselves and one another, with all the considerations you can think of; you take counsel together, call councils of war, and all heads are at work about the proper methods for making yourselves masters of the land of Judah; you speak the word, you come to resolutions concerning it, and are not always deliberating; you determine what to do, and are very confident of the success of it, that the matter will be accomplished with a word's speaking. Note, It is with a great deal of policy, resolution, and assurance, that the church's enemies carry on their designs against it; and abundance of pains they take to roll a stone that will certainly return upon them.

2. This is to let you know that all your efforts will be ineffectual; you cannot, you shall not, gain your point, nor carry the day, "You shall be broken in pieces;" though you associate yourselves, though you gird yourselves, though you proceed with all the policy and precaution imaginable, yet I tell you again and again, all your projects shall be baffled, "you shall be broken in pieces;" nay, not only your attempts shall be ruined, but your attempts shall be your ruin; you shall be broken by those designs you have formed against Jerusalem. "Your counsels shall come to nought," for there is no wisdom or counsel against the Lord; your resolves will not be put in execution, they shall not stand; you speak the word, but "who is he that saith and it cometh to pass, if the Lord commandeth it not?" What sets up itself against God and his cause and counsel cannot stand, but must inevitably fall; for God is with us. This refers to the name of Immanuel, "God with us." The Messiah is to be born among us; and a people designed for such an honour cannot be given up to utter ruin. We have now the special presence of God with us in his temple, his oracles, his promises, and these are our defence. God is with us; that is, he is on our side, to take our part, and fight for us; and "if God be for us, who can be against us?" Thus doth the daughter of Zion despise them.

Secondly. He comforts and encourageth the people of God with the same comforts and encouragements which he himself had received. The attempt made upon them was very formidable; the house of David, the court and royal family, were at their wit's end, ch. vii. 2, and then no marvel if the people were in a consternation. Now,

1. The prophet tells us how he was himself taught of God, not to give way to such amazing fears as the people were disturbed with, nor to run into the same measures with them; ver. 11, "The Lord spake to me with a strong hand, not to walk in the ways of this people," not to say as they say, nor do as they do; not to entertain the same frightful apprehension of things, nor to approve of their projects of making peace upon any terms, or calling in the help of the Assyrians. God instructed the prophet not to go down the stream. Note, 1st. There is a proneness in the best of men to be frightened at threatening clouds, especially when fears are epidemical. We are all too apt to walk in the way of the people we live among, though it be not a good way. 2nd. Those whom God loves and owns he will instruct and enable to swim against the stream of common corruptions, particularly of common fears. He will find ways to teach his own people not to walk in the way of other people, but in a sober singularity. 3rd. Corruption is sometimes so active in the hearts even of good men that they have need to be taught their duty with a strong hand, and it is God's prerogative to teach so, for he only can give an understanding, and overpower the contradiction of unbelief and prejudice. He can teach the heart, and herein none teacheth like him. 4th. Those that are to teach others have need to be themselves well instructed in their duty, and then they teach most powerfully when they teach experimentally. The word that comes from the heart is most likely to reach to the heart; and what we are ourselves by the grace of God instructed in we should, as we are able, teach others also.

2. Now what is it that he saith to God's people?

1st. He cautions them against a sinful fear, ver. 12. It seems it was the way of this people at this time, and fear is catching. He whose heart fails him makes his brethren's heart to fail like his heart, Deu. xx, 8; therefore, "Say ye not, A confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy;" that is, First. Be not associated with them in the confederacies they are projecting and forecasting for. Do not join with those that, for the securing of themselves, are for making a league with the Assyrians through unbelief and distrust of God and their cause; do not come into any such confederacy. Note, It concerns us in time of trouble to watch against all such fears, as put us upon taking any indirect courses for our own security. Secondly. Be not afraid of the confederacies they frighten themselves and one another with. Do not amuse yourselves with the apprehension of a confederacy upon every thing that stirs, nor when any little thing is amiss, cry out presently, There is a plot, a plot, when they talk what dismal news there is. "Syria is joined with Ephraim," what will become of us? Must we fight, or must we flee, or must we yield? Do not you fear their fear, "Be not afraid of the signs of heaven," as the heathen are, Jer. x. 2. Be not afraid of evil tidings on earth, but "let your hearts be fixed." Fear not that which they fear, nor be afraid, as they are; be not put into such a fright as causeth trembling and shaking, so the word signifies. Note, When the church's enemies have sinful confederacies on foot, the church's friends should watch against the sinful fears of those confederacies.

2nd. He adviseth them to a gracious, religious fear: but "sanctify the Lord of hosts himself," ver. 13. Note, The believing fear of God is a special preservative against the disquieting fear of man: see 1 Pet. iii. 14, 15, where this is quoted and applied to suffering Christians. First. We must look upon God as the Lord of hosts, that has all power in his hand and all creatures at his beck. Secondly. We must sanctify him accordingly, that is, give him the glory due to that name, and carry towards him as those that believe him to be a holy God. Thirdly. We must make him our fear, the object of our fear, and make him our dread, keep up a reverence of his providence, and stand in awe of his sovereignty; be afraid of his displeasure, and silently acquiesce in all his disposals. Were we but duly affected with the greatness and glory of God, we should see the pomp of our enemies eclipsed and clouded, and all their power restrained and under check: see Neh. iv. 14. They that are afraid of the reproach of men forget the Lord their Maker, ch. li. 12, 13: compare Lu. xii. 4, 5.

3rd. He assures them of a holy security and serenity of mind in so doing; ver. 14, "He shall be for a sanctuary;" make him your fear, and you shall find him your hope, your help, your defence, and your mighty deliverer; he will sanctify and preserve you. He will be for a sanctuary. First. To make you holy; He will be your sanctification, so some read it. If we sanctify God by our praises, he will sanctify us by his grace. Secondly. To make you easy; He will be your sanctuary, to which you may flee for safety, and where you are privileged from all the arrests of fear. You shall find an inviolable refuge and security in him, and see yourselves out of the reach of danger. They that truly fear God shall not need to fear any evil.

Thirdly. He threatens the ruin of the ungodly and unbelieving, both in Judah and Israel. They have no part nor lot in the foregoing comforts; that God, who will be a sanctuary to those who trust in him, will be "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence" to those who "leave these waters of Shiloah, and rejoice in Rezin and Remaliah's son," ver. 6, who make the creature their fear and their hope, ver. 14, 15. The prophet foresees that the greatest part of "both the houses of Israel" would not "sanctify the Lord of hosts," and to them he would be "for a gin and a snare," that is, he would be a terror to them, as he would be a support and stay to those that trusted in him. Instead of profiting by the word of God, they should be offended at it, and the providences of God, instead of leading them to him, would drive them from him. What was a savour of life unto life to others would be a savour of death unto death to them. So that "many among them shall stumble and fall;" they shall fall both into sin and into ruin; they shall fall by the sword, shall be taken prisoners and go into captivity. Note, If the things of God be an offence to us, they will be an undoing to us. Some apply this to the unbelieving Jews, who rejected Christ, and to whom he became a stone of stumbling, for the apostle quotes this Scripture with application to all those who persisted in their unbelief of the Gospel of Christ, 1 Pet. ii. 8; to them he is a rock of offence, because, being disobedient to the word, they stumble at it.

16 Bind up the testimony,
Seal the law among my disciples.

17 And I will wait upon the LORD,
That hideth his face from the house of Jacob,
And I will look for him.

18 Behold, I and the children whom the LORD hath given me
Are for signs and for wonders in Israel
From the LORD of hosts, which dwelleth in mount Zion.

19 And when they shall say unto you,
Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards
That peep, and that mutter:
Should not a people seek unto their God?
For the living to the dead?

20 To the law and to the testimony:
If they speak not according to this word,
It is because there is no light in them

21 And they shall pass through it, hardly bestead and hungry:
And it shall come to pass, that when they shall be hungry,
they shall fret themselves,
And curse their king and their God,
And look upward.

22 And they shall look unto the earth;
And behold trouble and darkness, dimness of anguish;
And they shall be driven to darkness.

In these verses we have,

First. The unspeakable privilege which the people of God enjoy, in having the oracles of God consigned over to them, and being intrusted with the Sacred Writings, that they may sanctify the Lord of hosts, may make him their fear, and find him their sanctuary; "Bind up the testimony," ver. 16. Note, It is a great instance of God's care of his church and love to it, that he hath lodged in it the invaluable treasure of Divine revelation. 1. It is a testimony and a law. Not only this prophecy is so, which must therefore be preserved safe for the comfort of God's people in the approaching times of trouble and distress, but the whole word of God is so; God hath attested it, and he hath enjoined it. As a testimony, it directs our faith; as a law, it directs our practice; and we ought both to subscribe to the truths of it and to submit to the precepts of it. 2. This testimony and law are bound up and sealed, for we are not to add to them or diminish from them. They are a letter from God to man, folded up and sealed, a proclamation under the broad seal. The binding up and sealing of the Old Testament signified that the full explication of many of the prophecies of it was reserved for the New Testament spoils of Damascus and Samaria into the presence of the king of Assyria. For the fulfilment see 2 Kings xv. 29, xvi. 9, where some of the facts are mentioned.

viii. 5. This verse records an event not closely connected with the preceding, and perhaps occurring considerably later.

viii. 6. The waters of Shiloah are the streams from the fountain of Siloam, the only perennial spring of Jerusalem. The idea is, "They despise the quiet constant aid they have at their doors, and have more regard to the conspicuous resources of Syria and Israel." It would seem that the Jews were losing faith in God and his care, and were beginning to admire their very enemies. This is human altogether, for the nation which can conquer can defend.

viii. 7. They are not content with the quiet fountain, whose bright waters quench their thirst, and expend themselves in doing good; they shall have the mighty torrent they wish for, and it shall carry them away.

times, Dan. xii. 4, "Seal the book till the time of the end." But what was then bound up and sealed is now opened and unsealed, and revealed unto babes, Mat. xi. 25. Yet with reference to the other world and the future state, still the testimony is bound up and sealed, for we know but in part, and prophesy but in part. 3. They are lodged as a sacred depositum in the hands of the disciples, of "the children of the prophets and the covenant," Acts iii. 25. This is the good thing which is committed to them, and which they are charged with the custody of, 2 Tim. i. 13, 14. Those that had prophets for their tutors must still keep close to the written word.

Secondly. The good use which we ought to make of this privilege. And this we are taught,

1. By the prophet's own practice and resolutions, ver. 17, 18. He embraced the law and the testimony, and he had the comfort of it in the midst of the many discouragements he met with. Note, Those ministers can best recommend the word of God to others that have themselves found the satisfaction of relying upon it. Observe,

1st. The discouragements which the prophet laboured under. He instanceth in two: First. The frowns of God, not so much upon himself, but upon his people, whose interests lay very near his heart; he "hideth his face from the house of Jacob," and seems at present to neglect them, and lay them under the tokens of his displeasure. The prophet was himself employed in revealing God's wrath against them, and yet grieved thus for it, as one that did not desire the woful day. If the house of Jacob forsake the God of Jacob, let it not be thought strange that he hides his face from them. Secondly. The contempt and reproaches of men, not only upon himself, but upon his disciples, among whom the law and the testimony were sealed; "I and the children which the Lord hath given me are for signs and wonders." We are gazed at as monsters or outlandish people, pointed at as we go along the streets. Probably the prophetical names that were given his children were ridiculed and bantered by the profane scoffers of the town; "I am as a wonder unto many," Ps. lxxi. 7. God's people are the world's wonder, Zec. iii. 8; for their singularity, and because they run not with them to the same excess of riot, 1 Pet. iv. 4. The prophet was herein a type of Christ; for this is quoted, Heb. ii. 13, to prove that believers are Christ's children; "Behold I and the children which God hath given me." Parents must look upon their children as God's gifts, his gracious gifts; Jacob did so, Gen. xxxiii. 5. Ministers must look upon their converts as their children, and be tender of them accordingly, 1 Thes. ii. 7; and as the children which God hath given them, for, whatever good we are instrumental of to others, it is owing to the grace of God. Christ looks upon believers as his children, which the Father gave him, Jno. xvii. 6; and both he and they are for signs and wonders, spoken against, Lu. ii. 34; every where spoken against, Acts xxviii. 22.

2nd. The encouragement he took in reference to these discouragements: First. He saw the hand of God in all that which was discouraging to him, and kept his eye upon that. Whatever trouble the house of Jacob is in, it comes from God's hiding his face; nay, whatever contempt was put upon him or his friends, it is from the Lord of hosts; he hath bidden Shimei curse David, Job xix. 13; xxx. 11. Secondly. He saw God dwelling in mount Zion, manifesting himself to his people, and ready to hear their prayers, and receive their homage. Though for the present he hide his face from the house of Jacob, yet they know where to find him, and recover the sight of him; he dwells in mount Zion. Thirdly. He therefore resolved to wait upon the Lord, and to look for him, to attend his motions, even while he hides his face, and to expect with an humble assurance his returns in a way of mercy. Those that wait upon God by faith and prayer may look for him with hope and joy. When we have not sensible comforts, we must still keep up our observance of God, and obedience to him, and then wait a while, "at evening time it shall be light."

2. By the counsel and advice which he gives to his disciples, among whom the law and the testimony were sealed, to whom were committed the lively oracles.

1st. He supposeth they would be tempted in the day of their distress to consult them that had familiar spirits, that dealt with the devil, asked his advice, and desired to be informed by him concerning things to come, that they might take their measures accordingly. Thus Saul, when he was in straits, made his application to the witch of Endor, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 15; and Ahaziah to the God of Ekron, 2 Kin. i. 2. These conjurors had odd fantastic gestures and tones; they peeped and muttered, they muffled their heads, that they could neither see nor be seen plainly, but peeped and were peeped at. Or both the words here used may refer to their voice and manner of speaking; they delivered what they had to say, with a low, hollow, broken sound, scarce articular; and sometimes in a puling or mournful tone, like a crane, or a swallow, or a dove, ch. xxxviii. 14. They spoke not with that boldness and plainness which the prophets of the Lord spoke with, but as those that desired to amuse people, rather than to instruct them; yet there were those who were so wretchedly sottish as to seek to them, and court others to do so, even the prophet's hearers, who knew better things, whom therefore the prophet warns not to say, A confederacy with such. There were express laws against this wickedness, Lev. xix. 31; xx. 27; and yet it was found in Israel, is found even in Christian nations; but let all that have any sense of religion shew it, by startling at the thought of it: "Get thee behind me, Satan." Dread the use of spells and charms, and consulting those that by hidden arts pretend to tell fortunes, cure diseases, or discover things lost; for this is a heinous crime, and in effect denies the God that is above.

2nd. He furnishes them with an answer to this temptation, puts words into their mouths; If any go about thus to ensnare you, give them this reply; "Should not a people seek to their God?" What! "for the living to the dead?" First. Tell them it is a principle of religion, that a people ought to seek unto their God. Now Jehovah is our God; and therefore to him we ought to seek, and to consult with him, and not with them that have familiar spirits; "All people will thus walk in the name of their god," Mic. iv. 5. They that made the hosts of heaven their gods, sought unto them, Jer. viii. 2. Should not a people under guilt, and in trouble, seek to their God for pardon and peace? should not a people in doubt, in want, and in danger, seek to their God for direction, supply, and protection? Since the Lord is our God, and we are his people, it is certainly our duty to seek to him. Secondly. Tell them it is an instance of the greatest folly in the world to seek for living men to dead idols. What can be more absurd, than to seek to lifeless images for life and living comforts? or to expect that our friends that are dead, when we deify them, and pray to them, should do that for us which our living friends cannot do. The "dead know not any thing," nor is there with them any device or working, Eccl. ix. 5, 10; it is folly therefore for the living to make their court to them, with any expectation of relief from them. Necromancers consulted the dead, as the witch of Endor, and so proclaimed their own folly. We must live by the living, and not by the dead. What life or light can we look for from them that have no life or light themselves?

3rd. He directs them to consult with the oracles of God. If the prophets that were among them did not speak directly to every case, yet they had the written word, and to that they must have recourse. Note, Those will never be drawn to consult wizards that know how to make a good use of their Bibles. Would we know how we may seek to our God, and come to the knowledge of his mind, "To the law and to the testimony;" there you will see what is good, and what the Lord requires of you. Make God's statutes your counsellors, and you will be counselled right. Observe, First. What use we must make of the law and the testimony. We must "speak according to that word," that is, we must make this our standard, conform to it, and take advice from it; make our appeals to it, and in every thing be overruled and determined by it; consent to those wholesome, healing words, 1 Tim. vi. 3, and speak of the things of God in "the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth." It is not enough to say nothing against it, but we must speak according to it. Secondly. Why we must make this use of the law and the testimony. Because we shall be convicted of the greatest folly imaginable if we do not. They that concur not with the word of God it is a sign there is no light, no morning light, (so the word is) in them. They have no right sense of things; they do not understand themselves, nor the difference between good and evil, truth and falsehood. Note, Those that reject Divine revelation, have not so much as human understanding; nor do they rightly admit the oracles of reason who will not admit the oracles of God. Some read it as a threatening; if they speak not according to this word, there shall be no light to them, no good, no comfort or relief; but they shall be driven to darkness and despair, as it follows here, ver. 21, 22. What light had Saul, when he consulted the witch? 1 Sam. xxviii. 18, 20; or what light can they expect that turn away from the Father of lights?

4th. He reads the doom of those that seek to familiar spirits, and regard not God's law and testimony. There shall not only be no light to them, no comfort or prosperity, but they may expect all horror and misery, ver. 21, 22. First The trouble they feared shall come upon them; they shall pass through the land, or pass to and fro in the land, unfixed, unsettled, and driven from place to place by the threatening power of an invading enemy. They shall be hardly bestead, whither to go for the necessary supports of life, either because the country would be so impoverished that there would be nothing to be had, or at least themselves and their friends so impoverished that there would be nothing to be had for them; so that they who used to be fed to the full shall be hungry. Note, Those that go away from God go out of the way of all good. Secondly. They shall be very uneasy to themselves, by their discontent and impatience under their trouble. A good man may be in want, but then he quiets himself, and strives to make himself easy; but these people when they shall be hungry shall fret themselves, and when they have nothing to feed on their vexation shall prey upon their own spirits; for fretfulness is a sin that is its own punishment. Thirdly. They shall be very provoking to all about them, nay, to all above them. When they find all their measures broken, and themselves at their wit's end, they will forget all the rules of duty and decency, and will treasonably curse their king, and blasphemously curse their God; and this more than in their thought, and in their bedchamber, Eccl. x. 20. They begin with cursing their king, for managing the public affairs no better, as if the fault were his, when the best and wisest kings cannot secure success; but when they have broken the bonds of their allegiance, no marvel if those of their religion do not hold them long. They next curse their God, curse him and die; they quarrel with his providence, and reproach that as if he had been wrong. "The foolishness of man perverts his way, and" then "his heart frets against the Lord," Pr. xix. 3. See what need we have to keep our mouth as with a bridle, when our heart is hot within us, for the language of fretfulness is commonly very offensive. Fourthly. They shall abandon themselves to despair, and, which way soever they look, shall see no probability of relief; they shall look upward, but heaven shall frown upon them, and look gloomy; and how can it be otherwise when they curse their God? They shall look to the earth; but what comfort can that yield to those whom God is at war with? There is nothing there but "trouble, and darkness, and dimness of anguish," every thing threatening, and not one pleasant gleam, not one hopeful prospect; but they shall be driven to darkness by the violence of their own fears, which represent every thing about them black and frightful. This explains what he had said, ver. 20, that there shall be no light to them. Those that shut their eyes against the light of God's word will justly be abandoned to darkness, and left to wander endlessly, and the sparks of their own kindling will do them no kindness.

CHAPTER IX.

The prophet, in this chapter, according to the directions given him, ch. iii. 10, 11, saith "to the righteous, it shall be well with them; but woe to the wicked! it shall be ill with him." Here is, I. Gracious promises to those that adhere to the law and to the testimony; while those that seek to familiar spirits shall be driven into darkness and dimness; they shall see a great light; relief in the midst of their distresses, typical of gospel grace. 1. In the doctrine of the Messiah, ver. 1—3; 2. His victories, ver. 4, 5; 3. His government and dominion as Immanuel, ver. 6, 7. II. Dreadful threatenings against the people of Israel, that had revolted from, and were enemies to, the house of David, that they should be brought to utter ruin, that their pride should bring them down, ver. 8—10; that their neighbours should make a prey of them, ver. 11, 12; that for their impenitency and hypocrisy all their ornaments and supports should be cut off, ver. 13—17; and that by the wrath of God against them, and their wrath one against another, they should be brought to utter ruin, ver. 18—21. And this is typical of the final destruction of all the enemies of the Son of David and his kingdom.

NEVERTHELESS the dimness shall not be such as was in her vexation,
When at the first he lightly afflicted
The land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali,
And afterward did more grievously afflict Her by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the nations. [light:
2 The people that walked in darkness have seen a great
They that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.
3 Thou hast multiplied the nation,
And not increased the joy:
They joy before thee according to the joy in harvest,
And as men rejoice when they divide the spoil.
4 For thou hast broken the yoke of his burden,
And the staff of his shoulder,
The rod of his oppressor,
As in the day of Midian.

viii. 12. This verse is future, and not imperative, in its grammatical form: "Ye shall not say, A conspiracy, of whatever this people may say, A conspiracy; and what they fear ye shall not fear and ye shall not be afraid." This style is not unusual where milder counsels are given, or exhortation is intended.

viii. 14. The word "sanctuary" here is in 1 Pet. ii. 7 applied to Christ, who is called "precious" or "an honour"—the object and source of honour. (Compare 1 Pet. ii. 8.)

viii. 16. Some take this verse as a command addressed to the prophet by God, but others as the prophet's appeal to the Lord. The latter view is favoured by the next verses.

viii. 18. "The children" literally meant are probably Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, formerly mentioned. (See Heb. ii. 13.)

viii. 19. Persons who professed to hold communication with the souls of the dead are meant by "them that have familiar spirits." They were the "mediums" of those times. Wizards or sorcerers are

5 For every battle of the warrior is with confused noise,
And garments rolled in blood;
But this shall be with burning and fuel of fire.
6 For unto us a child is born,
Unto us a son is given:
And the government shall be upon his shoulder:
And his name shall be called
Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God,
The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.
7 Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end,
Upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom,
To order it, and to establish it [ever.
With judgment and with justice from henceforth even for
The zeal of the LORD of hosts will perform this.

The first words of this chapter plainly refer to the close of the foregoing chapter, where every thing looked black and melancholy. "Behold trouble, and darkness, and dimness;" very bad yet not so bad but that "to the upright there shall arise light in the darkness," Ps. cxii. 4; and "at evening time it shall be light," Zec. xiv. 7. "Nevertheless, it shall not be such dimness," either not such for kind, or not such for degree, as sometimes there has been. Note, In the worst of times, God's people have a "nevertheless" to comfort themselves with, something to allay and balance their troubles; they are persecuted, but not forsaken, 2 Cor. iv. 9; sorrowful, yet always rejoicing, 2 Cor. vi. 10; and it is matter of comfort to us, when things are at the darkest, that he who forms the light and creates the darkness, (ch. xlv. 7,) hath appointed both their bounds, and set the one over against the other, Gen. i. 4. He can say, hitherto the dimness shall go, so long it shall last, and no farther, no longer. Three things are here promised, and they all point ultimately at the grace of the Gospel, which the saints then were to comfort themselves with the hopes of, in every cloudy and dark day, as we now are to comfort ourselves in time of trouble, with the hopes of Christ's second coming, though that be now, as his first coming then was, a thing at a great distance. The mercy likewise which God hath in store for his church in the latter days may be a support to those that are mourning with her present calamities. We have here the promise,

First. Of a glorious light, which shall so qualify, and by degrees dispel, the dimness, that it shall not be as it sometimes hath been; not "such as was in her vexation;" there shall not be such dark times as were formerly "when at first he lightly afflicted the land of Zebulun and Naphtali," which lay remote, and most exposed to the inroads of the neighbouring enemies; and afterwards he "more grievously afflicted the land, by the way of the sea, and beyond Jordan," ver. 1; referring probably to those days when "God began to cut Israel short, and to smite them in all their coasts," 2 Kin. x. 32. Note, 1. God tries what lesser judgments will do with a people before he brings greater. But, 2. If a light affliction do not do its work with us, to humble and reform us, we must expect to be afflicted more grievously, for when God judgeth he will overcome.

Well, those were dark times with the land of Zebulun and Naphtali, and there was dimness of anguish in Galilee of the Gentiles, both in respect of ignorance,—they did not speak according to the law and the testimony, and then there was no light in them, ch. viii. 20; and in respect of trouble, and the desperate posture of their outward affairs. We have both together, 2 Chr. xv. 3, 5, "Israel has been without the true God, and a teaching priest, and in those times there was no peace;" but the dimness threatened, ch. viii. 22, shall not prevail to such a degree; for, ver. 2, "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light." 1st. At this time when the prophet lived, there were many prophets in Judah and Israel, whose prophecies were a great light, both for direction and comfort to the people of God, who adhered "to the law and the testimony." Besides the written word, they had prophecy; there were those that shewed them how long, Ps. lxxiv. 9, which was a great satisfaction to them, when in respect of their outward troubles, they "sat in darkness, and dwelt in the land of the shadow of death." 2nd. This was to have its full accomplishment, when our Lord Jesus began to appear as a prophet, and to preach the Gospel in the land of Zebulun and Naphtali, and in Galilee of the Gentiles; and the Old Testament prophets, as they were witnesses to him, so they were types of him. When he came and dwelt in the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali, then this prophecy is said to be fulfilled, Mat. iv. 13—16. Note, First. Those that want the Gospel, walk in darkness, and know not what they do, or whither they go; and they dwell in the land of the shadow of death, in thick darkness and in the utmost danger. Secondly. When the Gospel comes to any place, to any soul,—light comes, a great light, a shining light, which will shine more and more. It should be welcome to us as light is to them that sit in darkness, and we should readily entertain it, both because it is of such sovereign use to us and because it brings its own evidence with it; truly this light is sweet.

Secondly. Of a glorious increase, and a universal joy arising from it; ver. 3, "Thou, O God, hast mutiplied the nation," the Jewish nation, which thou hast mercy in store for; though it has been diminished by one sore judgment after another, yet now thou hast begun to multiply it again. The numbers of a nation are its strength and wealth, if the numerous be industrious; and it is God that increaseth nations, Job xii. 23. Yet it follows, "Thou hast not increased the joy;" not the carnal joy and mirth, nor those things that are commonly the matter and occasion of that; but notwithstanding that "they joy before thee." There is a great deal of serious spiritual joy among them, joy in the presence of God, with an eye to him. This is very applicable to the times of gospel light spoken of, ver. 2; then God multiplied the nation, the gospel Israel; and 'to him' (so the Masorites read it) 'thou hast magnified the joy,' to every one that receives the light. The following words favour this reading; "they joy before thee;" they come before thee in holy ordinances with great joy; their mirth is not like that of Israel, under their vines and fig trees, (thou hast not increased that joy,) but it is in the favour of God, and in the tokens of his grace. Note, The Gospel when it comes in its light and power, brings joy along with it; and those who receive it aright therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice; therefore the conversion of the nations is prophesied of by this, Ps. lxvii. 4, "Let the nations be glad, and sing for joy;" Ps. xcvi. 11. 1. It is holy joy; "They joy before thee," they rejoice in spirit as Christ did, Lu. x. 21; and that is before God. In the eye of the world they are always as sorrowful, and yet in God's sight always rejoicing, 2 Cor. vi. 10. 2. It is a great joy; it is "according to the joy in harvest," when those that sowed in tears, and have with long patience waited for the precious fruits of the earth, reap in joy; and as in war men rejoice, when after a hazardous battle they divide the spoil. The Gospel brings with it plenty and victory; but those that would have the joy of it must expect to go through a hard work, as the husbandman before he have the joy of harvest; and a hard conflict, as the soldier before he has the joy of dividing the spoil; but the joy when it comes will be an abundant recompence for the toil: see Acts viii. 8, 39.

Thirdly. Of a glorious liberty and enlargement, ver. 4, 5. They shall rejoice before thee, and with good reason, "for thou hast broken the yoke of his burden," and made him easy, for he shall no longer be in servitude; and thou hast "broken the staff of his shoulder, and the rod of his oppressor," that rod of the wicked which rested long on the lot of the righteous; as the Midianites' yoke was broke off the neck of Israel by the agency of Gideon. If God makes former deliverances his patterns in working for us, we ought to make them our encouragements to nope in him, and to seek to him; Ps. lxxxiii. 9, "Do unto them as to the Midianites." What temporal deliverance this refers to is not clear: probably the preventing of Sennacherib from making himself master of Jerusalem, which was done, as in the day of Midian, by the immediate hand of God. And whereas other battles use to be won with a great deal of noise, and by the expense of much blood, this shall be done silently and without noise; "under his glory God shall kindle a burning," ch. x. 16; "A fire not blown shall consume him," Job xx. 26; but doubtless it looks farther, to the blessed fruits and effects of that great light which should visit them that sat in darkness; it would bring liberty along with it, deliverance to the captives, Lu. iv. 18. 1. The design of the Gospel, and the grace of it, is to break the yoke of sin and Satan, to remove the burthen of guilt and corruption, and to free us from the rod of those oppressors, that we might be brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Christ broke the yoke of the ceremonial law, Acts xv. 10; Gal. v. 1; and delivered us out of the hand of our enemies, that we might serve him without fear, Lu. i. 74, 75. 2. This is done with the Spirit working like fire, Mat. iii. 11; not as the battle of the warrior is fought with confused noise; no, the weapons of our warfare are not carnal; but it is done with the spirit of judgment, and spirit of burning, ch. iv. 4. It is done as in the day of Midian, by a work of God upon the hearts of men. Christ is our Gideon; it is his sword that doth wonders.

But who, where, is he that shall undertake and accomplish these great things for the church? He tells us, ver. 6, 7, they shall be done by the Messiah, Immanuel, that son of a virgin whose birth he had foretold, ch. vii. 14, and now speaks of in the prophetical style, as a thing already done, The child is born; not only because it was as certain, and he was as certain of it, as if it had been done already, but because the church, before his incarnation, reaped great benefit and advantage by his undertaking, in the virtue of that first promise concerning the seed of the woman, Gen. iii. 15. As he was the Lamb slain, so he was the child born from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. All the great things that God did for the Old Testament church were done by him as the eternal Word, and for his sake as the Mediator. He was the Anointed to whom God had respect, Ps. lxxxiv. 9, and it was for the Lord's sake,—for the Lord Christ's sake,—that God caused his face to shine upon his sanctuary, Dan. ix. 17. Therefore, the Jewish nation, and particularly the house of David, were preserved many a time from imminent ruin, because that blessing was in them. What greater security therefore could be given to the church of God then that it should be preserved, and be the special care of the Divine providence, than this, that God had so great a mercy in reserve for it? The Chaldee paraphrase understands it of 'the Man that shall endure for ever, even Christ.' And it is an illustrious prophecy of him and of his kingdom, which doubtless they that waited for the consolation of Israel built much upon, often turned to, and read with pleasure.

1st. See him in his humiliation. The same that is the mighty God is a child born; the Ancient of days becomes an infant of a span long; the everlasting Father is a Son given. Such was his condescension in taking our nature upon him; thus did he humble and empty himself to exalt and fill us. He is born into our world; "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us;" he is given, freely given, to be all that to us which our case, in our fallen state, calls for; God so loved the world that he gave him. He is born to us, he is given to us,—us men,—and not to the angels that sinned. It is spoken with an air of triumph, and the angel seems to refer to these words in the notice he gives to the shepherds of the Messiah's being come; Lu. ii. 11, "Unto you is born this day a Saviour." Note, Christ's being born and given to us is the great foundation of our hopes, and fountain of our joys, in times of greatest grief and fear.

2nd. See him in his exaltation. This child, this Son, this Son of God, this Son of Man that is given to us, is in a capacity to do us a great deal of kindness; for he is invested with the highest honour and power, so that we cannot but be happy if he be our friend.

First. See the dignity he is advanced to, and the name he hath above every name; he shall be called, (and therefore we are sure he is, and shall be,) Wonderful, Counsellor, &c. His people shall know him and worship him by these names; and as one that fully answers them, they shall submit to him, and depend upon him. 1*st.* He is Wonderful, Counsellor. Justly is he called Wonderful, for he is both God and man. His love is the wonder of angels and glorified saints; in his birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension he was wonderful. A constant series of wonders attended him, and without controversy great was the mystery of godliness concerning him. He is the Counsellor, for he was intimately acquainted with the counsels of God from eternity, and he gives counsel to the children of men, in which he consults our welfare. It is by him that God has given us counsel, Ps. xvi. 7; Rev. iii. 18. He is the wisdom of the Father, and is made of God to us wisdom. Some join these together; he is the wonderful counsellor, a wonder or miracle of a counsellor. In this, as in other things, he hath the preeminence; none teacheth like him. 2*nd.* He is the mighty God; 'God, the mighty one.' As he has wisdom, so he has strength to go through with his undertaking; is able to save to the uttermost. And such is the work of the Mediator, that no less a power than that of the mighty God could accomplish it. 3*rd.* He is the everlasting Father; or, 'The Father of eternity.' He is God, one with the Father, who is from everlasting to everlasting. His fatherly care of his people, and tenderness towards them, is everlasting. He is the Author of everlasting life and happiness to them, and so is the Father of a blessed eternity to them. He is the Father of the world to come, so the Seventy read it; the Father of the gospel state, which is put in subjection to him, not to the angels, Heb. ii. 5. He was from eternity Father of the great work of redemption; his heart was upon it; it was the product of his wisdom, as the counsellor; of his love, as the everlasting Father. 4*th.* He is the Prince of Peace. As a king he preserves the peace,—commands peace; nay, he creates peace in his kingdom. He is our peace, and it is his peace that both keeps the hearts of his people and rules in them. He is not only a peaceable prince and his reign peaceable, but he is the author and giver of all good, all that peace which is the present and future bliss of his subjects.

Secondly. See the dominion he is advanced to, and the throne he has above every throne; ver. 6, "The government shall be upon his shoulder,"—his only. He shall not only wear the badge of it upon his shoulder, "the key of the house of David," ch. xxii. 22, but he shall bear the burthen of it. The Father shall said to peep, i.e., chirp and mutter, because of the peculiar sounds they made in their performances. All alike were impostors; and their dupes are warned to consult the living God, for it was folly for living men to apply to the dead.

viii. 20. God is to be consulted through his written word.

viii. 21. "They shall pass through it:" "it" here means the land. The verbs are in the singular number, "people" being understood. The last words, "and look upward," seem to require joining with the next verse. Their hopeless condition will be such that they will find relief nowhere, whether they look towards heaven above or towards the earth beneath.

ix. 1. This is a continuation of the prophecy begun in the previous chapter, and shows that God will appear in mercy as well as in justice. The Hebrew text makes this verse the last of chap. viii. Translators differ much as to the proper rendering. Thus, Dr. Delitzsch (Clarke's Edition) renders it:—"For it does not remain dark where there is now devolve it upon him, so that he shall have an incontestable right to govern, and he shall undertake it, so that no doubt can be made of his governing well; for he shall set his shoulder to it, and will never complain, as Moses did, of his being overcharged; "I am not able to bear all this people," Num. xiv. 11, 14. Glorious things are here spoken of Christ's government, ver. 7. 1*st.* That it shall be an increasing government. It shall be multiplied; the bounds of his kingdom shall be more and more enlarged, and many shall be added to it daily. The lustre of it shall increase, and it shall shine more and more bright in the world. The monarchies of the earth were each less illustrious than the other, so that what began in gold ended in iron and clay, and every monarchy dwindled by degrees; but the kingdom of Christ is a growing kingdom, and will come to perfection at last. 2*nd.* That it shall be a peaceable government, agreeable to his character as the Prince of peace. He shall rule by love, shall rule in men's hearts, so that wherever his government is there shall be peace; and as his government increaseth the peace shall increase. The more we are subject to Christ the more easy and safe we are. 3*rd.* That it shall be a rightful government. He that is the Son of David shall reign upon the throne of David, and over his kingdom which he is entitled to; "God shall give him the throne of his father David," Lu. i. 32, 33. The gospel church, in which Jew and Gentile are incorporated, is the holy hill of Zion, on which Christ reigns, Ps. ii. 6. 4*th.* That it shall be administered with prudence and equity, and so as to answer the great end of government, which is the establishment of the kingdom. He shall order it, and settle it with justice and judgment. Every thing is, and shall be, well managed in the kingdom of Christ; and none of his subjects shall ever have cause to complain. 5*th.* That it shall be an everlasting kingdom. There shall be no end of the increase of his government,—it shall be still growing; no end of the increase of the peace of it, for the happiness of the subjects of this kingdom shall last to eternity, and perhaps shall be progressive in infinitum,—'for ever.' He shall reign from henceforth even for ever, not only throughout all generations of time, but even then when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God even the Father, the glory both of the Redeemer and the redeemed shall continue eternally. 6*th.* That God himself hath undertaken to bring all this about. The Lord of hosts, who hath all power in his hand, and all creatures at his beck, shall perform this, shall preserve the throne of David till this Prince of peace is settled in it. His zeal shall do it; his jealousy for his own honour, and the truth of his promise, and the good of his church. Note, The heart of God is much upon the advancement of the kingdom of Christ among men, which is very comfortable to all those that wish well to it. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will overcome all opposition.

8 The Lord sent a word into Jacob,
And it hath lighted upon Israel
9 And all the people shall know,
Even Ephraim and the inhabitant of Samaria,
That say in the pride and stoutness of heart,
10 The bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stones: [into cedars.
The sycomores are cut down, but we will change them
11 Therefore the LORD shall set up the adversaries of Rezin
And join his enemies together; [against him,
12 The Syrians before, and the Philistines behind;
And they shall devour Israel with open mouth
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.
13 For the people turneth not unto him that smiteth them,
Neither do they seek the LORD of hosts
14 Therefore the LORD will cut off from Israel head and tail, Branch and rush, in one day.
15 The ancient and honourable, he is the head;
And the prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail.
16 For the leaders of this people cause them to err;
And they that are led of them are destroyed.
17 Therefore the Lord shall have no joy in their young men,
Neither shall have mercy on their fatherless and widows:
For every one is an hypocrite and an evildoer,
And every mouth speaketh folly.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.
18 For wickedness burneth as the fire:
It shall devour the briers and thorns,
And shall kindle in the thickets of the forest,
And they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke.
19 Through the wrath of the LORD of hosts is the land darkened,
And the people shall be as the fuel of the fire:
No man shall spare his brother.
20 And he shall snatch on the right hand, and be hungry;
And he shall eat on the left hand, and they shall not be satisfied:
They shall eat every man the flesh of his own arm:
21 Manasseh, Ephraim; and Ephraim, Manasseh:
And they together shall be against Judah,
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.

Here are terrible threatenings, which are directed primarily against Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes, Ephraim and Samaria; the ruin of which is here foretold, with all the woful confusions that were the prefaces to that ruin, all which came to pass within a few years after. But they look farther, to all the enemies of the throne and kingdom of Christ, the Son of David, and read the doom of all the nations that forget God, and will not have Christ to reign over them. Observe,

First. The preface to this prediction; ver. 8, "The Lord sent a word into Jacob;" sent it by his servants the prophets. He warns before he wounds; he sent notice what he would do, that they might meet him in the way of his judgments, but they would not take the hint; took no care to turn away his wrath, and so "it lighted upon Israel;" for no word of God shall fall to the ground. It fell upon them as a storm of rain and hail from on high, which they could not avoid. It has lighted upon them, that is, it is as sure to come as if it were come already; and all the people shall know by feeling it what they would not know by hearing of it. Those that are willingly ignorant of the wrath of God revealed from heaven against sin and sinners shall be made to know it.

Secondly. The sins charged upon the people of Israel, which provoked God to bring these judgments upon them.

1. Their insolent defiance of the justice of God, thinking themselves a match for him. They "say in the pride and stoutness of their heart," let God himself do his worst, they will hold their own, and make their part good with him; if he ruin their houses they will repair them, and make them stronger and finer than they were before; their landlord shall not turn them out of doors, though they pay him no rent, but they will keep in possession. If the houses that were built of bricks be demolished in the war, we will rebuild them with hewn stones, that shall not so easily be thrown down. If the enemy cut down the sycamores, we will plant cedars in the room of them; we will make a hand of God's judgments, gain by them, and so outbrave them. Note, Those are ripening apace for ruin whose hearts are unhumbled under humbling providences; for God will walk contrary to those who thus walk contrary to him, and provoke him to jealousy, as if they were stronger than he.

2. Their incorrigibleness under all the rebukes of Providence hitherto; ver. 13, "The people turneth not unto him that smiteth them." They are not wrought upon to reform their lives, to forsake their sins, and to return to their duty, "neither do they seek the Lord of hosts." Either they are atheists, and have no religion, or idolaters, and seek to those gods that are creatures of their own fancy, and the works of their own hands. Note, That which God designs in smiting us is to turn us to himself, and to set us a seeking him. And if this point be not gained by lesser judgments, greater may be expected. God smites that he may not kill.

3. Their general corruption of manners, and abounding profaneness. 1st. Those that should have reformed them helped to debauch them; ver. 16, "The leaders of this people" mislead them, and "cause them to err," by conniving at their wickedness, and countenancing wicked people, and by setting them ill examples; and then no wonder if they that are led of them be deceived, and so destroyed. But it is ill with a people when their physicians are their worse disease; 'They that bless this people, or call them blessed,' (so the margin reads it,) that flatter them, and soothe them up in their wickedness, and cry, Peace, peace, to them, they "cause them to err;" and they "that are called blessed of them, are swallowed up" ere they are aware. We have reason to be afraid of those that speak well of us when we do ill: see Pr. xxiv. 24; xxix. 5. 2nd. Wickedness was universal, and all were infected with it; ver. 17, "Every one is an hypocrite and an evil-doer." If there be any that are good, they do not, they dare not, appear; for "every mouth speaks folly and villany;" every one is profane towards God, (so the word properly signifies,) and an evil-doer towards man. These two commonly go together, they that fear not God, regard not man; and then every mouth speaks folly, falsehood, and reproach, both against God and man; for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks."

Thirdly. The judgments threatened against them for this wickedness of theirs. Let them not think to go unpunished.

1. In general. Hereby they exposed themselves to the wrath of God, which should both devour as fire and darken as smoke. 1st. It should devour as fire; ver. 18, "Wickedness shall burn as the fire," that is, the displeasure of God incurred by sin shall consume the sinners who have made themselves as briars and thorns before it, and as the thickets of the forest; combustible matter, which the wrath of the Lord of hosts, the mighty God, will go through, and burn together. 2nd. It should darken as smoke. The briars and thorns, when the fire consumes them, "shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke," so that the whole land shall be darkened by it. They shall be in trouble, and see no way out; ver. 19, "The people shall be as the fuel of the fire." God's wrath fastens upon none but those that make themselves fuel for it; and then they mount up as the smoke of sacrifices; being made victims to Divine justice.

2. God would arm the neighbouring powers against them, ver. 11, 12. At this time the kingdom of Israel was in league with that of Syria against Judah; but the Assyrians, who were adversaries to the Syrians, when they had conquered them should invade Israel; and God will stir them up to do it, and join the enemies of Israel together in alliance against them, who yet have particular ends of their own to serve, and are not aware of God's hand in their alliance. Note, 1st. When enemies are set up and joined in confederacy against a people, God's hand must be acknowledged in it. 2nd. Those that partake with each other in sin, as Syria and Israel in invading Judah, must expect to share in the punishment of sin. Nay, the Syrians themselves, that they were now in league with, should be a scourge to them, (for it is no unusual thing for those to fall out that have been one in an ill thing;) "they before, and the Philistines behind;" one attacking them in the front, the other flanking them, or falling upon their rear, so that they should be surrounded with enemies on all sides, that should "devour them with open mouth," ver. 12. The Philistines were not now looked upon as formidable enemies, and the Syrians were looked upon as fast friends, and yet these shall devour Israel. When men's ways displease the Lord he makes even their friends to be at war with them.

3. God would take from the midst of them those they confided in, and promised themselves help from, ver. 14, 15. Because the people seek not God, those they seek to, and depend upon, shall stand them in no stead. The Lord will "cut off head and tail, branch and rush," which is explained in the next verse. 1st. Their magistrates, that were honourable by birth and office, and were the ancients of the people, these were the head, those were the branch, which they promised themselves spirit and fruit from; but because these caused them to err they shall be cut off, and their dignity and power shall be no protection to them when the abuse of that dignity and power was the great provocation. And it was a judgment upon the people to have their princes cut off, though they were not such as they should be. 2nd. Their prophets, their false prophets, were the tail and the rush, the most despicable distress: in the first time he brought into disgrace the land of Zebulun, and the land of Naphtali; and in the last he brings to honour the road by the sea, the other side of Jordan, the circle of the Gentiles." Although badly worded, this version deserves attention. We think, however, that "circle" for "Galilee" can scarcely be maintained. (See Matt. iv. 15, in which part of the words are quoted.)

ix. 3. A various reading occurs here, and is somewhat wrongly indicated in the margin. For "Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy" we may read, "Thou hast multiplied the nation, and hast increased its joy," which is supported by good authorities, ancient as well as modern. (See chap. xlix. 5.)

ix. 4 "The yoke of his burden" is "his burdensome yoke;" "the staff of his shoulder" may either be the staff with which he is beaten or a pole over the shoulder for carrying loads; "the rod of his oppressor" is the rod of the slave-driver. For "the day of Midian" see Judg. vii. 21, &c., relating the overthrow of the Midianites.

of all other. A wicked minister is the worst of men. Corruptio optimi est pessima, -'the best things, when corrupted, become the worst.' The blind led the blind, and so both fell into the ditch; and the blind leaders fell first, and fell undermost.

Fourthly. That the desolation should be as general as the corruption had been, and none should escape it, ver. 17. 1. Not those that were the objects of complacency; none shall be spared for love. "The Lord shall have no joy in their young men," that were in the flower of their youth; nor will he say, "Deal gently with the young men for my sake;" no, let them fall with the rest, and with them let the seed of the next generation perish. 2. Not those that were the objects of compassion; none shall be spared for pity. He shall not "have mercy on the fatherless and widows," though he used to be in a particular manner their patron and protector. They had corrupted their way like all the rest; and if the poverty and helplessness of their state was not an argument with them to keep them from sin, they could not expect it should be an argument with God to protect them from judgments.

Fifthly. That they should pull one another to pieces, and every one should help forward the common ruin, and they should be cannibals to themselves, and one to another. "No man shall spare his brother" if he come in the way of his ambition or covetousness, or if he have any colour to be revenged on him. And how can they expect God should spare them, when they shew no compassion one to another? Men's passion and cruelty one against another provokes God to be angry with them all, and is an evidence that he is so. Civil wars soon bring a kingdom to desolation. Such they were in Israel when "for the transgression of the land many were the princes thereof," 2 Kin. xiv. 16. In these intestine broils, men "snatched on the right hand, and yet were hungry still," and did eat "the flesh of their own arm," preyed upon themselves for hunger, or upon their nearest relations, that were as their own flesh, ver. 20. This speaks, 1. Great famine and scarcity. When men had pulled all they could to them it was so little that they were still hungry, at least God did not bless it to them, so that "they eat and have not enough," Hag. i. 6. 2. Great rapine and plunder. Jusque datum sceleri,—'iniquity is established by law.' The hedge of property, which is a hedge of protection to men's estates, shall be plucked up; and every man shall think all that his own which he can lay his hands on; vivitur ex rapto, non hospes ab hospite tutus,—'we live on the spoil, and the rights of hospitality are all violated.' And yet, when men thus catch at that which is none of their own, they are not satisfied. Covetous desires are insatiable, and this curse is entailed on that which is ill got, that it will never do well. These intestine broils should be not only among particular persons, and private families, but among the tribes; ver. 21, "Manasseh shall devour Ephraim, and Ephraim Manasseh," though they together be against Judah. They that could unite against Judah could not unite with one another; but that sinful confederacy of theirs against their neighbour that dwelt securely by them was justly punished by this separation of them one from another. Or, Judah having sinned like Manasseh and Ephraim, shall not only suffer with them, but suffer by them. Note, Mutual enmity and animosity among the tribes of God's Israel is such a sin as ripens them for ruin, and a sad symptom of ruin hastening on apace. If Ephraim be against Manasseh, and Manasseh against Ephraim, and both against Judah, they will all soon become a very easy prey to the common enemy.

Sixthly. That, though they should be followed with all those judgments, yet God would not let fall his controversy with them. It is the heavy burthen of this song, ver. 12, again, ver. 17, and in the close, ver. 21, "For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still;" that is, 1. They do nothing to turn away his anger; they do not repent and reform, do not humble themselves and pray; none stand in the gap, none answer to God's calls, nor comply with the designs of his providences, but they are hardened and secure. 2. His anger therefore continues to burn against them, and "his hand is stretched out still." The reason why the judgments of God are prolonged is, because the point is not gained, sinners are not brought to repentance by them. "The people turneth not to him that smiteth them," and therefore he continues to smite them; for when God judgeth he will overcome, and the proudest, stoutest sinner shall either bend or break.

CHAPTER X.

The prophet in this chapter is dealing, I. With the proud oppressors of his people at home, that abused their power to pervert justice, whom he would reckon with for their tyranny, ver. 1—4. II. With a threatening invader of his people from abroad, Sennacherib king of Assyria, concerning whom observe, 1. The commission given him to invade Judah, ver. 5, 6; 2. His pride and insolence in the execution of that commission, ver. 7—11, 13, 14; 3. A rebuke given to his haughtiness, and a threatening of his fall and ruin, when he had served the purposes for which God raised him up, ver. 12, 15—19; 4. A promise of grace to the people of God, to enable them to bear up under the affliction, and to get good by it, ver. 20—23; 5. Great encouragement given to them not to fear this threatening storm, but to hope that, though for the present all the country was put into a great consternation by it, yet it would end well in the destruction of this formidable enemy, ver. 24—34. And this is intended to quiet the minds of good people in reference to all the threatening efforts of the wrath of the church's enemies. If God be for us, who can be against us? None, to do us any harm.

WOE unto them that decree unrighteous decrees,
And that write grievousness which they have prescribed;
2 To turn aside the needy from judgment,
And to take away the right from the poor of my people,
That widows may be their prey,
And that they may rob the fatherless!
3 And what will ye do in the day of visitation,
And in the desolation which shall come from far?
To whom will ye flee for help?
And where will ye leave your glory?
4 Without me they shall bow down under the prisoners,
And they shall fall under the slain.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.

Whether they were the princes and judges of Israel or Judah, or both, that the prophet denounced this woe against, is not certain. If those of Israel, these verses are to be joined with the close of the foregoing chapter; which is probable enough, because the burthen of that prophecy, "For all this his anger is not turned away," is repeated here, ver. 4. If those of Judah, they then shew what was the particular sin for which God brought the Assyrian army upon them, to punish their magistrates for maladministration, which they could not legally be called to account for. To them he speaks woes before he speaks comforts to God's own people. Here is,

First. The indictment drawn up against these oppressors, ver. 1, 2. They are charged, 1. With making wicked laws and edicts. They "decree unrighteous decrees," contrary to natural equity and the law of God; and what mischief they prescribe those under them write it, enrol it, and put it into the formality of a law. Woe to the superior powers that devise and decree these decrees! they are not too high to be under the Divine check; and woe to the inferior officers that draw them up, and enter them upon record, "the writers that write the grievousness," they are not too mean to be within the Divine cognizance. Principal and accessaries shall fall under the same woe. Note, It is bad to do hurt, but it is worse to do it with design and deliberation; to do wrong to many, and to involve many in the guilt of doing wrong. 2. With perverting justice in the execution of the laws that were made. No people had statutes and judgments so righteous as they had; and yet corrupt judges found ways to "turn aside the needy from judgment," to hinder them from coming at their right, and recovering what was their due, because they were needy and poor, and such as they could get nothing by, nor expect any bribes from. 3. With enriching themselves by oppressing those that lay at their mercy, whom they ought to have protected. They make widows' houses and estates their prey and they rob the fatherless of the little that is left them, because they have no friend to appear for them. Not to relieve them if they had wanted, not to right them if they were wronged, had been crime enough in men that had wealth and power; but to rob them, because on the side of the oppressors there was power, and the oppressed had no comforter, Eccl. iv. 4, is such a piece of barbarity, as one would think none could ever be guilty of that had either the nature of a man, or the name of an Israelite.

Secondly. A challenge given them with all their pride and power, to outface the judgments of God; ver. 3, "What will ye do? To whom will ye flee?" You can trample upon the widows and fatherless, but "what will ye do when God riseth up?" Job xxxi. 14. Great men, that tyrannize over the poor, think they shall never be called to account for it, shall never hear of it again, or fare the worse for it; but "shall not God visit for these things?" Jer. v. 29. Will there not come a desolation upon those that have made others desolate? Perhaps it may come from far, and therefore may be long in coming, but it will come at last. Reprieves are not pardons; and coming from far, from a quarter whence it was least expected, it will be the greater surprise, and the more terrible. Now what will then become of these unrighteous judges? Now they see their help in the gate, Job xxxi. 21. But to whom will they then flee for help? Note, 1. There is a day of visitation coming, a day of inquiry and discovery, a searching day, which will bring to light, to a true light, every man and every man's work. 2. The day of visitation will be a day of desolation to all wicked people, when all their comforts and hopes will be lost and gone, and buried in ruin, and themselves left desolate. 3. Impenitent sinners will be utterly at a loss, and will not know what to do in the day of visitation and desolation. They cannot fly and hide themselves, cannot fight it out, and defend themselves. They have no refuge in which either to shelter themselves from the present evil, "To whom will ye flee for help?" or to secure themselves better times hereafter, "Where will you leave your glory," to find it again, when the storm is over? The wealth they had got was their glory, and they had no place of safety in which to deposit that, but they should certainly see it flee away. If our souls be our glory, as they ought to be, and we make them our chief care, we know where to leave them, and into whose hands to commit them, even those of a faithful Creator. 4. It concerns us all seriously to consider what we shall do in the day of visitation, in a day of affliction, in the day of death and judgment, and to provide that we may do well.

Thirdly. Sentence passed upon them, by which they are doomed some to imprisonment and captivity; "They shall bow down among the prisoners," or, "under them:" Those that were most highly elevated in sin shall be most heavily loaded, and most deeply sunk in trouble; others, to death, they shall fall first, and so shall fall under the rest of the slain. They that had trampled upon the widows and fatherless shall themselves be trodden down, ver. 4. This it will come to, saith God, without me; that is, because you have deserted me, and driven me away from you. Nothing but utter ruin can be expected by those that live without God in the world; that cast him behind their back, and so cast themselves out of his protection.

And yet "for all this his anger is not turned away;" which intimates not only that God will proceed in his controversy with them, but that they shall be in a continual dread of it. They shall, to their unspeakable terror, see his hand still stretched out against them, and there shall remain nothing but a "fearful looking for of judgment."

5 O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger,
And the staff in their hand is mine indignation.
6 I will send him against an hypocritical nation,
And against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge,
To take the spoil, and to take the prey,
And to tread them down like the mire of the streets.
7 Howbeit he meaneth not so,
Neither doth his heart think so;
But it is in his heart to destroy
And cut off nations not a few.
8 For he saith,
Are not my princes altogether kings?
9 Is not Calno as Carchemish?
Is not Hamath as Arpad?
Is not Samaria as Damascus?
10 As my hand hath found the kingdoms of the idols,

ix. 5. This may be rendered, "For all the armour of the armed man in the tumult (of battle), and garments rolled in blood, shall be for burning and fuel for fire."

ix. 6. This most important verse involves fewer difficulties of translation than of exposition. The expressions "mighty God" and everlasting Father" have, however, been questioned. As to the former, some connect it with counsellor, as "counsellor of the mighty God;" others, feeling this untenable, render it "mighty hero" A sufficient answer is found in chap. x. 21. As to the other phrase, it may be rendered, "Father of Eternity," or "Eternal Father," and a number of other texts amply support these renderings. Fürst, who calls this text doubtful, practically justifies the orthodox view, by referring to Isa. xlv. 17, lvii. 15; Psa. ix. 5, x. 16, &c.

ix. 7. "Peace" here includes all that we understand by prosperity, happiness, and plenty.

ix. 8. We might render this verse, "The Lord cast a word upon

And whose graven images did excel them of Jerusalem and of Samaria;
11 Shall I not, as I have done unto Samaria and her idols,
So do to Jerusalem and her idols?
12 Wherefore it shall come to pass,
That when the Lord hath performed his whole work
Upon mount Zion and on Jerusalem,
I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria,
And the glory of his high looks.
13 For he saith,
By the strength of my hand I have done it,
And by my wisdom; for I am prudent:
And I have removed the bounds of the people,
And have robbed their treasures,
And I have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man:
14 And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people:
And as one gathereth eggs that are left.
Have I gathered all the earth;
And there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped.
15 Shall the ax boast itself against him that heweth therewith?
Or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it?
As if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up,
Or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood.

SAW, AXES, AND STAVES.

16 Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send Among his fat ones leanness;
And under his glory he shall kindle a burning
Like the burning of a fire.
17 And the light of Israel shall be for a fire,
And his Holy One for a flame:
And it shall burn and devour his thorns
And his briers in one day;
18 And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field,
Both soul and body:
And they shall be as when a standardbearer fainteth.
19 And the rest of the trees of his forest shall be few,
That a child may write them.

The destruction of the kingdom of Israel by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, was foretold in the foregoing chapter, and it had its accomplishment in the sixth year of Hezekiah, 2 Kin. xviii. 10. It was total and final, head and tail were all cut off. Now the correction of the kingdom of Judah by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, is foretold in this chapter; and this prediction was fulfilled in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, when that potent prince, encouraged by the successes of his predecessors against the ten tribes, "came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them, and laid siege to Jerusalem," 2 Kin. xviii. 13, and a mighty fright we may well suppose Hezekiah and his kingdom to be in, though there was a good work of reformation lately begun among them. But it ended well, in the confusion of the Assyrians, and the great encouragement of Hezekiah and his people in their return to God. Now let us see here:

First. How God in his sovereignty deputed the king of Assyria to be his servant, and made use of him as a mere tool to serve his own purposes with; ver. 5, 6. "O Assyrian," know this, that thou art "the rod of mine anger;" and I will send thee to be a scourge to "the people of my wrath." Observe here,

1. How bad the character of the Jews is, though they appeared very good. They are a hypocritical nation, that made a profession of religion, and at this time particularly of reformation; but were not truly religious, not truly reformed, not so good as they pretended to be. Now Hezekiah had brought goodness into fashion. When rulers are pious, and so religion is in reputation, it is common for nations to be hypocritical. They are a profane nation, so some read it. Hezekiah had in a great measure cured them of their idolatry, and now they run into profaneness; nay, hypocrisy is profaneness; none profane the name of God so much as those who are called by that name, and call upon it, and yet live in sin. Being a profane, hypocritical nation, they are the people of God's wrath; they lie under his wrath, and are likely to be consumed by it. Note, Hypocritical nations are the people of God's wrath. Nothing is more offensive to God than dissimulation in religion. See what a change sin made: they that had been God's chosen and hallowed people, above all people, were now become the people of his wrath: see Am. iii. 2.

2. How mean the character of the Assyrian is, though he appeared very great. He is but the rod of God's anger; an instrument that God is pleased to make use of for the chastening of his people, that being thus "chastened of the Lord, they may not be condemned with the world." Note, The tyrants of the world are but the tools of Providence. Men are God's hand, his sword sometimes, to kill and slay, Ps. xvii. 13, 14. At other times they are his rod to correct. "The staff in their hand," wherewith they smite his people, is his indignation; it is his wrath that puts the staff into their hand, and enables them to deal blows at pleasure among such as thought themselves a match for them. Sometimes God makes an idolatrous nation, that serves him not at all, a scourge to a hypocritical nation, that serves him not in sincerity and truth. The Assyrian is called the rod of God's anger, because he is employed by him: 1st. From him his power is derived; "I will send him, I will give him a charge." Note, All the power that wicked men have, though they often use it against God, yet they always receive it from him. Pilate could have no power against Christ, unless it were given him from above, Jno. xix. 11. 2nd. By him the exercise of that power is directed. He is to take the spoil, and to take the prey, not to shed any blood, (we read not of any slain,) but to plunder the country, rifle the houses, and drive the cattle, and strip them of all their wealth and ornaments, and to "tread them down like the mire of the streets." When God's professing people wallow in the mire of sin, it is just with God to suffer their enemies to tread upon them like mire. But why must the Assyrian prevail thus against them? Not that they might be ruined, but that they might be thoroughly reformed.

Secondly. See how the king of Assyria in his pride magnified himself as his own master, and pretended to be absolute, and above all control; to act purely according to his own will, and for his own honour. "God ordained him for judgment," even the mighty God established him for correction," Hab. i. 12, to be an instrument of bringing his people to repentance; "Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so," ver. 7. He doth not think that he is either God's servant or Israel's friend; either that he can do no more than God will let him, or that he shall do no more than God will make to work for the good of his people. God designs to correct his people for, and so to cure them of, their hypocrisy, and bring them nearer to him. But was that Sennacherib's design? No, it was the farthest thing from his thoughts; "He meaneth not so." Note, 1. The wise God often makes even the sinful passions and projects of men subservient to his own great and holy purposes. 2. When God makes use of men as instruments in his hand to do his work, it is very common for him to mean one thing, and them to mean another; nay for them to mean quite contrary to what he intends. What Joseph's brethren designed for hurt God overruled for good, Gen. l. 20: see Mic. iv. 11, 12. Men have their ends, and God his; but we are sure "the counsel of the Lord that shall stand." But what is it that the proud Assyrian aims at? The heart of kings is unsearchable, but God knew what was in his heart: he designs nothing but to destroy, and to cut off nations not a few, and to make himself master of them. 1st. He designs to gratify his own cruelty; nothing will serve but to destroy and cut off. He hopes to regale himself with blood and slaughter; that of particular persons will not suffice, he must cut off nations. It is below him to deal by retail, he traffics in murders by wholesale. Nations, and those not a few, must have but one neck, which he will have the pleasure of cutting off. 2nd. He designs to gratify his own covetousness and ambition, to set up for an universal monarch, and "to gather unto him all nations," Hab. ii. 5. An insatiable desire of wealth and dominion is that which carries him on in this undertaking.

The prophet here brings him in vaunting and hectoring; and by his general's letter to Hezekiah, written in his name, vainglory and arrogance seem to have entered very far into the spirit and genius of the man. His haughtiness and presumption are here described very largely, and his very language copied out, partly to represent him as ridiculous, and partly to assure the people of God that he would be brought down; for that maxim generally holds true, that pride goes before destruction. It also intimates that God takes notice, and keeps an account of all men's proud and haughty words, with which they set heaven and earth at defiance. They that speak great and swelling words of vanity shall hear of them again.

First. He brags what great things he has done to other nations: 1*st.* He has made their kings his courtiers; ver. 8, "My princes are altogether kings;" that is, those that are now my princes are such as have been kings. Or, he means that he had raised his throne to that degree that his servants and those that were in command under him, were as great, and lived in as much pomp, as the kings of other countries. Or, those that were absolute princes in their own dominions held their crowns under him, and did him homage. This was a vainglorious boast; but how great is our God, whom we serve, who is indeed King of kings, and whose subjects are made to him kings? Rev. i. 5. 2*nd.* He has made himself master of their cities. He names several, ver. 9, that were all alike reduced by him; Calno soon yielded, as Carchemish did; Hamath could not hold out any more than Arpad; and Samaria is become his, as well as Damascus. To support his boasts, he is fain to bring the victories of his predecessor into the account; for it was he that conquered Samaria, not Sennacherib. 3*rd.* He had been too hard for their idols, their tutelar gods, and had "found out the kingdoms of the idols," and found out ways to make them his own, ver. 10. Their kingdoms took denomination from the idols they worshipped; the Moabites are called the people of Chemosh, Jer. xlviii. 46, because they imagined their gods were their patrons and protectors; and therefore Sennacherib vainly imagines that every conquest of a kingdom was the conquest of a god. 4*th.* He had enlarged his own dominions, and "removed the bounds of the people," ver. 13, enclosing many large territories within the limits of his own kingdom, and shifting a great way farther the ancient landmarks which his fathers had set; he could not bear to be hemmed in so close, but must have more room to thrive. By his "removing the border of the people," Mr. White understands his arbitrary transplanting of colonies from place to place, which was the constant practice of the Assyrians, in all their conquests; which is a probable interpretation. 5*th.* He had enriched himself with their wealth, and brought it into his own exchequer. "I have robbed their treasures:" in that said he truly. Great conquerors are many times no better than great robbers. 6*th.* He had mastered all the opposition he met with; "I have put down the inhabit-

Jacob, and it fell upon Israel." Jacob and Israel are one, and therefore the message reached its aim. Still, Israel here may specially refer to the ten tribes, as the next verses suggest.

ix. 9. Ephraim is often put for the whole of the northern kingdom, of which Samaria was the capital.

ix. 11. For "adversaries" some copies here read "princes," but the ancient versions all agree with our translation.

ix. 12. "Before" and "behind" here mean "on the east" and "on the west." The Syrian version wrongly has "Edomites" for "Syrians," or Arameans.

ix. 14. "Branch and rush" mean "high and low."

ix. 17. "Hypocrite:" rather, "profane man."

ix. 18. The general idea is that wickedness is a ruinous thing, and that what it burns is carried away like fuel in smoke.

ix. 19—21. These verses are closely connected. In the time of calamity one wicked man will not spare another.

ants as a valiant man." Those that sat high, and thought they sat firm, I have humbled them, and made them come down.

He brags, (1.) That he had done all this by his own policy and power; ver. 13, "By the strength of my hand, for I am valiant, and by my wisdom, for I am prudent," not by the permission of Providence and the blessing of God. He knows not that it is God that makes him what he is, and puts the staff into his hand, but "sacrificeth to his own net," Hab. i. 26. It is all gotten by "my might, and the power of my hand," Deu. viii. 17. There is downright atheism and profaneness, as well as pride and vanity, at the bottom of men's attributing their prosperity and success thus to themselves and their own conduct, and raising their own character upon it. (2.) That he had done all this with a great deal of ease, and had made but a sport and diversion of it, as if he had been taking birds' nests; ver. 14, "My hand has found a nest, the riches of the people;" and when I had found them, there was no more difficulty in taking them than in rifling a nest, nor any more reluctance or regret within his own breast, in destroying families and cities, than in destroying crows' nests; killing children was no more to him than killing birds. "As one gathereth the eggs that are left" in the nest by the dam, so easily "have I gathered all the earth." Like Alexander, he thought he had conquered the world; and whatever prey he seized, "there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped," as birds use to do when their nests are rifled; they durst not make any opposition, no, nor any complaint. Such awe did they stand in of this mighty conqueror. They were so weak that they knew it was to no purpose to resist, and he was so arbitrary that they knew it was to no purpose to complain. Strange that ever men, who were made to do good, should take a pride and take a pleasure in doing wrong and doing mischief to all about them without control, and should reckon that their glory which is their shame. But their day will come to fall who thus make themselves "the terror of the mighty," and much more of the feeble, "in the land of the living."

Secondly. He threatens what he will do to Jerusalem, which he was now about to lay siege to, ver. 10, 11. He would master Jerusalem and her idols, as he had subdued other places and their idols, particularly Samaria. 1*st.* He blasphemously calls the God of Israel an idol, and sets him on a level with the false gods of other nations, as if none were the true God but Mithras, the sun, whom he worshipped. See how ignorant he was, and then we shall the less wonder that he was so proud. 2*nd.* He prefers the graven images of other countries before those of Jerusalem and Samaria, when he might have known that the worshippers of the God of Israel were expressly forbidden to make any graven images; and if any did it must be by stealth, and therefore they could not be so rich and pompous as those of other nations. If he mean the ark and the mercy-seat, he speaks like himself, very foolishly, and as one that judged by the sight of the eye, and might therefore be easily deceived in matters of spiritual concern. Those who make external pomp and splendour a mark of the true church go by the same rule. 3*rd.* Because he had conquered Samaria, he concludes Jerusalem would fall of course, "Shall not I do so to Jerusalem?" that is, Can I not as easily, and may I not as justly? But it did not follow; for Jerusalem adhered to her God, whereas Syria had forsaken him.

Thirdly. See how God in his justice rebukes his pride and reads his doom. We have heard what the great king, the king of Assyria, saith, and how big he talks; let us now hear what the great God hath to say, by his servant the prophet, and we shall find that wherein he deals proudly God is above him.

1. He shews the vanity of his insolent and audacious boasts; ver. 15, "Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that draws it?" So absurd are the brags of this proud man. O what a dust do I make! said the fly upon the cart-wheel, in the fable. What destruction do I make among the trees! saith the axe. Two ways the axe may be said to "boast itself against him that hews with it;" 1st. By way of resistance and opposition. Sennacherib blasphemed God, insulted him, threatened to serve him as he had served the gods of the nations. Now this was as if the axe should fly in the face of him that hews with it. The tool striving with the workman is no less absurd than the clay striving with the potter. And as it is a thing not to be justified, that men should fight against God with that wit, and wealth, and power which he gives them, so it is a thing not to be suffered; but if men will be thus proud and daring, and bid defiance to all that is just and sacred, let them expect that God will reckon with them; the more insolent they are the surer and sorer will their ruin be. 2nd. By way of rivalship and competition. Shall the axe take to itself the praise of the work it is employed in? So senseless, so absurd, was it for Sennacherib to say, "By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom," ver. 13. It is as if the rod, when it is shaken, should brag that it guides the hand that shakes it. Whereas, 'when the staff is lifted up, is it not wood still?' so the last clause may be read. If it be an ensign of authority, as the nobles of the people carried staves, Num. xxi. 18, if it be an instrument of service, either to support a weak man or to correct an ill man, yet still it is wood, and can do nothing but as it is directed by him that useth it. The psalmist prays that God would make the nations to know that they were but men, Ps. ix. 20, the staff to know that it is but wood.

2. He foretells his fall and ruin.

1st. That when God hath done his work by him, he will then do his work upon him, ver. 12. For the comfort of the people of God, in reference to Sennacherib's invasion, though it was a dismal time with them, let them know, First. That God designed to do good to Zion and Jerusalem by this providence. There is a work to be done upon them, which God intends, and which he will perform. Note, When God lets loose the enemies of his church and people, and suffers them for a time to prevail, it is in order to the performing of some great good work upon them, and when that is done, then, and not till then, he will work deliverance for them. When God brings his people into trouble, it is to try them, Dan. xi. 35, to bring sin to their remembrance and humble them for it, and to awaken them to a sense of their duty, to teach them to pray, and to love and help one another; and this must be the fruit, even the taking away of sin, ch. xxvii. 9. When these points are in some measure gained by the affliction, it shall be removed in mercy, Lev. xxvi. 41, 42, otherwise not; for as the word, so the rod, shall accomplish that for which God sends it. Secondly. That when God had wrought this work of grace for his people, he would work a work of wrath and vengeance upon their invaders, "I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria." His big words are here said to come from his stout heart, and they are the fruit of it, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks." Notice is taken too of the "glory of his high looks," for a proud look is the indication of a proud spirit. The enemies of the church are commonly very high and haughty, but sooner or later God will reckon for that. He glories in it as an incontestable proof of his power and sovereignty, that he "looks upon proud men and abaseth them," Job xl. 11, &c.

2nd. That how threatening soever this attempt was upon Zion and Jerusalem, it should certainly be baffled and broken, and come to nothing, and he should not be able to bring to pass his enterprise, ver. 16—19. Observe,

First. Who it is that undertakes his destruction, and will be the author of it. Not Hezekiah, or his princes, or the militia of Judah and Jerusalem; what can they do against such a potent force? but God himself will do it, as the Lord of hosts and as the light of Israel. 1*st.* We are sure he can do it, for he is Lord of hosts, of all the hosts of heaven and earth. All the creatures are at his command; he makes what use he pleaseth of them, and lays what restraints he pleaseth on them. He is the Lord of the hosts both of Judah and of Assyria, and can give the victory to which he pleaseth. Let us not fear the hosts of any enemy, if we have the Lord of hosts for us. 2*nd.* We have reason to hope he will do it, for he is the light of Israel and his Holy One. God is light, in him there is perfect brightness, purity, and happiness. He is light, for he is the Holy One; his holiness is his glory. He is Israel's light, to direct and counsel his people, to favour and countenance them, and so to rejoice and comfort them in the worst of times. He is their Holy One, for he is in covenant with them; his holiness is engaged and employed for them. God's holiness is the saints' comfort; they give thanks at the remembrance of it, and with a great deal of pleasure call him their Holy One, Hab. i. 12.

Secondly. How his destruction is represented. It shall be, 1*st.* As a consumption of the body by a disease; "The Lord shall send leanness among his fatnesses," or his fat ones. His numerous army, that was like a body covered with fatness, shall be diminished and waste away, and become like a skeleton. 2*nd.* As a consumption of buildings, or trees, and bushes by fire. Under his glory, that very thing which he glories in, he will "kindle a burning, as the burning of a fire," which shall lay his army in ruins, as suddenly as a raging fire lays a stately house in ashes. Some make it an allusion to the fire kindled under the sacrifices, for proud sinners fall as sacrifices to Divine justice. Observe, (1.) How this fire shall be kindled; ver. 17, the same God that is a rejoicing light to them that serve him faithfully will be a consuming fire to them that trifle with him, or rebel against him; the light of Israel shall be for a fire to the Assyrians, as the same pillar of cloud was a light to the Israelites and a terror to the Egyptians in the Red sea. What can oppose, what can extinguish, such a fire? (2.) What desolation it shall make. "It shall burn and devour his thorns and briars;" his officers and soldiers, which are of little worth, and vexatious to God's Israel, as thorns and briars, whose end is to be burned, and which are easily and quickly consumed by a devouring fire; ch. xxvii. 4, "Who would set the briars and thorns against me in battle?" they will be so far from stopping the fire that they will inflame it. "I would go through them and burn them together;" they shall be devoured in one day, all cut off in an instant. When they cried, not only peace and safety, but victory and triumph, then sudden destruction came; it came surprisingly, and was completed in a little time. Even the "glory of his forest," ver. 18, the choice troops of his army, the veterans, the troops of the household, the bravest regiments he had, that he was most proud of, and depended most upon, that he valued as men do their timber-trees, the glory of their forest, or their fruit-trees, the glory of their Carmel. Those shall be but as briars and thorns before the fire; they shall be consumed, both soul and body, entirely consumed; not only a limb burned, but life taken away. Note, God is able to destroy both soul and body, and therefore we should fear him more than man, who can but kill the body; and great armies before him are but as great woods, which he can fell or fire when he pleaseth.

Thirdly. And what would be the effect of this great slaughter the prophet tells us. 1*st.* That the army would hereby be reduced to a very small number; "The rest of the trees of his forest shall be few." Very few shall escape the sword of the destroying angel, so few that there needs no artist, no muster-master, or secretary of war to take an account of them, for even a child may soon reckon the numbers of them, and write the names of them. 2*nd.* That those few that remained should be quite dispirited, "They shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth," when he either falls or flees, and his colours are taken by the enemy; this discourageth the whole army, and puts them all into confusion. Upon the whole matter we must say, "Who is able to stand before this great and holy Lord God?"

20 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the remnant of Israel,
And such as are escaped of the house of Jacob,
Shall no more again stay upon him that smote them;
But shall stay upon the LORD,
The Holy One of Israel, in truth.
21 The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob,
Unto the mighty God
22 For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea,
Yet a remnant of them shall return: [ness.
The consumption decreed shall overflow with righteous-23 For the Lord GOD of hosts shall make a consumption,
In the midst of all the land. [even determined,

The prophet had said, ver. 12, that "the Lord would perform his whole work upon mount Zion and upon Jerusalem," by Sennacherib's invading of the land; now here we are told what that work should be, a twofold work:

First. The conversion of some, to whom this providence should be sanctified, and yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness, though for the present it was not joyous but grievous. These are but "a remnant," ver. 22; "the remnant of Israel," ver. 20; "the remnant of Jacob," ver. 21; but a very few in comparison with the vast numbers of the people of Israel, which were as the sand of the sea. Note, Converting work is wrought but on a remnant, who are distinguished from the rest and set apart for God. When we see how populous Israel is, how numerous the members of the visible church are, as the sand of the sea, and yet consider that of those a remnant only shall be saved, that of the many that are called there are but few chosen, we shall surely strive to enter in at the strait gate, and fear lest we seem to come short. This remnant of Israel is said to be such as are escaped of the house of Jacob, such as escaped the corruptions of the house of Jacob, and kept their integrity in times of common apostacy, and that was a fair escape. And therefore they escape the desolations of that house, and shall be preserved in safety in times of common calamity; and that also will be a fair and narrow escape, (their lives shall be given them for a prey, Jer. xlv. 5,) the righteous scarcely are saved. Now, 1. This remnant shall come off from all confidence in an arm of flesh; this providence shall cure them of that; they "shall no more again stay upon him that smote them," that is, shall never depend upon the Assyrians as they have done, for help against their other enemies, finding that they are themselves their worst enemies. Ictus piscator sapit,—'Sufferings teach caution.' They have now learned, by dear-bought experience, the folly of leaning upon that staff as a stay to them, which may x. 12. The woe of the fifth verse is here recurred to, in the declaration that the proud Assyrian shall be punished.

x. 16. "His fat ones" are probably the prosperous followers or armies of the Assyrian king, whose glory is therefore meant by the words "his glory."

x. 17. "The light of Israel" is the Lord. "His Holy One" is the Lord, the Holy One of Israel. "His thorns and his briers" are the Assyrian's forces.

x. 18, 19. The word "his" in these two verses must still be understood of the Assyrian, whose doom is declared.

x. 20, 21. The Hebrews should no longer, or no more, rely upon the Assyrian who had smitten them.

x. 22, 23. The common version here is in part obscure. Of the multitudes of Israel only a remnant should return. In the justice of God the ruin decreed would overflow them; for the Lord would effect in the land the ruin decreed.

perhaps prove a staff to beat them; it is part of the covenant of a returning people, Hos. xiv. 3, "Assyria shall not save us." Note, By our afflictions we may learn not to make creatures our confidence. 2. They shall come home to God, to the mighty God, one of the names given to the Messiah, ch. ix. 6, to the Holy One of Israel. "The remnant shall return;" that was signified by the name of the prophet's son, Shear-jashub, ch. vii. 3, even the remnant of Jacob. They shall return after the raising of the siege of Jerusalem, not only to the quiet possession of their houses and lands, but shall return to God and to their duty; they shall repent and pray, and seek his face, and reform their lives. The remnant that escape is a returning remnant; they shall return to God and shall stay upon him. Note, Those only may with comfort stay upon God that return to him; then may we have an humble confidence in God, when we make conscience of our duty to him. They "shall stay upon the Holy One of Israel in truth," and not in pretence and profession only. This promise of the conversion and salvation of a remnant of Israel now, is applied by the apostle, Rom. ix. 27, to the remnant of the Jews, which at the first preaching of the Gospel received and entertained it, and sufficiently proves that it was no new thing for God to abandon to ruin a great many of the seed of Abraham, and yet preserve his promise to Abraham in full force and virtue, for so it was now. The number of the children of Israel was as the sand of the sea, according to the promise, Gen. xxii. 17, and yet only a remnant shall be saved.

Secondly. The consumption of others; "The Lord God of hosts shall make a consumption," ver. 23. This is not meant as that, ver. 18, of the consumption of the Assyrian army, but of the consumption of the estates and families of many of the Jews by the Assyrian army. This is taken notice of to magnify the power and goodness of God in the escape of the distinguished remnant, and to let us know what shall become of those that will not return to God; they shall be wasted away by this consumption, this general decay in the midst of the land. Observe, 1. It is a consumption of God's own making; he is the author of it, the Lord God of hosts, whom none can resist, he shall make this consumption. 2. It is decreed, it is not the product of a sudden resolve, but was before ordained; it is determined not only that there shall be such a consumption, but it is cut out, (so the word is,) it is particularly appointed how far it shall extend, and how long it shall continue, who shall be consumed by it, and who not. 3. It is an overflowing consumption that shall overspread the land, and, like a mighty torrent or inundation, bear down all before it. 4. Though it overflows, it is not at random, but in righteousness, which signifies both wisdom and equity. God will justly bring this consumption upon a provoking people, but he will wisely and graciously set bounds to it; hitherto it shall come, and no farther.

24 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD of hosts,
O my people that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the [Assyrian:
He shall smite thee with a rod,
And shall lift up his staff against thee, after the manner of Egypt.
25 For yet a very little while, and the indignation shall cease,
And mine anger in their destruction.
26 And the LORD of hosts shall stir up a scourge for him
According to the slaughter of Midian at the rock of Oreb:
And as his rod was upon the sea,
So shall he lift it up after the manner of Egypt.
27 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That his burden shall be taken away from off thy shoulder,
And his yoke from off thy neck.
And the yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing.
28 He is come to Aiath, he is passed to Migron;
At Michmash he hath laid up his carriages:
29 They are gone over the passage:
They have taken up their lodging at Geba;
Ramah is afraid;
Gibeah of Saul is fled.
30 Lift up thy voice, O daughter of Gallim:
Cause it to be heard unto Laish,
O poor Anathoth.
31 Madmenah is removed;
The inhabitants of Gebim gather themselves to flee.
32 As yet shall he remain at Nob that day:
He shall shake his hand against the mount of the daughter of Zion,
The hill of Jerusalem.
33 Behold, the Lord, the LORD of hosts,
Shall lop the bough with terror:
And the high ones of stature shall be hewn down,
And the haughty shall be humbled.
34 And he shall cut down the thickets of the forest with iron,
And Lebanon shall fall by a mighty one.

The prophet in his preaching distinguisheth between the precious and the vile; for God in his providence, even in the same providence, doth so. He speaks terror in Sennacherib's invasion, to the hypocrites, that were the people of God's wrath, ver. 6; but here he speaks comfort to the sincere, that were the people of God's love. The judgment was sent for the sake of the former, the deliverance was wrought for the sake of the latter. Here is,

First. An exhortation to God's people not to be frightened at this threatening calamity, nor to be put into any confusion or consternation by it; ver. 24. Let "the sinners in Zion be afraid," ch. xxxiii. 14; but, "O my people that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the Assyrian." Note, It is against the mind and will of God that his people, whatever happens, should give way to that fear which has torment and amazement. They that dwell in Zion, where God dwells, and where his people attend him, and are employed in his service, that are under the protection of the bulwarks that are round about Zion, Ps. xlviii. 13, need not be afraid of any enemy. Let their souls dwell at ease in God.

Secondly. Considerations offered for the silencing of their fear:

1. The Assyrian shall do nothing against them but what God hath appointed and determined. They are here told beforehand what he shall do, that it may be no surprise to them; "He shall smite thee" by the Divine permission, but it shall be only with a rod to correct thee, not with a sword to wound and kill. Nay, "he shall but lift up his staff against thee," threaten thee, and frighten thee, and shake the rod at thee, "after the manner of Egypt," as the Egyptians shook their staff against your fathers at the Red sea, when they said, "We will pursue, we will overtake," Ex. xv. 9, but could not reach to do them any hurt. Note, We should not be frightened at those enemies that can do no more but frighten us.

2. The storm will soon blow over; ver. 25, "Yet a very little while," 'a little, little while,' so the word is, "and the indignation shall cease." Even mine anger, which is the staff in their hand, ver. 5; so that when that ceaseth they are disarmed, and disabled to do any farther mischief. Note, God's anger against his people is but for a moment, Ps. xxx. 5; and when that ceaseth, and is turned away from us, we need not fear the fury of any man, for it is impotent passion.

3. The enemy that threatens them shall himself be reckoned with. God's anger against his people shall cease in the destruction of their enemies; when he turns away his wrath from Israel, he shall turn it against the Assyrian, and the rod with which he corrected his people shall not only be laid aside, but thrown into the fire. He lifts up his staff against Zion, but God shall stir up a scourge for him, ver. 26; he is a terror to God's people, but God will be a terror to him: the destroying angel shall be this scourge, which he can neither flee from, nor contend with. The prophet, for the encouragement of God's people, quotes precedents; and puts them in mind of what God had done formerly against the enemies of his church that were very strong and formidable, but were brought to ruin. The destruction of the Assyrian shall be, 1st. "According to the slaughter of Midian," which was done by an invisible power, but done suddenly, and it was a total rout. And as at the rock of Oreb, one of the princes of Midian, after the battle, was slain, so shall Sennacherib be in the temple of his god Nisroch, after the defeat of his forces, when he thinks the bitterness of death is passed: compare with this, Ps. lxxxiii. 11, "Make their nobles like Oreb and like Zeeb," and see how God's promises and his people's prayers agree. 2nd. "As his rod was upon the sea," the Red sea, as Moses's rod was upon that, to divide it first for the escape of Israel, and then to close it again for the destruction of their pursuers, so shall his rod now be "lifted up, after the manner of Egypt," for the deliverance of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the Assyrian. Note, It is good to observe a resemblance between God's latter and former appearances for his people, and against his and their enemies.

4. They shall be wholly delivered from the power of the Assyrian, and from the fear of it, ver. 27. They shall not only be eased of the Assyrian army, which now quartered upon them, and which was a grievous yoke and burthen to them, but they shall no more pay that tribute to the king of Assyria which before this invasion he had exacted from them, 2 Kin. xviii. 14; shall be no longer at his service, nor lie at his mercy as they have done, nor shall he ever again put the country under contribution. And some think it looks farther to the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon; and farther yet to the redemption of believers from the tyranny of sin and Satan. The yoke shall not only be taken away, but it shall be destroyed; the enemy shall no more recover his strength to do the mischief he has done; and this "because of the anointing," for their sakes who were partakers of the anointing. 1st. For Hezekiah's sake, who was the anointed of the Lord, who had been an active reformer, and was dear to God. 2nd. For David's sake; that is particularly given as the reason why God would defend Jerusalem from Sennacherib, ch. xxxvii. 35, "For my own sake, and for my servant David's sake." 3rd. For his people Israel's sake; the good people among them that had received the unction of Divine grace. 4th. For the sake of the Messiah, the anointed of God; whom God had an eye to in all the deliverances of the Old Testament church, and hath still an eye to in all the favours he shews to his people; it is for his sake that the yoke is broken, and that we are made free indeed.

Thirdly. A description both of the terror of the enemy and the terror with which many were struck by it, and the folly of both exposed, ver. 28—34. Where observe,

1. How formidable the Assyrians were, and how daring and threatening they affected to appear. Here is a particular description of his march, what course he steered, what swift advances he made; "He is come to Aiath," &c. This and the other place he has made himself master of, and has met with no opposition; "At Michmash he has laid up his carriages," as if he had no farther occasion for his heavy artillery, so easily was every place he came to reduced; or, the store cities of Judah, which were fortified for that purpose, were now become his magazines. Some remarkable pass, and an important one, he had taken; "They are gone over the passage."

2. How cowardly the men of Judah were, the degenerate seed of that lion's whelp; they are afraid, they are fled upon the first alarm, and did not offer to make any head against the enemy; their apostacy from God had dispirited them, so that one chases a thousand of them. Instead of a valiant shout to animate one another, nothing was heard but lamentation to discourage and weaken one another. And poor Anathoth, a priest's city, that should have been a pattern of courage, shrieks louder than any, ver. 30; those that gathered themselves together, it was not to fight but to flee by consent, ver. 31. This is designed either, 1st. To shew how fast the news of the enemy's progress flew through the kingdom, "He is come to Aiath," saith one; Nay, saith another, "he is passed to Migron," &c. And yet, perhaps, it was not altogether so bad as common fame represented it. But we must watch against the fear, not only of evil things but of evil tidings, which often make the things worse than really they are, Ps. cxii. 7. Or, 2nd. To shew what imminent danger Jerusalem was in, when its enemies made so many bold advances towards it, and its friends could not make one bold stand to defend it. Note, The more daring the church's enemies are, and the more dastardly those are that should appear for her, the more will God be exalted in his own strength, when, notwithstanding this, he works deliverance for her.

3. How impotent his attempt upon Jerusalem shall be; "He shall remain at Nob," from whence he may see mount Zion, and there he shall shake his hand against it, ver. 23; he shall threaten it, and that shall be all. It shall be safe, and shall set him at defiance; the daughter of Jerusalem, to be quits with him, shall shake her head at him, ch. xxxvii. 21.

4. How fatal it would prove in the issue to himself. When he shakes his hand

x. 24—27. These verses encourage the faithful in Israel with the assurance that the triumph of Assyria would be short. The last words, "because of the anointing," are difficult of explanation. The Hebrew is capable of several renderings, and this adds to the uncertainty of every interpretation we have seen. The figure may be that of a fat bullock which breaks its yoke.

x. 28—32. These verses describe the progress of the invading army of the Assyrians, and it has been observed that the places named are mentioned in the exact order in which they stood in the country. "Carriages," in verse 28, is the old word for baggage.

x. 33. For "high ones of stature" a simpler and better translation would be "those of lofty stature." We do not say "men of lofty stature," because the harmony of the metaphors may require trees to be understood. For the same reason, the word rendered "haughty" may be better translated "those who are elevated." Both in this verse and in the next the Assyrian hosts are intended, at Jerusalem, and is about to lay hands on it, then is God's time to appear against him, for Zion is the place of which God hath said, "This is my rest for ever;" therefore those who threaten it affront God himself. Then "the Lord shall lop the bough with terror," and "cut down the thickets of the forests," ver. 33, 34. 1st. The pride of the enemy shall be humbled; the boughs that are lifted up on high shall be lopped off, the high and stately trees shall be hewn down; that is, the haughty shall be humbled. Those that lift up themselves in competition with God, or opposition to him, shall be abased. 2nd. The power of the enemy shall be broken; "The thickets of the forest" he shall cut down. When the Assyrian soldiers were under their arms, and their spears erect, they looked like a forest, like Lebanon; but when in one night they all became as dead corpses, the pikes were laid on the ground, and Lebanon was of a sudden cut down by a mighty one, namely, the destroying angel, that in a little time slew so many thousands of them. And if this shall be the exit of that proud invader, let not God's people be afraid of him. "Who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die?"

CHAPTER XI.

It is a very good transition in prophecy, (whether it be so in rhetoric or no,) and a very common one, to pass from the prediction of the temporal deliverances of the church to that of the great salvation, which, in the fulness of time, should be wrought out by Jesus Christ, of which the others were types and figures, to which all the prophets bare witness; and so the ancient Jews understood them, for what else was it that raised so great an expectation of the Messiah at the time he came? Upon occasion of the prophecy of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib, here comes in a prophecy concerning Messiah the Prince, I. His rise out of the house of David, ver. 1. II. His qualifications for his great undertaking, ver. 2, 3. III. The justice and equity of his government, ver. 3—5. IV. The peaceableness of his kingdom, ver. 6—9. V. The accession of the Gentiles to it, ver. 10, and with them the remnant of the Jews, that should be united with them in the Messiah's kingdom, ver. 11—16. And of all this God would now shortly give them a type, and some dark representation, in the excellent government of Hezekiah, and the great peace which the nation should enjoy under him, after the ruin of Sennacherib's design, and the return of many of the ten tribes out of their dispersion to their brethren of the land of Judah, when they enjoyed that great tranquillity.

AND there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse,
And a Branch shall grow out of his roots:
2 And the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him,
The spirit of wisdom and understanding,
The spirit of counsel and might,
The spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD;
3 And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the LORD:
And he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes,
Neither reprove after the hearing of his ears:
4 But with righteousness shall he judge the poor,
And reprove with equity for the meek of the earth:
And he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth,
And with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.
5 And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins,
And faithfulness the girdle of his reins.
6 The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb,
And the leopard shall lie down with the kid;
And the calf and the young lion and the fatling together;
And a little child shall lead them.
7 And the cow and the bear shall feed;
Their young ones shall lie down together:
And the lion shall eat straw like the ox.
8 And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp,
And the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den.
9 They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain:
For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD,
As the waters cover the sea.

The prophet had before in this sermon spoken of a child that should be born, a son that should be given, on whose shoulders the government should be; intending this for the comfort of the people of God in times of trouble, as dying Jacob many ages before had intended the prospect of Shiloh for the comfort of his seed in their affliction in Egypt. He had said, ch. x. 27, that "the yoke should be destroyed because of the anointing;" now here he tells us on whom that anointing should rest. He foretells,

First. That the Messiah should in due time arise out of the house of David, as that branch of the Lord, which he had said, ch. iv. 2, should be excellent and glorious; the word is Netzer, which some think is referred to, Mat. ii. 23, where it is said to be spoken by the prophets of the Messiah that he "should be called a Nazarene." Observe here,

1. Whence this branch should arise; from Jesse. He should be the Son of David, with whom the covenant of royalty was made, and to whom it was promised with an oath, that "of the fruit of his loins, God would raise up Christ," Acts ii. 30. David is often called the son of Jesse, and Christ is called so, because he was to be not only the Son of David, but David himself, Hos. iii. 5.

2. The meanness of his appearance. 1st. He is called "a rod," and "a branch;" both the words here used signify a weak, small, tender product, a twig, and a sprig, so some render them; such as is easily broken off. The enemies of God's church were just before compared to strong and stately boughs, ch. x. 33, which will not without great labour be hewn down, but Christ to a tender branch, ch. liii. 2; yet he shall be victorious over them. 2nd. He is said to come out of Jesse rather than David, because Jesse lived and died in meanness and obscurity; his family was of small account, 1 Sam. xviii. 18, and it was in a way of contempt and reproach that David was sometimes called the son of Jesse, ch. xxii. 7. 3rd. He comes forth out of the stem or stump of Jesse. When the royal family, that had been as a cedar, was cut down, and only the stump of it left, almost levelled with the ground, and lost in the grass of the field, Dan. iv. 15, yet it shall sprout again, Job xiv. 7. Nay, it shall grow out of his roots, that are quite buried in the earth, and, like the roots of flowers in the winter, have no stem appearing above ground. The house of David was reduced and brought very low at the time of Christ's birth; witness the obscurity and poverty of Joseph and Mary. The Messiah was thus to begin his estate of humiliation, for submitting to which he should be highly exalted, and would thus give early notice that his kingdom was not of this world. The Chaldee paraphrase reads this, 'There shall come forth a king from the sons of Jesse, and the Messiah (or Christ) shall be anointed out of his sons' sons.'

Secondly. That he should be every way qualified for that great work to which he was designed; that this tender branch should be so watered with the dews of heaven as to become a strong rod for a sceptre to rule, ver. 2.

1. In general; "The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him." The Holy Spirit, in all his gifts and graces, shall not only come, but rest and abide upon him; he shall have the Spirit not by measure, but without measure, the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him, Col. i. 14, and ii. 9. He began his preaching with this, Lu. iv. 18, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me."

2. In particular; the spirit of government, by which he should be every way fitted for that judgment which the Father hath committed to him, and given him authority to execute, Jno. v. 22, 27. And not only so, but should be made the fountain and treasury of all grace to believers; that from his fulness they might all receive the Spirit of grace, as all the members of the body derive animal spirits from the head. 1st. He shall have "the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and knowledge;" he shall thoroughly understand the business he is to be employed in; "No man knows the Father but the Son," Mat. xi. 27; what he is to make known to the children of men concerning God, and his mind and will, he shall be himself acquainted with, and apprised of, Jno. i. 18. He shall know how to administer his spiritual kingdom in all the branches of it, so as effectually to answer the two great intentions of it, the glory of God and the welfare of the children of men. The terms of the covenant shall be settled by him, and ordinances instituted, in wisdom. Treasures of wisdom shall be hid in him; he shall be our counsellor, and shall be made of God to us wisdom. 2nd. The spirit of courage, or might, or fortitude. The undertaking was very great, abundance of difficulty must be broken through, and therefore it was necessary he should be so spirited as that he "might not fail, or be discouraged," ch. xlii. 1. He was famed for courage in his teaching the way of God in truth, and not caring for any man, Mat. xxii. 16. 3rd. The spirit of religion, or the fear of the Lord. Not only he shall himself have a reverent affection for his Father, as his servant, ch. xlii. 1, ("and he was heard in that he feared," Heb. v. 7,) but he shall have a zeal for religion, and shall design the advancement of that in his whole undertaking. Our faith in Christ was never designed to supersede and jostle out, but to increase and support, our fear of the Lord.

Thirdly. That he should be accurate and critical, and very exact in the administration of his government, and the exercise of the power committed to him, ver. 3. The Spirit wherewith he shall be clothed, "shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord;" of an acute smell, or scent, so the word is; for the apprehensions of the mind are often expressed by the sensations of the body. Note, 1. Those are most truly and valuably intelligent, that are so "in the fear of the Lord;" in the business of religion, for that is both the foundation and topstone of wisdom. 2. By this it will appear that we have the Spirit of God, if we have spiritual senses exercised, and are "of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord." Those have Divine illumination that know their duty, and know how to go about it. 3. Therefore Jesus Christ had the Spirit without measure, that he might perfectly understand his undertaking; and he did so, as appears not only in the admirable answers he gave to all that questioned with him, which spoke him to be "of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord;" but in the management of his whole undertaking. He hath settled the great affair of religion so unexceptionably well, (so as effectually to secure both God's honour and man's happiness,) that it must be owned he thoroughly understood it.

Fourthly. That he should be just and righteous in all the acts of his government, and there should appear in it as much equity as wisdom. He shall judge, (as he expresseth it himself, and as he himself would be judged of, Jno. vii. 24,)

1. Not according to outward appearance, ver. 3. "He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes," with respect of persons, Job xxxiv. 19; and according to outward shows and appearances, "nor reprove after the hearing of his ears," by common fame and report, and the representations of others, as men use to do; nor doth he judge of men by the fair words they speak, "calling him Lord, Lord," or their plausible actions before the eye of the world, which they do to be seen of men; but he will judge by the hidden man of the heart, and the inward principle men are governed by, which he is an infallible witness of. Christ will judge the secrets of men, Rom. ii. 16; will determine concerning them, not according to their own pretensions and appearances—that were to "judge after the sight of the eyes;" not according to the opinion others have of them—that were to judge after the hearing of the ears; but we are sure that "his judgment is according to truth."

2. But he will judge righteous judgment, ver. 5. "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins." He shall be righteous in the administration of his government, and his righteousness shall be his girdle; that is, it shall constantly compass him, and cleave to him, it shall be his ornament and honour; he shall gird himself for every action, shall gird on his sword for war in righteousness his righteousness shall be his strength, and shall make him expeditious in his undertakings, as a man with his loins girt. In conformity to Christ, his followers must have the girdle of truth, Eph. vi. 14; and it will be the stability of the times. Particularly,

1st. He shall in righteousness plead for the people that are poor and oppressed. He will be their protector; ver. 4, "With righteousness shall he judge the poor;" shall judge in favour and defence of those that have right on their side, though they are poor in the world, and because they are poor in spirit. It is the duty of princes to defend and deliver the poor, Ps. lxxxii. 3, 4; and the honour of Christ that he is the poor man's king, Ps. lxxii. 2, 4. 'He shall debate with evenness for the meek of the earth,' or, 'of the land.' Those that bear the injuries done them with meekness and patience are in a special manner entitled to the Divine care and protection; "I as a deaf man heard not, for thou wilt hear," Ps. xxxviii. 13, 14. Some read it, 'He shall reprove, or correct the meek of the earth with equity.' If his own people, the meek of the land, do amiss, he will visit their transgression with the rod.

2nd. He shall in righteousness plead against his enemies that are proud and oppressors; ver. 4, "But he shall smite the earth," the man of the earth that doth oppress: see Ps. x. 18. The men of the world that mind earthly things only, Ps. xvii. 14; these he shall smite "with the rod of his mouth," that is, the

and are set forth under the figure of trees and a wood. "Lebanon" is put for the forest of Lebanon.

xi. 1. Professor Alexander says, "Borrowing his imagery from the fall of the Assyrian forest just before predicted, the prophet represents a shoot as springing from the prostrate trunk of Jesse, or rather from his roots, and invested by the spirit of Jehovah with all the necessary attributes of a righteous judge and ruler." The Jewish Targum expressly applies this to the Messiah: "And a king shall proceed from the sons of Jesse, and the Messiah shall spring up from his sons' sons." This application is, in some form or other, recognised by many critics of very different opinions.

xi. 6. The Targum here adds, "In the days of the Messiah of Israel peace shall be multiplied in the earth."

xi. 10. Here also the Targum indicates the Messianic intention of the prophet: "There shall be a son of the sons of Jesse."

xi. 11. For "Cush" the Chaldee has "India," and for "Shinar," word of his mouth, speaking terror and ruin to them. His threatenings shall take hold of them, and be executed upon them; "with the breath of his lips," by the operation of his Spirit, according to the word, and working with and by it, he shall slay the wicked. He will do it easily, with a word's speaking, as he laid those flat who came to seize him by saying, "I am he," Jno. xviii. 6. Killing terrors shall arrest their consciences; killing judgments shall ruin them, their power, and all their interests; and in the other world everlasting tribulation will be recompensed to those that trouble his poor people. The apostle applies this to the destruction of the man of sin, whom he calls that wicked, 2 Thes. ii. 8, "whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth." And the Chaldee here reads it, 'He shall slay that wicked Romulus,' or Rome, as Mr. Hugh Broughton understands it.

Fifthly. That there should be great peace and tranquillity under his government. This is an explication of what was said, ch. ix. 6, that he should be the Prince of peace. Peace signifies two things:

1. Unity and concord. And that is intimated in these figurative promises, that even "the wolf shall dwell" peaceably "with the lamb." Men of the most fierce and furious dispositions, that used to bite and devour all about them, shall have their temper so strangely altered by the efficacy of the Gospel and grace of Christ, that they shall live in love even with the weakest, and such as formerly they would have made an easy prey of. So far shall the sheep be from hurting one another, as sometimes they have done, Eze. xxxiv. 20, 21, that even the wolves shall agree with them. Christ, who is our peace, came to slay all enmities, and to settle lasting friendships among his followers, particularly between Jews and Gentiles. When multitudes of both, being converted to the faith of Christ, united in one sheepfold, then the wolf and the lamb dwelt together; the wolf did not so much as threaten the lamb, nor was the lamb afraid of the wolf. "The leopard" shall not only not tear the kid, but "shall lie down with her;" even "their young ones shall lie down together," and shall be trained up in a blessed amity, in order to the perpetuating of it. "The lion" shall cease to be ravenous, and "shall eat straw like the ox;" as some think all the beasts of prey did before the fall. The asp and the cockatrice shall cease to be venomous, so that parents shall let their children play with them, and put their hands among them. A generation of vipers shall become a seed of saints; and the old complaint of homo homini lupus,—'man is a wolf to man,' shall be at an end. They that inhabit the holy mountain shall live as amicably as the creatures did that were with Noah in the ark; and it shall be a means of their preservation, for they shall not hurt or destroy one another as they have done. Now, 1st. This is fulfilled in the wonderful effect of the Gospel upon the minds of those that sincerely embrace it; it changes the nature, and makes those that trampled on the meek of the earth not only meek like them, but loving to them. When Paul, that had persecuted the saints, joined himself to them, then the wolf dwelt with the lamb. 2nd. Some are willing to hope it shall yet have a farther accomplishment in the latter days, when swords shall be beaten into ploughshares.

2. Safety and security. Christ the great Shepherd shall take such care of his flock, that those who would hurt them shall not; they shall not only not destroy one another, but no enemy from without shall be permitted to give them any molestation; the property of troubles, and of death itself, shall be so altered, that they shall not do any real hurt to, much less shall they be the destruction of, any that have their conversation in the holy mountain, 1 Pet. iii. 13. Who or what can harm us, if we be followers of him that is good? God's people shall be delivered not only from evil, but from the fear of it; even "the sucking child shall," without any terror, "play upon the hole of the asp." Blessed Paul doth so when he saith, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" and, "O death, where is thy sting?"

Lastly. Observe what shall be the effect, and what the cause, of this wonderful softening and sweetening of men's tempers, by the grace of God. 1. The effect of it shall be tractableness, and a willingness to receive instruction; "A little child shall lead them," who formerly scorned to be controlled by the strongest man. Calvin understands it of their willing submission to the ministers of Christ, who are to instruct with meekness, and not to use any coercive power, but to be as little children, Mat. xviii. 3: see 2 Cor. viii. 5. 2. The cause of it shall be the knowledge of God. The more there is of that, the more there is of a disposition to peace They shall thus live in love, "for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord," which shall extinguish men's heats and animosities. The better acquainted we are with the God of love, the more shall we be "changed into the same image," and the better affected shall we be to all those that bear his image. The earth shall be as full of his knowledge as the channels of the sea are with water; so broad and extensive shall this knowledge be, and so far shall it spread; and so deep and substantial shall this knowledge be, and so long shall it last. There is much more of the knowledge of God to be got by the Gospel of Christ than could be got by the law of Moses; and whereas then in Judah only was God known, now all shall know him, Heb. viii. 11. But that is knowledge falsely so called which sows discord among men; the right knowledge of God settles peace.

10 And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse,
Which shall stand for an ensign of the people;
To it shall the Gentiles seek:
And his rest shall be glorious.
11 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the Lord shall set his hand again the second time
To recover the remnant of his people,
Which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt,
And from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam,
And from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea.
12 And he shall set up an ensign for the nations,
And shall assemble the outcasts of Israel,
And gather together the dispersed of Judah
From the four corners of the earth.
13 The envy also of Ephraim shall depart,
And the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off:
Ephraim shall not envy Judah,
And Judah shall not vex Ephraim
14 But they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines toward the west;
They shall spoil them of the east together:
They shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab;
And the children of Ammon shall obey them.
15 And the LORD shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea;
And with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over [the river,
And shall smite it in the seven streams,
And make men go over dryshod. [people,
16 And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his
Which shall be left, from Assyria;
Like as it was to Israel
In the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt.

We have here a farther prophecy of the enlargement and advancement of the kingdom of the Messiah, under the type and figure of the flourishing condition of the kingdom of Judah, in the latter end of Hezekiah's reign, after the defeat of Sennacherib.

First. This prediction was in part accomplished when the great things God did for Hezekiah and his people proved as an ensign, inviting the neighbouring nations to them, to "inquire of the wonders done in the land," on which errand the king of Babylon's ambassadors came. To them the Gentiles sought, and Jerusalem, the rest or habitation of the Jews, was then glorious, ver. 10. Then many of the Israelites that belonged to the kingdom of the ten tribes, who, upon the destruction of that kingdom by the king of Assyria, were forced to flee for shelter into all the countries about, and to some that lay very remote, even to the islands of the sea, were encouraged to return to their own country, and put themselves under the protection and government of the king of Judah; the rather because it was an Assyrian army by which their country had been ruined, and that was now routed. This is said to be a recovery of them the second time, ver. 11, such an instance of the power and goodness of God, and such a reviving to them as their first deliverance out of Egypt was. Then the outcasts of Israel should be gathered in, and brought home, and those of Judah too, who, upon the approach of the Assyrian army, shifted for their own safety. Then the old feud between Ephraim and Judah shall be forgotten, and they shall join against the Philistines, and other their common enemies, ver. 13, 14. Note, Those who have been sharers with each other in afflictions and mercies, dangers and deliverances, in consideration thereof ought to unite for their joint and mutual safety and protection. And then it is likely to be well with the church, when Ephraim and Judah are one against the Philistines. Then, whatever difficulties there may be in the way of the return of the dispersed, the Lord shall find out some way or other to remove them, as when he brought Israel out of Egypt he dried up the Red sea, and Jordan, ver. 15, and led them to Canaan through the invincible embarrassments of a vast howling wilderness, ver. 16. The like will he do this second time, or that which shall be equivalent. When God's time is come for the deliverance of his people, mountains of opposition shall become plain before him. Let us not despair, therefore, when the interests of the church seem to be brought very low, God can soon turn gloomy days into glorious ones.

Secondly. It had a farther reference to the days of the Messiah, and the accession of the Gentiles to his kingdom; for to that the apostle applies ver. 10, of which the following verses are a continuation, Rom. xv. 12, "There shall be a root of Jesse; and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles, in him shall the Gentiles trust." That is a key to this prophecy, which speaks of Christ as the root of Jesse, that is, a branch out of his roots; ver. 1, a "root out of a dry ground," ch. liii. 2. He is the "root of David," Rev. v. 5; the "root and offspring of David," Rev. xxii. 16.

1. He shall "stand," or be set up, "for an ensign of the people." When he was crucified, he was "lifted up from the earth," that, as an ensign or beacon, he might draw the eyes and hearts of all men unto him, Jno. xii. 32. He is "set up as an ensign" in the preaching of the everlasting Gospel, in which the ministers, as standard-bearers, display the banner of his love, to allure us to him, Cant. i. 4; the banner of his truth, under which we may list ourselves, to engage in a holy war against sin and Satan. Christ is the ensign to whom the children of God that were scattered abroad are gathered together, Jno. xi. 52, and in whom they meet as the centre of their unity.

2. "To him shall the Gentiles seek." We read of Greeks that did so, Jno. xii. 21, "We would see Jesus;" and upon that occasion Christ spoke of his being lifted up, to draw all men to him. The apostle from the Septuagint, (or perhaps the Septuagint from the apostle, in the editions after Christ,) Rom. xv. 12, reads it, "In him shall the Gentiles trust;" they shall seek to him with a dependence on him.

3. "His rest shall be glorious." Some understand it of the death of Christ; the triumphs of the cross made even that glorious. Others of his ascension, when he sat down to rest at the right hand of God. Or, rather, it is meant of the gospel church, that mount Zion of which Christ hath said, "This is my rest," and in which he resides. This, though despised by the world, having upon it the beauty of holiness, is truly glorious; "a glorious high throne," Jer. xvii. 12.

4. Both Jews and Gentiles shall be gathered to him, ver. 11. A remnant of both, a little remnant in comparison, which shall be recovered as it were with great difficulty and hazard. As formerly God delivered his people, and gathered them out of all the countries whither they were scattered, Ps. cvi. 47, Jer. xvi. 15, 16, so he will a second time, in another way, by the powerful working of the Spirit of grace with the word. He shall "set his hand" to do it; that is, he shall exert his power, the arm of the Lord shall be revealed to do it. 1st. There shall be a remnant of the Jews gathered in, the "outcasts of Israel," and the "dispersed of Judah," ver. 12, who, at the time of the bringing of them in to Christ, were many of them Jews of the dispersion, the twelve tribes that were scattered abroad, Jas. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1. These shall flock to Christ, and probably more of those scattered Jews were brought into the church in proportion, than of those which remained in their own land. 2nd. Many of the nations, the Gentiles, shall be brought in by the lifting up of the ensign. Jacob foretold concerning Shiloh, that "to him should the gathering of the people be." Those that were strangers and foreigners shall be made nigh. The Jews were jealous of Christ's going to the dispersed among the Gentiles, and of his teaching the Gentiles, Jno. vii. 35.

5. There shall be a happy accommodation between Judah and Ephraim, and both shall be safe from their adversaries, and have dominion over them,

"Babylonia." The passage points to a general gathering of the Lord's people, an idea which is further developed in the next verse.

xi. 14. The rapid and varied conquests of Israel are here described. The translation is not quite literal; it should be, "And they shall fly upon the shoulder of the Philistines towards the sea; together shall they spoil the children of the east," &c. For "fly upon," Dr. Henderson has "pounce upon," which is probably the correct idea.

xi. 15. The word for "shall utterly destroy" rather means to doom or anathematise, of course with a view to ruin. "The tongue of the Egyptian sea" is the extremity of the Red Sea, near Suez. "The river" here is now generally admitted to be the Euphrates.

xii. 3. For "therefore" the Hebrew is simply "and."

xiii. 1. A "burden" here is a prophetic oracle, or vision. Some critics think the term is only applied to threatening predictions.

xiii. 2. "The gates" of Babylon were very celebrated. It is said there were a hundred of them, all made of brass.

ver. 13, 14. The coalescence between Judah and Israel at that time was a type and figure of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, who had been so long at variance. "The house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel," Jer. iii. 18, and become one nation, Eze. xxxvii. 22; so the Jews and Gentiles are made of "twain one new man," Eph. ii. 15; and being at peace one with another, those that are adversaries to them both, shall be cut off; for they shall "fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines," as an eagle strikes at her prey, shall spoil them on the west side of them, and then they shall extend their conquests eastward, over the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites; that is, the gospel of Christ shall be successful in all parts, and some of all nations shall become obedient to the faith.

6. Every thing that might hinder the progress and success of the Gospel shall be taken out of the way; as when God brought Israel out of Egypt, he dried up the Red sea and Jordan before them, ch. lxiii. 11, 12, and as afterwards when he brought up the Jews out of Babylon, he prepared them their way, ch. lxii. 10; so when Jews and Gentiles are to be brought together into the gospel church, all obstructions shall be removed, ver. 15, 16; difficulties that seemed insuperable shall be strangely got over; "the blind shall be led by a way that they knew not:" see ch. xlii. 15, 16, and xliii. 19, 20. Converts shall be brought in chariots and in litters, ch. lxvi. 20. Some think it is the farther accession of multitudes to the church that is pointed at in that obscure prophecy of the drying up of the river Euphrates, that the way of the kings of the east may be prepared, Rev. xvi. 12, which seems to refer to this here. Note, When God's time is come for the bringing of nations or particular persons home to himself, Divine grace will be victorious over all opposition. At the presence of the Lord the sea shall flee, and Jordan be driven back; and those who set their faces heavenward will find there are not such difficulties in the way as they thought there were, for there is a highway thither, ch. xxxv. 8.

CHAPTER XII.

The salvation promised in the foregoing chapter was compared to that of Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt, so that chapter ends; now as Moses and the children of Israel then sang a song of praise to the glory of God, Ex. xv. 1, so shall the people of God do in that day when the root of Jesse shall stand for an ensign of the people, and shall be the desire and joy of all nations. In that day, I. Every particular believer shall sing a song of praise for his own interest in that salvation, ver. 1—3; "Thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee." Thanksgiving work shall be closet work. II. Many in concert shall join in praising God for the common benefit arising from this salvation, ver. 4—6; "Ye shall say, Praise ye the Lord." Thanksgiving work shall be congregation work, and the praises of God shall be publicly sung in the congregations of the upright.

AND in that day thou shalt say,
O LORD, I will praise thee: [away,
Though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned
And thou comfortedst me.
2 Behold, God is my salvation;
I will trust, and not be afraid:
For the LORD JEHOVAH is my strength and my song;
He also is become my salvation. [salvation.
3 Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of

This is the former part of the hymn of praise which is prepared for the use of the church, of the Jewish church, when God would work great deliverances for them; and of the Christian church, when the kingdom of the Messiah should be set up in the world in despite of the opposition of the powers of darkness. "In that day thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee." The scattered church being united into one body, shall as one man, with one mind, and one mouth, thus praise God, who is one, and his name one. "In that day," when the Lord shall do these great things for thee, "thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee:" that is, 1. Thou shalt have cause to say so. The promise is sure, and the blessings contained in it are very rich; and when they are bestowed will furnish the church with abundant matter for rejoicing, and therefore with abundant matter for thanksgiving. The Old Testament prophecies of gospel times are often expressed by the joy and praise that shall then be; for the inestimable benefits we enjoy by Jesus Christ require the most elevated and enlarged thanksgivings. 2. Thou shalt have a heart to say so. All God's other gifts to his people shall be crowned with this. He will give them grace to ascribe all the glory of them to him, and to speak of them upon all occasions with thankfulness to his praise. "Thou shalt say," that is, thou oughtest to say so. "In that day," when many are brought home to Jesus Christ, and flock to him as doves to their windows, instead of envying the kind reception they find with Christ, as the Jews grudged the favour shewed to the Gentiles, thou shalt say, "O Lord, I will praise thee." Note, We ought to rejoice in, and give thanks for, the grace of God to others, as well as to ourselves.

First. Believers are here taught to give thanks to God for the turning away of his displeasure from them, and the return of his favour to them; ver. 1, "O Lord, I will praise thee, though thou wast angry with me." Note, Even God's frowns must not put us out of tune for praising him; though he be angry with us, though he slay us, yet we must put our trust in him, and give him thanks. God has often just cause to be angry with us, but we have never any reason to be angry with him, nor to speak otherwise than well of him. Even when he blames us, we must praise him; "Thou wast angry with us, but thine anger is turned away." Note, 1. God is sometimes angry with his own people, and the fruits of his anger do appear, and they ought to take notice of it, that they may humble themselves under his mighty hand. 2. Though God may for a time be angry with his people, yet his anger shall at length be turned away; it endures but for a moment, nor will he contend for ever. By Jesus Christ, the root of Jesse, God's anger against mankind was turned away, for he is our peace. 3. Those whom God is reconciled to he comforts; even the turning away of his anger is a comfort to them; yet that is not all, they that are at peace with God, may "rejoice in hope of the glory of God," Rom. v. 1, 2. Nay, God sometimes brings his people into a wilderness, that there he may speak comfortably to them, Hos. ii. 14. 4. The turning away of God's anger, and the return of his comforts to us, ought to be the matter of our joyful, thankful praises.

Secondly. They are taught to triumph in God, and their interest in him; ver. 2, "Behold," and wonder, "God is my salvation;" not only my Saviour, by whom I am saved; but "my salvation," in whom I am safe. I depend upon him as my salvation, for I have found him to be so. He shall have the glory of all the salvations that have been wrought for me, and from him only will I expect the salvations I farther need, and not from hills and mountains. And if God be my salvation, if he undertake my eternal salvation, I will trust in him to prepare me for it, and preserve me to it. I will trust him with all my temporal concerns, not doubting but he will make all to work for my good. I will be confident; that is, I will be always easy in my own mind. Note, Those that have God for their salvation may enjoy themselves with a holy security and serenity of mind. Let faith in God as our salvation be effectual, 1. To silence our fears. We must trust, and not be afraid; not be afraid that the God we trust in will fail us; no, there is no danger of that; not be afraid of any creature, though never so formidable and threatening. Note, Faith in God is a sovereign remedy against disquieting, tormenting fears. 2. To support our hopes. Is the Lord Jehovah our salvation? then he will be our strength and song. We have work to do, and temptations to resist, and we may depend upon him to enable us for both; to "strengthen us with all might by his Spirit in the inner man," for he is our strength; his grace is so, and that grace shall be sufficient for us. We have many troubles to undergo, and must expect griefs in a vale of tears; and we may depend upon him to comfort us in all our tribulations, for he is our song, he "giveth songs in the night." If we make God our strength, and put our confidence in him, he will be our strength; if we make him our song, and place our comfort in him, he will be our song. Many good Christians have God for their strength who have him not for their song; they walk in darkness, but light is sown for them; and they that have God for their strength ought to make him their song; that is, to give him the glory of it, (see Ps. lxviii. 35,) and to take to themselves the comfort of it, for he will become their salvation. Observe the title here given to God, Jah, Jehovah. Jah is the contraction of Jehovah, and both signify his eternity and unchangeableness, which are a great comfort to those that depend upon him as their strength and their song. Some make Jah to signify the Son of God made man; he is Jehovah, and in him we may glory as our strength, and song, and salvation.

Thirdly. They are taught to derive comfort to themselves from the love of God, and all the tokens of that love, ver. 3. Therefore, because the Lord Jehovah is your strength and song, and will be your salvation, you shall draw water with joy. Note, The assurances God hath given us of his love, and the experiences we have had of the benefit and comfort of his grace, should greatly encourage our faith in him, and our expectations from him; "Out of the wells of salvation" in God, who is the fountain of all good to his people, you shall draw water with joy. God's favour shall flow forth to you, and you shall have the comfort of it, and make use of the blessed fruits of it. Note, 1. God's promises revealed, ratified, and given out to us in his ordinances, are "wells of salvation." Wells of the Saviour, so some read it; for in them the Saviour and salvation are made known to us, and made over to us. 2. It is our duty, by faith, to draw water out of these wells, to take to ourselves the benefit and comfort that is treasured up for us in them, as those that acknowledge all our fresh springs to be there, and all our fresh streams to be thence, Ps. lxxxvii. 7. 3. Water is to be drawn out of the wells of salvation with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction. It is the will of God that we should rejoice before him, and rejoice in him, Deu. xxvi. 11, be joyful in his house of prayer, ch. lvi. 7, and keep his feasts with gladness, Acts ii. 46.

4 And in that day shall ye say,
Praise the LORD,
Call upon his name,
Declare his doings among the people,
Make mention that his name is exalted.
5 Sing unto the LORD; for he hath done excellent things:
This is known in all the earth.
6 Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion:
For great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee.

This is the second part of this evangelical song, and to the same purpose with the former. There believers stir up themselves to praise God, here they invite and encourage one another to do it, and are contriving to spread his praise, and draw in others to join with them in it. Observe,

First. Who are here called upon to praise God. The inhabitants of Zion and Jerusalem, whom God had in a peculiar manner protected from Sennacherib's violence, ver. 6. Those that have received distinguishing favours from God ought to be most forward and zealous in praising of him. The gospel church is Zion, Christ is Zion's king; those that have a place and name in that should lay out themselves to diffuse the knowledge of Christ, and to bring many to him. "Thou inhabitress of Zion;" the word is feminine. Let the weaker sex be strong in the Lord, and out of their mouth praise shall be perfected.

Secondly. How they must praise the Lord. 1. By prayer, "Call upon his name." As giving thanks for former mercy is a decent way of begging farther mercy, so begging farther mercy is graciously accepted as a thankful acknowledgment of the mercies we have received. In calling upon God's name, we give unto him some of the glory that is due to his name as our powerful and bountiful benefactor. 2. By preaching and writing we must not only speak to God, but speak to others concerning him; not only "call upon his name," but (as the margin reads it) 'proclaim his name;' let others know something more from us than they did before concerning God, and those things whereby he has made himself known. "Declare his doings," his 'counsels,' so some read it. The work of redemption is according to the counsel of his will, and in that and other wonderful works that he hath done, we must take notice of his "thoughts which are to usward," Ps. xl. 5. Declare these "among the people," among the heathen, that they may be brought into communion with Israel, and the God of Israel. When the apostles preached the Gospel to "all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," then this scripture was fulfilled, that his doings should be declared among the people, and that what he hath done should be known in all the earth. 3. By a holy exultation and transport of joy. "Cry out and shout," welcome the Gospel to yourselves, and publish it to others, with huzzas and loud acclamations, as those that "shout for victory," Ex. xxxii. 18, or for the coronation of a king. Num. xxiii. 21.

Thirdly. For what they must praise the Lord. 1. Because he hath glorified himself. Remember it yourselves, and make mention of it to others, that his name is exalted, is become more illustrious and more conspicuous, and every good man rejoiceth in that. 2. Because he hath magnified his people; he "hath done excellent things" for them, which makes them look great and considerable. 3. Because he is, and will be, great among them. "Great is the Holy One," for he is glorious in holiness; therefore great because holy: true goodness is true greatness. Great as the Holy One of Israel; and in the midst of them; praised by them, Ps. lxxvi. 1; manifesting himself among them, and appearing gloriously in their behalf. It is the honour and happiness of Israel that the God that is in covenant with them, and in the midst of them, is infinitely great.

xiii. 3. "Sanctified" should rather be "consecrated," meaning "set apart," or dedicated to some special work. In this case the Medes and Persians are intended. For "them that rejoice in my highness," most modern critics have "my proud exulters," or some phrase of similar import. Those proud warriors were God's agents, although they knew it not.

xiii. 5. "Weapons of his indignation:" better, "instruments of his wrath," with Barnes, Delitzsch, &c. Umbreit thinks the world is meant by "the whole land," and so the Greek version has it; but we prefer to understand it of Babylonia, whose inhabitants are addressed in the next verses.

xiii. 10. All this must be bold metaphor, to indicate the greatness of the coming woe. The word for "constellations," which is here plural, is used for the constellation of Orion in the singular.

xiii. 12. This verse is intended to indicate that the destruction of life would be so great as to leave but few men alive.

CHAPTER XIII.

Hitherto the prophecies of this book were only concerning Judah and Israel, and Jerusalem especially; but now the prophet begins to look abroad, and to read the doom of divers of the neighbouring states and kingdoms; for he that is King of saints is also King of nations, and rules in the affairs of the children of men as well as in those of his own children. But the nations to whom these prophecies do relate, were all such as the people of God were some way or other conversant and concerned with; such as had been kind or unkind to Israel, and accordingly God would deal with them, either in favour or in wrath; for the Lord's portion is his people, and to them he hath an eye in all the dispensations of his providence concerning those about them, Deu. xxxii. 8, 9. And the threatenings we find here against Babylon, Moab, Damascus, Egypt, Tyre, &c., were intended for comfort to those in Israel that feared God, but were terrified and oppressed by those potent neighbours, and for startling to those among them that were wicked. If God would thus severely reckon with those for their sins that knew him not, and made no profession of his name, how severe would he be with those that were called by his name, and yet live in rebellion against him? And perhaps the directing of particular prophecies to the neighbour nations might invite some of those nations to the reading of the Jews' Bible, and so they might be brought to their religion. This chapter, and that which follows, contains what God had to say to Babylon and Babylon's king, who were at present little known to Israel, but would in process of time become a greater enemy to them than any other had been, for which God would at last reckon with them. In this chapter we have, I. A general rendezvous of the forces that were to be employed against Babylon, ver. 1—5. II. The dreadful bloody work that those forces should make in Babylon, ver. 6—18. III. The utter ruin and desolation of Babylon which this should end in, ver. 19—22.

THE burden of Babylon, which Isaiah the son of Amoz did see.

2 Lift ye up a banner upon the high mountain,
Exalt the voice unto them, shake the hand,
That they may go into the gates of the nobles.
3 I have commanded my sanctified ones,
I have also called my mighty ones for mine anger,
Even them that rejoice in my highness,
4 The noise of a multitude in the mountains, like as of a great people;
A tumultuous noise of the kingdoms of nations gathered together:
The LORD of hosts mustereth the host of the battle.
5 They come from a far country,
From the end of heaven,
Even the LORD, and the weapons of his indignation,
To destroy the whole land.

The general title of this book was, "The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz," ch. i. 1. This here is that which Isaiah did see, which was represented to his mind as clearly and fully as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes. But the particular inscription of this sermon is, "The burden of Babylon." 1. It is a "burden," a lesson they were to learn. So some understand it; but they would be loath to learn, and it would be as a burthen to their memories; or, a load which should lie heavy upon them, and under which they should sink. Those that will not make the word of God their rest, ch. xxviii. 12, Jer. vi. 16, it shall be made a burthen to them. 2. It is the burthen of Babylon, or Babel, which at this time was a dependent upon the Assyrian monarchy, (the metropolis of which was Nineveh,) but soon after revolted from it, and became a monarchy of itself, and a very potent one, in Nebuchadnezzar. This prophet afterwards foretold the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, ch. xxxix. 6. Here he foretells the reprisal God would make upon Babylon for the wrongs done to his people.

In these verses summons are given to those powerful and warlike nations, whom God would make use of as the instruments of his wrath for the destruction of Babylon. He afterwards names them, ver. 17, the Medes, who, in conjunction with the Persians under the command of Darius and Cyrus, were the ruin of the Babylonian monarchy.

First. The place doomed to destruction is Babylon. It is here called "the gates of the nobles," ver. 2, because of the abundance of noblemen's houses that were in it; stately ones and richly furnished, which would invite the enemy to come, in hopes of a rich booty. The gates of nobles were strong and well-guarded, and yet they would be no fence against those who come with commission to execute God's judgments. Before his power and wrath palaces are no more than cottages. Nor is it only "the gates of the nobles," but "the whole land" that is doomed to destruction, ver. 5; for, though the nobles were the leaders in persecuting and oppressing God's people, yet "the whole land" concurred with them in it.

Secondly. The persons brought together to lay Babylon waste, are here called, 1. God's "sanctified ones," ver. 3, designed for this service, and set apart to it by the purpose and providence of God; disengaged from other projects, that they might wholly apply themselves to this; such as were qualified for that to which they were called; for what work God employs men in he doth in some measure fit them for. It intimates likewise, that in God's intention, though not in theirs, it was a holy war; they designed only the enlargement of their own empire, but God designed the release of his people, and a type of the destruction of the New Testament Babylon. Cyrus, the person principally concerned, was justly called a sanctified one, for he was God's anointed, ch. xlv. 1, and a figure of him that was to come. It is pity but all soldiers, especially those that fight the Lord's battles, should be, in the strictest sense, sanctified ones; and a wonder they dare be profane ones, who carry their lives in their hands. 2. They are called God's "mighty ones," because they had their might from God, and were now to use it for him. It is said of Cyrus, that in this expedition God "held his right hand," ch. xlv. 1. God's sanctified ones are his mighty ones; whom God calls he qualifies, and whom he makes holy he makes strong in spirit. 3. They are said to rejoice in his highness; that is, to serve his glory, and the purposes of it, with great alacrity. Though Cyrus did not know God, nor actually design his honour in what he did, yet God used him as his servant, (ch. xlv. 4, "I have surnamed thee" as my servant, "though thou hast not known me,") and he rejoiced in those successes by which God exalted his own name. 4. They are very numerous. "A multitude," "a great people," "kingdoms of nations," ver. 4, not rude and barbarous, but modelled and regular troops, such as used to be furnished out by well-ordered kingdoms. The great God hath hosts at his command. 5. They are far-fetched; they come "from the end of heaven." The vast country of Assyria lay between Babylon and Persia. God can make those a scourge and ruin to his enemies that lie most remote from them, and therefore are least dreaded.

Thirdly. The summons given them is effectual, their obedience ready, and they make a very formidable appearance. A banner is lifted up upon the high mountain, ver. 2. God's standard is set up, a flag of defiance hung out against Babylon. It is erected on high, where all may see it; whoever will may come and list themselves under it, and they shall be taken immediately into God's pay. They that beat for volunteers must "exalt the voice" in making proclamation to encourage soldiers to come in; they must "shake the hand" to beckon those at a distance, and to animate those that have listed themselves. And they shall not do this in vain. God has commanded and called those whom he designs to make use of, ver. 3; and power goes along with his calls and commands, which cannot be resisted. He that makes men able to serve him can, when he pleaseth, make them willing too. It is the Lord of hosts that "mustereth the host of the battle," ver. 4. He raiseth them, brings them together, puts them in order, reviews them, has an exact account of them in his muster-roll, sees that they be all in their respective posts, and gives them their necessary orders. Note, All the hosts of war are under the command of the Lord of hosts. And that which makes them truly formidable is, that when they come against Babylon the Lord comes, and brings them with him as the "weapons of his indignation," ver. 5. Note, Great princes and armies are but tools in God's hand, weapons that he is pleased to make use of in doing his work, and it is his wrath that arms them and gives them success.

6 Howl ye; for the day of the LORD is at hand;
It shall come as a destruction from the Almighty
7 Therefore shall all hands be faint,
And every man's heart shall melt:
8 And they shall be afraid:
Pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them;
They shall be in pain as a woman that travaileth:
They shall be amazed one at another;
Their faces shall be as flames
9 Behold, the day of the LORD cometh,
Cruel both with wrath and fierce anger,
To lay the land desolate:
And he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it.
10 For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof
Shall not give their light:
The sun shall be darkened in his going forth,
And the moon shall not cause her light to shine.
11 And I will punish the world for their evil,
And the wicked for their iniquity;
And I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease,
And will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible.
12 I will make a man more precious than fine gold,
Even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir.
13 Therefore I will shake the heavens,
And the earth shall remove out of her place,
In the wrath of the LORD of hosts,
And in the day of his fierce anger.
14 And it shall be as the chased roe,
And as a sheep that no man taketh up:
They shall every man turn to his own people,
And flee every one into his own land.
15 Every one that is found shall be thrust through;
And every one that is joined unto them shall fall by the sword.
16 Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes;
Their houses shall be spoiled, and their wives ravished
17 Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them,
Which shall not regard silver;
And as for gold, they shall not delight in it.
18 Their bows also shall dash the young men to pieces;
And they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb,
Their eye shall not spare children.

We have here a very elegant and lively description of the terrible confusion and desolation which should be made in Babylon by the descent which the Medes and Persians should make upon it. They that were now secure and easy are bid to howl, and make sad lamentation; for,

First. God is about to appear in wrath against them; and it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. "The day of the Lord is at hand," ver. 6; a little day of judgment, when God will act as a just avenger of his own and his people's injured cause. And there are those who will have reason to tremble when that day is at hand. "The day of the Lord cometh," ver. 9. Men have their day now, and they think to carry the day; but God laughs at them, for he sees that "his day is coming," Ps. xxxvii. 13. Fury is not with God, and yet his day of reckoning with the Babylonians is said to be cruel with wrath and fierce xiii. 13. Like verse 10, this verse is metaphorical; and "the heavens" and "the earth" must be understood of the Babylonian Empire.

xiii. 14. On this verse it has been observed that "Babylon was the market for the world in Central Asia, and the rendezvous for the most diverse nations." (See Jer. l. 37.)

xiii. 15, 16. The horrors of war involve the innocent as well as the guilty, and the fury of conquerors is unbridled. This is as true now as it was in ancient times, though not to the same extent.

xiii. 17. The Medes were a scattered people in Isaiah's day; but they became a powerful kingdom, and conquered Babylon, the utter overthrow of which is described in the following verses.

xiii. 21, 22. There is some obscurity as to some of the animals here mentioned. The "owls" of our translators may be ostriches, and the so-called "satyrs" are probably wild goats. "The wild beasts of the islands" is an error for jackals; and "dragons" are reptiles, as serpents and lizards, though some think wild dogs are meant.

anger. God will deal in severity with them for the severities they exercised upon God's people. "With the froward," with the cruel, he "will shew himself froward," will shew himself cruel, and give the bloodthirsty blood to drink.

Secondly. Their hearts shall fail them, and they shall have neither courage nor comfort left them; shall not be able either to resist the judgment coming or to bear up under it, either to oppose the enemy or support themselves, ver. 7, 8. They that in the day of their peace were proud, and haughty, and terrible, ver. 11, when trouble comes are quite dispirited, and are at their wit's end. "All hands shall be faint," and unable to hold a weapon, "and every man's heart shall melt," so that they shall be ready to die for fear. The pangs of their fear shall be like those of a woman in hard labour, and "they shall be amazed one at another;" in frightening themselves they shall frighten one another; they shall wonder to see those tremble that used to be bold and daring. Or, they shall be amazed, looking one at another, as men at a loss, Gen. xlii. 1. "Their faces shall be as flames," pale as flames through fear, so some; or red as flames sometimes are, blushing at their own cowardice. Or, their faces shall be as faces scorched with the flame, or as theirs that labour in the fire, their visage blacker than a coal, or like a bottle in the smoke, Ps. cxix. 83.

Thirdly. All comfort and hope shall fail them; ver. 10, "The stars of heaven shall not give their light," but shall be clouded and overcast; "the sun shall be darkened in his going forth," rising bright, but lost again; a certain sign of foul weather. They shall be as men in distress at sea, when neither sun nor stars appear, Acts xxvii. 20. It shall be as dreadful a time with them as it would be with the earth if all the heavenly luminaries were turned into darkness; a resemblance of the day of judgment, when "the sun shall be turned into darkness." The heavens frowning thus is an indication of the displeasure of the God of heaven. When things look dark on earth, yet it is well enough if all be clear upwards; but if we have no comfort thence wherewith shall we be comforted?

Fourthly. God will visit them for their iniquity; and all this is intended for the punishment of sin, and particularly the sin of pride, ver. 11. This puts wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery, 1. That sin must now have its punishment. Though Babylon be a little world, yet, being a wicked world, it shall not go unpunished. Sin brings desolation on the world of the ungodly; and when the kingdoms of the earth are quarrelling with one another it is the fruit of God's controversy with them all. 2. That pride must now have its fall. The "haughtiness of the terrible" must now be laid low, particularly Nebuchadnezzar and his son Belshazzar, who had in their pride trampled upon, and made themselves very terrible to, the people of God. A man's pride will bring him low.

Fifthly. There shall be so great a slaughter as will produce a scarcity of men; ver. 12, "I will make a man more precious than fine gold." You could not have a man to be employed in any of the affairs of state, not a man to be listed into the army, not a man to match a daughter to for the building up of a family, if you would give any money for one. The troops of the neighbouring nations would not be hired into the service of the king of Babylon, because they saw every thing go against him. Populous countries are soon depopulated by war; and God can soon make a kingdom that has been courted and admired, to be dreaded and shunned by all, as a house that is falling, or a ship that is sinking.

Sixthly. There shall be a universal confusion and consternation. Such a confusion of their affairs, that it shall be like the shaking of the heavens with dreadful thunders, and the removing of the earth by no less dreadful earthquakes. All shall go to wreck and ruin "in the day of the wrath of the Lord of hosts," ver. 13. And such a consternation shall seize their spirits, that Babylon, which used to be like a roaring lion and a ranging bear to all about her, shall become as a chased roe, and "as a sheep that no man taketh up," ver. 14. The army they shall bring into the field, consisting of troops of divers nations, (as great armies used to do,) shall be so dispirited by their own fears, and so dispersed by their enemy's sword, that they shall "turn every man to his own people," each man shall shift for his own safety. The men of might shall not find their hands, Ps. lxxvi. 5, but take to their heels.

Seventhly. There shall be a general scene of blood and horror, as useth to be where the sword devours. No wonder that every one makes the best of his way, since the conqueror gives no quarter, but puts all to the sword, and not those only that are found in arms, as is usual with us even in the most cruel slaughters; ver. 15, "Every one that is found" alive "shall be run through;" as soon as ever it appears that he is a Babylonian. Nay, because the sword devours one as well as another, "every one that is joined unto them shall fall by the sword." Those of other nations that come in to their assistance shall be cut off with them. It is dangerous being in bad company, and helping those whom God is about to destroy. Those particularly that join themselves to Babylon must expect to share in her plagues, Rev. xviii. 4. And since the most sacred laws of nature and humanity itself are silenced by the fury of war, (though they cannot be cancelled,) the conquerors shall, in the most barbarous, brutish manner, dash the children to pieces, and ravish the wives, ver. 16. Jusque datum sceleri,—'Wickedness shall have free course.' They had thus dealt with God's people, Lam. v. 11, and now they shall be paid in their own coin, Rev. xiii. 10. It was particularly foretold, Ps. cxxxvii. 9, that the little ones of Babylon should be dashed against the stones. How cruel soever, and unjust they were that did it, God was righteous who suffered it to be done, and to be done before their eyes, to their great terror and vexation. It was just also that the houses which they had filled with the spoil of Israel should be spoiled and plundered. What is got by rapine is often lost so.

Eighthly. The enemy that God would send against them should be inexorable, probably being by some provocation or other more than ordinarily exasperated against them; or, however God himself will "stir up the Medes" to use this severity with the Babylonians, he will not only serve his own purposes by their dispositions and designs, but will put it into their hearts to make this attempt upon Babylon, and suffer them to prosecute it with all this fury. God is not the author of sin, but he would not permit it if he did not know how to bring glory to himself out of it. These Medes, in conjunction with the Persians, shall make thorough work of it; for,

1. They shall take no bribes, ver. 17. All that men have they would give for their lives; but the Medes shall not regard silver; it is blood they thirst for, not gold; no man's riches shall, with them, be the ransom of his life.

2. They shall shew no pity, ver. 18; not to the young men that are in the prime of their time, they shall shoot them through with their bows, and then dash them to pieces; not to the age of innocency, "they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb," nor spare little children, whose cries and frights one would think should make even marble eyes to weep, and hearts of adamant to relent. Pause a little here and wonder, 1st. That men should be thus cruel and inhuman, and so utterly divested of all compassion; and in it see how corrupt and degenerate the nature of man is become. 2nd. That the God of infinite mercy should suffer it, nay, and should make it to be the execution of his justice; which shews that, though he is gracious, yet he is the "God to whom vengeance belongs." 3rd. That little infants which have never been guilty of any actual sin should be thus abused, which shews that there is an original guilt by which life is forfeited as soon as it is had.

19 And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms,
The beauty of the Chaldees' excellency,
Shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.
20 It shall never be inhabited,
Neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation:
Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there;
Neither shall the shepherds make their fold there.
21 But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there;
And their houses shall be full of doleful creatures
And owls shall dwell there,
And satyrs shall dance there.
22 And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses,
And dragons in their pleasant palaces:
And her time is near to come,
And her days shall not be prolonged.

The great havoc and destruction which it was foretold should be made by the Medes and Persians in Babylon here ends in the final destruction of it.

First. It is allowed that Babylon was a noble city; it was "the glory of kingdoms," and the "beauty of the Chaldees' excellency;" it was that "head of gold," Dan. ii. 37, 38; it was called the "lady of kingdoms," ch. xlvii. 5; the "praise of the whole earth," Jer. li. 41; like 'a pleasant roe,' (so the word signifies,) but it shall be as a "chased roe," ver. 14. The Chaldeans gloried in the beauty and wealth of this their metropolis.

Secondly. It is foretold that it should be wholly destroyed, like Sodom and Gomorrah; not so miraculously nor so suddenly, but as effectually, though gradually; and the destruction should come upon them as that upon Sodom, when they were secure, eating and drinking, Lu. xvii. 28. Babylon was taken when Belshazzar was in his revels; and though Cyrus and Darius did not demolish it, yet by degrees it wasted away, and in process of time it went all to ruin. It is foretold here, ver. 20, that "it shall never be inhabited." In Adrian's time nothing remained but the wall. And whereas it is prophesied concerning Nineveh, that great city, that when it should be deserted and left desolate, yet flocks should "lie down in the midst of it," it is here said concerning Babylon that the Arabians, that were shepherds, should not "make their fold there;" the country about should be so barren that there would be no grazing, no not for sheep there; nay, it shall be the receptacle of wild beasts that affect solitude; the houses of Babylon, where the sons and daughters of pleasure used to rendezvous, shall be "full of doleful creatures," owls, and satyrs, that are themselves frightened thither as to a place proper for them, and by whom all others are frightened thence. Historians say this was fulfilled to the letter. Benjamin Bar-Jona in his Itinerary, speaking of Babel, has these words: 'This is that Babel which was of old thirty miles in breadth; it is now laid waste. There are yet to be seen the ruins of a palace of Nebuchadnezzar, but the sons of men dare not enter, for fear of serpents and scorpions which possess the place.' Let none be proud of their pompous palaces, for they know not but they may become worse than cottages; nor let any think that their houses shall endure for ever, Ps. xlix. 11, when perhaps nothing may remain but the ruins and reproaches of them.

Thirdly. It is intimated that this destruction should come shortly; ver. 22, "Her time is near to come." This prophecy of the destruction of Babylon was intended for the support and comfort of the people of God when they were captives there, and grievously oppressed; and the accomplishment of the prophecy was near two hundred years after the time when it was delivered; yet it followed soon after the time for which it was calculated. When the people of Israel were groaning under the heavy yoke of Babylonish tyranny, sitting down in tears by the rivers of Babylon, and upbraided with the songs of Zion, when their insolent oppressors were most haughty and arrogant, ver. 11, then let them know for their comfort that Babylon's time, her day to fall, was "near to come, and the days" of her prosperity "shall not be prolonged" as they have been; when God begins with her he will make an end. Thus it is said of the destruction of the New Testament Babylon, whereof the former was a type, "in one hour is her judgment come."

CHAPTER XIV.

In this chapter, I. More weight is added to the burthen of Babylon, enough to sink it like a millstone: 1. It is Israel's cause that is to be pleaded in this quarrel with Babylon, ver. 1—3; 2. The king of Babylon, for the time being, shall be remarkably brought down and triumphed over, ver. 4—20; 3. The whole race of the Babylonians should be cut off and extirpated, ver. 21—23. II. A confirmation of the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon, which was a thing at a distance, is here given in the prophecy of the destruction of the Assyrian army that invaded the land, which happened not long after, ver. 24—27. III. The success of Hezekiah against the Philistines is here foretold, and the advantages which his people would gain thereby, ver. 28—32.

FOR the LORD will have mercy on Jacob,
And will yet choose Israel,
And set them in their own land:
And the strangers shall be joined with them,
And they shall cleave to the house of Jacob [place:
2 And the people shall take them, and bring them to their
And the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of
For servants and handmaids: [the LORD
And they shall take them captives, whose captives they
And they shall rule over their oppressors. [were;
3 And it shall come to pass in the day that the LORD shall give thee rest
From thy sorrow, and from thy fear.

Other explanations have been suggested, but we only mention those which we think most probable.

xiv. 1. For "strangers" the Hebrew has "stranger," probably a sojourner.

xiv. 2. For "people" the Hebrew has "peoples," but it may mean the Jews only.

xiv. 4. For "golden city" the margin reads "exactress of gold," after Kimchi. The sense of the original word is uncertain.

xiv. 8. "Laid down" represents a verb which also means to sleep, to die, and even to be buried; here it is "prostrate."

xiv. 9. "Hell," or the under-world, and its inhabitants, are poetically represented as aroused by the coming of the Babylonian ruler. "The dead" here are departed spirits.

xiv. 12. The original for "Lucifer" here means a bright star, the morning star; to which, in some sense, the king of Babylon might be compared.

And from the hard bondage
Wherein thou wast made to serve,

This comes in here as the reason why Babylon must be overthrown and ruined; because God has mercy in store for his people; and therefore, 1. The injuries done to them must be reckoned for and revenged upon their persecutors. Mercy to Jacob will be wrath and ruin to Jacob's impenitent, implacable adversaries, such as Babylon was. 2. The yoke of oppression which Babylon had long laid on their necks must be broken off, and they must be set at liberty; and in order to this the destruction of Babylon is as necessary as the destruction of Egypt and Pharaoh were to their deliverance out of that house of bondage. The same prediction is a promise to God's people and threatening to their enemies, as the same providence hath a bright side towards Israel and a black and dark side towards the Egyptians. Observe,

First. The ground of these favours to Jacob and Israel; the kindness God had for them, and the choice he had made of them; ver. 1, "the Lord will have mercy on Jacob," the seed of Jacob now captives in Babylon. He will make it to appear that he hath compassion on them, and has mercy in store for them, and that he will not contend for ever with them; and he will yet choose them, will yet again return to them, though he had seemed for a time to refuse and reject them; will shew that they are his chosen people, and that the election stands sure. However it may seem to us, God's mercy is not gone, nor doth his promise fail, Ps. lxxvii. 8.

Secondly. The particular favours he designed them.

1. He would bring them back to their native soil and air again. The Lord will "set them in their own land," out of which they were driven. A settlement in the holy land, the land of promise, is a fruit of God's mercy, distinguishing mercy.

2. Many should be proselyted to their holy religion, and should return with them, induced to do so by the manifest tokens of God's favourable presence with them, the operation of God's grace in them, and his providence for them. "Strangers shall be joined with them," saying, "We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23. It adds much to the honour and strength of Israel when strangers are joined with them, and there are added to the church many from without, Acts ii. 47. Let not the church's children be shy of strangers, but receive those whom God receives, and own those who cleave to the house of Jacob.

3. These proselytes should not only be a credit to their cause, but very helpful and serviceable to them in their return home. The people among whom they live "shall take them," take care of them, take pity on them, and shall "bring them to their place," as friends loath to part with such good company; as servants willing to do them all the good offices they could. God's people, wherever their lot is cast, should endeavour thus, by all the instances of an exemplary and winning conversation, to gain an interest in the affections of those about them, and recommend religion to their good opinion. This was fulfilled in the return of the captives from Babylon, when all that were about them pursuant to Cyrus's proclamation contributed to their remove, Ezr. i. 4, 6; not as the Egyptians, because they were sick of them, but because they loved them.

4. They should have the benefit of their service when they were returned home, for many would of choice go with them in the meanest post rather than not go with them; they shall "possess them in the land of the Lord, for servants and handmaids;" and as the laws of that land saved it from being the purgatory of servants, providing that they should not be oppressed, so the advantages of that land made it the paradise of those servants that had been strangers to the covenants of promise, for there was "one law to the stranger, and to them that were born in the land." They whose lot is cast in the land of the Lord, a land of light, should take care that their servants and handmaids may share in the benefit of it; who will then find it better to be possessed in the Lord's land than possessors in any other.

5. They should triumph over their enemies; and they that would not be reconciled to them should be reduced and humbled by them. "They shall take them captives whose captives they were," and "shall rule over their oppressors" righteously but not revengefully. The Jews perhaps bought Babylonian prisoners out of the hands of the Medes and Persians, and made slaves of them; or, this might have its accomplishment in their victories over their enemies in the times of the Maccabees. It is applicable to the success of the Gospel when those were brought into obedience to it that had made the greatest opposition to it, as Paul; and to the interest believers have in Christ's victories over our spiritual enemies, when he "led captivity captive," the power they gain over their own corruptions, and the dominion the upright shall have in the morning, Ps. xlix. 14.

6. They should see a happy period of all their grievances; ver. 3, "The Lord shall give thee rest from thy sorrow, and from thy fear, and from the hard bondage." God himself undertakes to work a blessed change, 1st. In their state. They shall have rest from their bondage; the days of their affliction, though many, shall have an end; and the rod of the wicked, though it lie long, shall not always lie on their lot. 2nd. In their spirit. They shall have rest from their sorrow and fear, sense of their present burthens, and dread of worse. Sometimes fear puts the soul into a toss as much as sorrow doth, and those must needs feel themselves very easy to whom God hath given rest from both. They that are freed from the bondage of sin have a foundation laid for true rest from sorrow and fear.

4 That thou shalt take up this proverb against the king of Babylon, and say,
How hath the oppressor ceased!
The golden city ceased!
5 The LORD hath broken the staff of the wicked,
And the sceptre of the rulers.
6 He who smote the people in wrath
With a continual stroke,
He that ruled the nations in anger,
Is persecuted, and none hindereth.
7 The whole earth is at rest, and is quiet:
They break forth into singing.
8 Yea, the fir trees rejoice at thee,
And the cedars of Lebanon, saying,
Since thou art laid down,
No feller is come up against us.
9 Hell from beneath is moved for thee
To meet thee at thy coming:
It stirreth up the dead for thee,
Even all the chief ones of the earth;
It hath raised up from their thrones
All the kings of the nations.
10 All they shall speak and say unto thee,
Art thou also become weak as we?
Art thou become like unto us?
11 Thy pomp is brought down to the grave,
And the noise of thy viols:
The worm is spread under thee, and the worms cover thee.
12 How art thou fallen from heaven,
O Lucifer, son of the morning!
How art thou cut down to the ground,
Which didst weaken the nations!
13 For thou hast said in thine heart,
I will ascend into heaven,
I will exalt my throne above the stars of God:
I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north:
14 I will ascend above the heights of the clouds;
I will be like the most High.
15 Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell,
To the sides of the pit.
16 They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying,
Is this the man that made the earth to tremble,
That did shake kingdoms;
17 That made the world as a wilderness,
And destroyed the cities thereof;
That opened not the house of his prisoners?
18 All the kings of the nations, even all of them,
Lie in glory, every one in his own house.
19 But thou art cast out of thy grave
Like an abominable branch,
And as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword,
That go down to the stones of the pit;
As a carcase trodden under feet.
20 Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial,
Because thou hast destroyed thy land,
And slain thy people:
The seed of evildoers shall never be renowned.
21 Prepare slaughter for his children
For the iniquity of their fathers;
That they do not rise, nor possess the land,
Nor fill the face of the world with cities.
22 For I will rise up against them,
Saith the LORD of hosts,

BITTERN.—ver. 23.

xiv. 13. What are "the mount of the congregation" and "the sides of the north?" In view of Psa. xlviii. 2, they have been explained of the holy places at Jerusalem. Modern authorities, however, generally think that the idea is pagan in its application, as becomes the supposed speaker, and that the passage means, "I will sit on the very mountain where the gods assemble in the north."

xiv. 18. "House" here means a tomb, in which sense the word often occurs.

xiv. 23. Barnes puts "porcupine" for "bittern;" others have "hedgehogs," and Kimchi "a tortoise." We prefer our version.

xiv. 28. The "burden" or prediction here referred to is that which follows to the end of the chapter, against the Philistines, whose land is called Palestina in verses 29 and 31.

xiv. 29. The Chaldee treats this as a prophecy of the Messiah, but it is better to understand it of Uzziah's successors. The Philistines disappeared as completely as the Babylonians.

And cut off from Babylon the name, and remnant,
And son, and nephew, saith the LORD.

23 I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water:
And I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the LORD of hosts.

The kings of Babylon successively were the great enemies and oppressors of God's people; and, therefore, in the destruction of Babylon, the fall of the king and the ruin of his family are here particularly taken notice of and triumphed in. In the day that God has given Israel rest "they shall take up this proverb against the king of Babylon." We must not rejoice when our enemy falls, as ours; but when Babylon, the common enemy of God and his Israel, sinks, then rejoice over her thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets, Rev. xviii. 20. The Babylonian monarchy bade fair to be an absolute, universal, and perpetual one, and in these pretensions vied with the Almighty; it is therefore very justly not only brought down, but insulted over when it is down; and it is not only the last monarch, Belshazzar, who was slain on that night that Babylon was taken, Dan. v. 30, who is here triumphed over, but the whole monarchy which sunk in him; not without special reference to Nebuchadnezzar, in whom that monarchy was at its height. Now here,

First. The fall of the king of Babylon is rejoiced in; and a most curious, elegant composure is here prepared, not to adorn his hearse or monument, but to expose his memory, and fix a lasting brand of infamy upon it. It gives us an account of the life and death of this mighty monarch, how he went down slain to the pit, though he had been "the terror of the mighty in the land of the living," Eze. xxxii. 27. In this parable we may observe,

1. The prodigious height of wealth and power to which this monarch and monarchy arrived. Babylon was a "golden city," ver. 4. It is a Chaldee word in the original, which intimates that she used to call herself so, so much did she abound in riches, and excel all other cities, as gold doth all other metals. She is goldthirsty, or an exactress of gold, so some read it; for how do men get wealth to themselves but by squeezing it out of others? The new Jerusalem is the only true golden city, Rev. xxi. 18, 21. The king of Babylon having so much wealth in his dominions, and the absolute command of it, by the help of that "ruled the nations," ver. 6, gave them law, and read them their doom; and at his pleasure weakened the nations, ver. 12, that they might not be able to make head against him. Such vast victorious armies did he bring into the field, that which way soever he looked he made the earth to tremble, and shook kingdoms, ver. 16; all his neighbours were afraid of him, and were forced to truckle to him. No one man could do this by his own personal strength, but by the numbers he has at his beck. Great tyrants, by making some do what they will, make others suffer what they will. How piteous is the case of mankind, which thus seems to be in a combination against itself and its own rights and liberties, which could not be ruined but by its own strength!

2. The wretched abuse of all this wealth and power, which the king of Babylon was guilty of in two instances.

1st. Great oppression and cruelty. He is known by the name of "the oppressor," ver. 4; he hath "the sceptre of the rulers," ver. 5, hath the command of all the princes about him; but it is the "staff of the wicked," a staff with which he supports himself in his wickedness, and wickedly strikes all about him. He smote the people, not in justice, for their correction and reformation, but in wrath, ver. 6, to gratify his own peevish resentments; and that "with a continual stroke;" pursued them with his forces, and gave them no respite, no breathing time, no cessation of arms. He "ruled the nations," but he ruled them in anger, every thing he said and did was in passion; so that he who had the government of all about him had no government of himself; he "made the world as a wilderness," as if he had taken a pride in being the plague of his generation, and a curse to mankind, ver. 17. Great princes used to glory in building cities, but he gloried in destroying them: see Ps. ix. 6. Two particular instances are here given of his tyranny, worse than all the rest: First. That he was severe to his captives; ver. 17, he "opened not the house of his prisoners;" he 'did not let them loose homewards,' so the margin reads it; he kept them in close confinement, and never would suffer any to return to their own land. This refers especially to the people of the Jews, and it is that which fills up the measure of the king of Babylon's iniquity, that he had detained the people of God in captivity, and would by no means release them; nay, and by profaning the vessels of God's temple at Jerusalem did in effect say they should never return to their former use, Dan. v. 2, 3. For this he was presently and justly turned out by one who, the first thing he did, opened the house of God's prisoners, and sent home the temple vessels. Secondly. That he was oppressive to his own subjects; ver. 20, "Thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people;" and what did he get by that, when the wealth of the land and the multitude of the people is the strength and honour of the prince, who never rules so safely, so gloriously, as in the hearts and affections of the people? But tyrants sacrifice their interests to their lusts and passions; and God will reckon with them for their barbarous usage of those that are under their power, whom they think they may use as they please.

2nd. Great pride and haughtiness. Notice is here taken of his pomp, the extravagancy of his retinue, ver 11. He affected to appear in the utmost magnificence; but that was not the worst, it was the temper of his mind, and the elevation of that, that ripened him for his ruin; ver. 13, 14, "Thou hast said in thine heart," like Lucifer, "I will ascend into heaven." Here is the language of his vain-glory, borrowed perhaps from that of the angels that fell, who, not content with their first estate, the post assigned them, would vie with God, and become not only independent of him, but equal with him. Or, perhaps it refers to the story of Nebuchadnezzar, who, when he would be more than a man, was justly turned into a brute, Dan. iv. 30. The king of Babylon here promiseth himself, First. That in pomp and power he shall quite overtop all his neighbours, and shall arrive to the very height of earthly glory and felicity; that he shall be as great and as happy as this world can make him. That is the heaven of a carnal heart; and to that he hopes to ascend, and to be as far above those about him as the heaven is above the earth. Princes are the stars of God, which give some light to this dark world, Mat. xxiv. 29; but he will exalt his throne above them all. Secondly. That he shall particularly insult over God's mount Zion, which Belshazzar, in his last drunken frolic, seemed to have had a spite to in a special manner, when he called for the vessels of the temple at Jerusalem, to profane them: see Dan. v. 2. In the same humour he here said, "I will sit upon the mount of the congregation," (it is the same word that is used for the holy convocations,) "in the sides of the north;" so mount Zion is said to be situated, Ps. xlviii. 2. Perhaps Belshazzar was projecting an expedition to Jerusalem, to triumph in the ruins of it, then when God cut him off. Thirdly. That he shall vie with the God of Israel, of whom he had indeed heard glorious things, that he had his residence "above the heights of the clouds. But thither, saith he, will I ascend, and be as great as he; I will be like him whom they call the Most High. It is a gracious ambition to covet to be like the Most Holy, for he hath said, "Be ye holy, for I am holy;" but it is a sinful ambition to aim to be like the Most High, for he hath said that "He that exalteth himself shall be abased;" and the devil drew our first parents in to eat forbidden fruit, by promising them that they should be as gods. Fourthly. That he shall himself be deified after his death, as some of the first founders of the Assyrian monarchy were, and stars had even their names from them; But, saith he, "I will exalt my throne" above them all. Such as this was his pride, which was the undoubted omen of his destruction.

3. The utter ruin that should be brought upon him.

1st. It is foretold that his wealth and power should be broken, and a final period put to his pomp and pleasure; he hath been long an oppressor, but he shall cease to be so, ver. 4. Had he ceased to be so by true repentance and reformation, according to the advice Daniel gave to Nebuchadnezzar, it might have been a lengthening of his life and tranquillity. But those that will not cease to sin, God will make them to cease. The golden city, that one would have thought might have continued for ever, is ceased; there is an end of that Babylon. The Lord, the righteous God, hath broken the staff of that wicked prince, broken it over his head, in token of the divesting him of his office; God hath taken his power from him, and disabled him to do any more mischief. He has broken the sceptres, for even those are brittle things, soon broken, and often justly.

2nd. That he himself should be seized. He "is persecuted," ver. 6, violent hands are laid upon him, and "none hindereth." It is the common fate of tyrants, when they fall into the power of their enemies, to be deserted by their flatterers, whom they took for their friends. We read of another enemy like this here, of whom it is foretold, that "he shall come to his end, and none shall help him," Dan. xi. 45. Tiberius and Nero thus saw themselves abandoned.

3rd. That he should be slain, and go down to the congregation of the dead, to be free among them, as the slain that are no more remembered, Ps. lxxxviii. 5; he shall be weak, as the dead are, and like unto them, ver. 10. His "pomp is brought down to the grave," that is, it perisheth with him; the pomp of his life shall not as usual end in a funeral pomp. True glory, that is, true grace, will go up with the soul to heaven, but vain pomp will go down with the body to the grave; there is an end of it. The noise of his viols is now heard no more; death is a farewell to the pleasures, as well as to the pomps, of this world. This mighty prince, that used to lie on a bed of down, and tread upon rich carpets, and to have coverings and canopies exquisitely fine, now shall have the worms spread under him, and the worms covering him, ver. 11; worms bred out of his own putrefied body, which, though he fancied himself a god, proved him to be made of the same mould with other men. When we are pampering and decking our bodies, it is good to remember they will be worms' meat shortly.

4th. That he should not have the honour of a burial, much less of a decent one, and in the sepulchres of his ancestors. The "kings of the nations lie in glory," ver. 18; either the dead bodies themselves, so embalmed as to be preserved from putrefaction, as of old among the Egyptians; or their effigies (as with us) erected over their graves. Thus, as if they would defy the ignominy of death, they lay in a poor, faint sort of glory, "every one in his own house," that is, his own burying-place; for the grave is the house appointed for all living, a sleeping house, where the busy and troublesome will lie quiet, and the troubled and weary lie at rest. But this king of Babylon is cast out, and has no grave, ver. 19; his dead body is thrown, like that of a beast, into the next ditch, or upon the next dunghill, "like an abominable branch" of some noxious, poisonous plant, which nobody will touch. Or, as the clothes of malefactors put to death, and by the hand of justice thrust through with a sword, and on whose dead bodies heaps of stones are raised, or they are thrown into some deep quarry, among the "stones of the pit." Nay, the king of Babylon's dead body shall be as the carcases of those who are slain in battle, that are "trodden under feet" by the horses and soldiers, and crushed to pieces. Thus he shall not be joined with his ancestors in burial, ver. 20. To be denied decent burial is a disgrace, which, if it be inflicted for righteousness' sake, as Ps. lxxix. 2, may, as other such reproaches be, rejoiced in, Mat. v. 12; it is the lot of the two witnesses, Rev. xi. 9. But if, as here, it be the just punishment of iniquity, it is an intimation that evil pursues impenitent sinners beyond death, greater evil than that, and that they shall rise to everlasting shame and contempt.

4. The many triumphs that should be in his fall.

1st. Those whom he had been a great tyrant and terror to will be glad that they are rid of him, ver. 7, 8. Now he is gone, "the whole earth is at rest, and is quiet," for he was the great disturber of the peace; now they all "break forth into singing," for "when the wicked perish there is shouting," Pr. xi. 10. The fir-trees and cedars of Lebanon now think themselves safe, there is no danger now of their being cut down to make way for his vast armies, or to furnish him with timber. The neighbouring princes and great men, who are compared to fir-trees and cedars, Zec. xi. 2, may now be easy, and out of fear of being dispossessed of their rights, for "the hammer of the whole earth is cut asunder and broken," Jer. l. 23; the axe that "boasted itself against him that heweth with it," ch. x. 15.

2nd. The congregation of the dead will bid him welcome to them, especially those whom he had barbarously hastened thither; ver. 9, 10, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming," and to compliment thee upon thy arrival into the dark and dreadful regions. The "chief ones of the earth," who, when they were alive, were kept in awe by him, and durst not come near him, but rose from their thrones to resign them to him; when he comes into the state of the dead shall upbraid him with this, shall go forth to meet him, as they used to do when he made his public entry into cities he was become master of; with such a parade shall he be introduced into those regions of horror, to make his disgrace and torment the more grievous to him. They shall scoffingly rise from their thrones and seats there, and ask him if he will please to sit down in them, as he used to do in their thrones on earth? The confusion that will then cover him they shall make a jest of, "Art thou also become weak as we?" Who would have thought it? it was what thou thyself didst not expect it would ever come to, when thou wast in every thing too hard for us. Thou that didst rank thyself among the immortal gods, art thou come to take thy fate among us poor mortal men? Where is thy pomp now, and where thy mirth? ver. 11, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning?" The king of Babylon had shone as bright as the morning star, and fancied that wherever he came he brought day along with him; and is such an illustrious prince as this fallen? such a star become a clod of clay? Did ever any man fall from such a height of honour and power, into such an abyss of shame and misery? This has been commonly alluded to, (and it is a mere allusion,) to illustrate the fall of the angels, that were as morning stars, Job xxxviii. 7. But how are they fallen? "How art thou cut down to the ground," and levelled with it, that "didst weaken the nations?" God will reckon with those that invade the rights and disturb the peace of mankind; for he is King of nations, as well as saints. Now this reception of the king of Babylon into the regions of the dead, which is here described, surely is some-xv. 1. A good deal of this prophecy against Moab is embodied in Jer. xlviii. Ar and Kir were cities of Moab.

xv. 2. By "Bajith" we might understand a house or temple. Most of the places named here still exist in ruins only, and have been more or less perfectly explored. Several of them had been alternately occupied by Moabites and Israelites.

xv. 5. Zoar is believed to have been near the south-east of the Dead Sea. "The mounting up of Luhith" is an ascent, or a pass, either leading to Luhith, or so called. The site of Horonaim is, we believe, unknown. Most of the chief places of Moab are mentioned, to show how general the destruction would be.

xv. 7. For "brook of the willows" the margin has "or, valley of the Arabians," which was the rendering of Diodati and others, derived from the Greek. Lowth thinks the allusion is to Babylon, but it is rather the name of a water-course, "Willow-brook," still called by an equivalent designation.

thing more than a flight of fancy, and is designed to speak these solid truths: First. That there is an invisible world, a world of spirits, to which the souls of men remove at death, and in which they exist, and act in a state of separation from the body. Secondly. That separate souls have acquaintance and converse with each other, though we have none with them; the parable of the rich man and Lazarus intimates this. Thirdly. That death and hell will be death and hell indeed to those that fall unsanctified from the height of this world's pomps, and the fulness of its pleasures: "Son, remember," Lu. xvi. 25.

3rd. Spectators will stand amazed at his fall. When he shall be "brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit," and be lodged there, ver. 15, they that see him shall narrowly look upon him, and consider him; they shall scarce believe their own eyes; never was death so great a change to any man as it is to him. Is it possible that a man who, a few hours ago, looked so great, so pleasant, and was so splendidly adorned and attended, should now look so ghastly, so despicable, and lie thus naked and neglected? "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, and shook kingdoms?" Who could have thought he should ever have come to this? Ps. lxxxii. 7.

5. Here is an inference drawn from all this; ver. 20, "The seed of evil-doers shall never be renowned." The princes of the Babylonian monarchy were all a seed of evil-doers, oppressors of the people of God, and therefore they had this infamy entailed upon them. 'They shall not be renowned for ever,' so some read it; they may look big for a time, but all their pomp will only render their disgrace at last the more shameful. There is no credit in a sinful way.

Secondly. The utter ruin of the royal family is here foretold, together with the desolation of the royal city.

1. The royal family is to be wholly extirpated. The Medes and Persians that are to be employed in this destroying work are ordered, when they have slain Belshazzar, to "prepare slaughter for his children," ver. 21, and not to spare them: the little ones of Babylon must be dashed against the stones, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. These orders sound very harsh; but,

1st. They must suffer "for the iniquity of their fathers," which is often "visited upon the children," to shew how much God hates sin, and is displeased at it, and to deter sinners from it, which is the end of punishment. Nebuchadnezzar had slain Zedekiah's sons, Jer. lii. 10, and for that iniquity of his his seed are paid in the same coin.

2nd. They must be cut off now, that they may not rise up to possess the land, and do as much mischief in their day as their fathers had done in theirs; that they may not be as vexatious to the world, by building cities for the support of their tyranny, (which was Nimrod's policy, Gen. x. 10, 11,) as their ancestors had been by destroying cities. Pharoah oppressed Israel in Egypt by setting them to build cities, Ex. i. 11. The providence of God consults the welfare of nations more than we are aware of, by cutting off some that, if they had lived, would have done mischief. Justly may the enemies cut off the children, "For I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of hosts," ver. 22. And if God reveal it as his mind that he will have it done, as none can hinder it, so none need scruple to further it. Babylon perhaps was proud of the numbers of her royal family, but God determined to cut off "the name and remnant" of it, so that none should be left; to have both the sons and grandsons of the king slain; and yet we are sure he never did, nor ever will, do any wrong to any of his creatures.

2. The royal city is to be demolished and deserted, ver. 23. It shall be a possession for solitary, frightful birds, particularly the bittern, joined with the cormorant and the owl, ch. xxxiv. 11. And thus the utter destruction of the New Testament Babylon is illustrated, Rev. xviii. 2, it is "become a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." Babylon lay low, so when it was deserted, and no care taken to drain the land, it soon became pools of water, standing, stinking puddles, as unhealthful as unpleasant. And thus God will "sweep it with the besom of destruction." When a people have nothing among them but dirt and filth, and will not be made clean with the besom of reformation, what can they expect but to be swept off the face of the earth with "the besom of destruction?"

24 The LORD of hosts hath sworn, saying,
Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass;
And as I have purposed, so shall it stand:
25 That I will break the Assyrian in my land,
And upon my mountains tread him under foot:
Then shall his yoke depart from off them,
And his burden depart from off their shoulders.
26 This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth:
And this is the hand that is stretched out upon all the nations. [disannul it?
27 For the LORD of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it?
And his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?
28 In the year that king Ahaz died was this burden.
29 Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina,
Because the rod of him that smote thee is broken:
For out of the serpent's root shall come forth a cockatrice,
And his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.
30 And the firstborn of the poor shall feed,
And the needy shall lie down in safety:
And I will kill thy root with famine,
And he shall slay thy remnant.
31 Howl, O gate; cry, O city;
Thou, whole Palestina, art dissolved:
For there shall come from the north a smoke,
And none shall be alone in his appointed times
32 What shall one then answer the messengers of the nation?
That the LORD hath founded Zion,
And the poor of his people shall trust in it.

The destruction of Babylon and the Chaldean empire was a thing at a great distance; the empire was not risen to any considerable height when its fall was here foretold; it was almost two hundred years from this prediction of Babylon's fall to the accomplishment of it. Now the people to whom Isaiah prophesied might ask, What is this to us, or what shall we be the better for it? And what assurance shall we have of it? To both which questions he answered in these verses, by a prediction of the ruin both of the Assyrians and of the Philistines, the present enemies that infested them, which they should shortly be eyewitnesses of, and have benefit by. These would be a present comfort to them, and a pledge of future deliverance, for the confirming of the faith of their posterity. God is to his people the same to-day that he was yesterday, and will be hereafter; and he will for ever be the same that he hath been and is. Here is,

First. Assurance given of the destruction of the Assyrians; ver. 25, "I will break the Assyrian in my land." Sennacherib brought a very formidable army into the land of Judah, but there God broke it, broke all his regiments by the sword of a destroying angel. Note, Those who wrongfully invade God's land, it is at their peril; and those who, with unhallowed feet, trample upon his holy mountains, they shall themselves there be trodden under foot. God undertakes to do it himself, his people having no might against the great company that came against them: "I will break the Assyrian," let me alone to do it, who have angels, hosts of angels, at command. Now the breaking of the power of the Assyrian would be the breaking of the yoke from off the neck of God's people, "his burden shall depart from off their shoulders," the burthen of quartering that vast army, and paying contribution; therefore the Assyrian must be broken, that Judah and Jerusalem may be eased. Let those that make themselves a yoke and a burthen to God's people see what they are to expect. Now,

1. This prophecy is here ratified and confirmed by an oath; ver. 24, "The Lord of hosts hath sworn;" that he might shew the immutability of his counsel, and that his people may have strong consolation, Heb. vi. 17, 18. What is here said of this particular intention is true of all God's purposes, "As I have thought, so shall it come to pass;" for "he is in one mind, and who can turn him?" Nor is he ever put upon new counsels, or obliged to take new measures, as men often are, when things occur which they did not foresee. Let those who are "the called according to God's purpose," comfort themselves with this, that "as God hath purposed, so shall it stand," and on that their stability doth depend.

2. The breaking of the Assyrian power is made a specimen of what God would do with all the powers of the nations that were engaged against him and his church; ver. 26, "This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth;" the 'whole world,' so the Seventy; 'all the inhabitants of the earth,' so the Chaldee; not only upon the Assyrian empire, which was then reckoned to be, in a manner, all the world, as afterwards the Roman empire was, Lu. ii. 1, and with it many nations fell that had dependence upon it, but upon all those states and potentates that should at any time attack his land, his mountains. The fate of the Assyrian shall be theirs, they shall soon find that they meddle to their own hurt; Jerusalem, as it was to the Assyrian, will be to all people, a "burthensome stone;" "all that burthen themselves with it" shall infallibly be cut to pieces by it, Zec. xii. 3, 6. The same hand of power and justice that is now to be stretched out against the Assyrian, for invading the people of God, shall be "stretched out upon all the nations" that do likewise. It is still true, and will be ever so, Cursed is he that curseth God's Israel, Num. xxiv. 9. God will be an enemy to his people's enemies, Ex. xxiii. 22.

3. All the powers on earth are defied to change God's counsels; ver. 27, "The Lord of hosts hath purposed" to break the Assyrian's yoke, and every rod of the wicked laid upon the lot of the righteous. And who shall disannul this purpose? Who can persuade him to recall it, or find out a plea to evade it? "His hand is stretched out," to execute this purpose, and who hath power enough to turn it back, or to stay the course of his judgments?

Secondly. Assurance is likewise given of the destruction of the Philistines, and their power. This burthen, this prophecy, that laid load upon them to sink their state, came "in the year that king Ahaz died," which was the first year of Hezekiah's reign, ver. 28. When a good king came in the room of a bad one, then this acceptable message was sent among them. When we reform, then, and not till then, we may look for good news from heaven Now here we have,

1. Rebuke to the Philistines for triumphing in the death of king Uzziah. He had been as a serpent to them, had bitten them, had smitten them, had brought them very low, 2 Chr. xxvi. 6; he warred against the Philistines, broke down their walls, and built cities among them; but when Uzziah died, or rather, abdicated, it was told with joy in Gath, and published in the streets of Ashkelon. It is inhuman thus to rejoice in our neighbour's fall; but let them not be secure; for though when Uzziah was dead they made reprisals upon Ahaz, and took many of the cities of Judah, 2 Chr. xxviii. 18, yet out of the root of Uzziah should come a cockatrice, a more formidable enemy than Uzziah was, even Hezekiah, the fruit of whose government should be to them a fiery flying serpent, for he should fall upon them with incredible swiftness and fury. We find he did so, 2 Kin. xviii. 8, "He smote the Philistines even unto Gaza." Note, If God remove one useful instrument in the midst of his usefulness, he can and will raise up others to carry on and complete the same work that they were employed in and left unfinished.

2. A prophecy of the destruction of the Philistines by famine and war. 1st. By famine, ver. 30. When the people of God, whom the Philistines had wasted, and distressed, and impoverished, shall enjoy plenty again, and "the first-born of their poor shall feed," that is, the poorest among them shall have food convenient; when, as for the Philistines, God will "kill their root with famine;" that which was their strength, and with which they thought themselves established as the tree is by the root, shall be starved, and dried up by degrees, as those die that die by famine; and thus "he shall slay the remnant." Those that escape from one destruction are but reserved for another; and when there are but a few left, those few shall at length be cut off, for God will make a full end. 2nd. By war. When the needy of God's people shall "lie down in safety," ver. 30, not terrified with the alarms of war, but delighting in the songs of peace, then every gate and every city of the Philistines shall be howling and crying, ver. 31; and there shall be a total dissolution of their state; for from Judea, which lay north of the Philistines, there shall come a smoke, a vast army raising a great dust, a smoke that shall be the indication of a devouring fire at hand. And none of all that army shall be "alone in his appointed times;" none shall straggle or be missing when they are to engage, but they shall all be vigorous and unanimous in attacking the common enemy, when the time appointed for the doing of it comes. None of them shall decline the public service, as in Deborah's time Reuben abode among the sheepfolds, and Ashur on the sea shore, Jud. v. 16, 17. When God has work to do, he will wonderfully spirit men for it.

Thirdly. The good use that should be made of all these events for the encouragement of the people of God; ver. 32, "What shall one then answer the messengers of the nations?" This implies, 1. That the great things God doth for his people are, and cannot but be, taken notice of by their neighbours, "They among the heathen" make remarks upon them, Ps. cxxvi. 2. 2. That messengers will be sent to inquire concerning them. Jacob and Israel have xv. 9. Dimon here is by many identified with Dibon in verse 2.

xvi. 1. The Chaldee applies this to the Messiah. For "lamb" the Syriac has "son," which Lowth adopts, though no Hebrew copy is so. The lamb would be either for tribute or a peaceful gift. "Sela" is Edom, which is called on to send the lamb to the ruler of Israel.

xvi. 3. Some think the Moabites here address Israel, but more, with greater reason, regard the prophet or his countrymen as the speakers.

xvi. 5. The Chaldee applies this to the Messiah. The reference is to the throne and king of Israel; but the Messiah may be included.

xvi. 6. The last clause, "but his lies shall not be so," is not well translated. It should be connected with the preceding: "his pride, and his wrath, his empty lies," or "unjust lies." The words for "not so" literally mean "unright."

xvi. 7. For "foundations" some translate "ruins;" a probable long been a people distinguished from all others, and dignified with uncommon favours; and therefore some for good-will, others for ill-will, and all for curiosity, are inquisitive concerning them. 3. That it concerns us always to be ready, to "give a reason of the hope" that we have in the providence of God, as well as in his grace, in answer to every one that ask it, "with meekness and fear," 1 Pet. iii. 15. And we need go no farther than the sacred truths of God's word for a reason, for God, in all he doth, is fulfilling the Scripture. 4. The issue of God's dealings with his people shall be so clearly and manifestly glorious, that any one, every one, shall be able to give an account of them to those that inquire concerning them. Now the answer which is to be given to the messengers of the nations is, 1st. That God is and will be a faithful friend to his church and people, and will secure and advance their interests. Tell them that "the Lord hath founded Zion." This gives an account both of the work itself that is done, and of the reason of it. What is God doing in the world, and what is he designing in all the revolutions of states and kingdoms, in the ruin of some nations and the rise of others? He is in all this founding Zion; he is aiming at the advancement of his church's interests; and what he aims at he will accomplish. The messengers of the nations, when they sent to inquire concerning Hezekiah's successes against the Philistines, expected to learn by what politics, counsels, and arts of war, he carried his point, but are told they were not owing to anything of that nature, but to the care God took of his church and the interest he had in it, "The Lord hath founded Zion," and therefore the Philistines must down. 2nd. That his church hath and will have a dependence upon him, "The poor of his people shall trust in it." His poor people, that had lately been brought very low, even the poorest of them, they more than others, for they have nothing else to trust to, Zeph. iii. 12, 13; "the poor receive the Gospel," Mat. xi. 5. They shall trust to this, to this great truth, "that the Lord hath founded Zion;" on this they shall build their hopes, and not on an arm of flesh. This ought to give us abundant satisfaction as to public affairs, that however it goes with particular persons, parties, and interests, the church, having God himself for its founder, and Christ the rock for its foundation, cannot but stand firm. The poor of his people shall betake themselves to it, (so some read it,) shall join themselves to his church and embark in its interests; they shall concur with God in his designs to establish his people, and shall wind up all on the same bottom, and make all their little concerns and projects truckle to that. They that take God's people for their people must be willing to take their lot with them, and cast in their lot among them. Let the messengers of the nations know that the poor Israelites that trust in God, having, like Zion, their foundation in the holy mountains, Ps. lxxxvii. 1, they are like Zion, which "cannot be removed, but abideth for ever," Ps. cxxv. 1, and therefore they will not fear what man can do unto them.

CHAPTER XV.

This chapter and that which follows it are the burthen of Moab, a prophecy of some great desolation that was coming upon that country, which bordered upon this land of Israel, and had often been injurious and vexatious to it, though the Moabites were descended from Lot, Abraham's kinsman and companion; and though the Israelites, by the appointment of God, had spared them, when they might both easily and justly have cut them off with their neighbours. In this chapter we have, I. Great lamentations made by the Moabites, and by the prophet himself for them, ver. 1—5. II. The great calamities which should occasion that lamentation, and justify it, ver. 6—9.

THE burden of Moab.
Because in the night Ar of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence;
Because in the night Kir of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence;
2 He is gone up to Bajith, and to Dibon, the high places, to weep:
Moab shall howl over Nebo, and over Medeba:
On all their heads shall be baldness,
And every beard cut off.
3 In their streets they shall gird themselves with sackcloth:
On the tops of their houses, and in their streets, every one shall howl, Weeping abundantly.
4 And Heshbon shall cry, and Elealeh:
Their voice shall be heard even unto Jahaz:
Therefore the armed soldiers of Moab shall cry out;
His life shall be grievous unto him.
5 My heart shall cry out for Moab; [years old:
His fugitives shall flee unto Zoar, an heifer of three
For by the mounting up of Luhith with weeping shall they go it up;
For in the way of Horonaim they shall raise up a cry of destruction.

The country of Moab was but of small extent, but very fruitful; it bordered upon the lot of Reuben on the other side Jordan, and upon the Dead sea. Naomi went to sojourn there when there was a famine in Canaan. This is the country which, it is here foretold, should be wasted and grievously harassed; not quite ruined, for we find another prophecy of its ruin, Jer. xlviii., which was accomplished by Nebuchadnezzar. This prophecy here was to be fulfilled within three years, ch. xvi. 14, and therefore was fulfilled in the devastations made in that country by the army of the Assyrians, which for many years ravaged those parts, enriching themselves with spoil and plunder. Either it was done by the army of Salmaneser, about the time of the taking of Samaria, in the fourth year of Hezekiah, as is most probable, or by the army of Sennacherib, which ten years after invaded Judah. We cannot suppose that the prophet went among the Moabites to preach them this sermon, but he delivered it to his own people, 1. To shew them that, though judgment begins at the house of God, yet it shall not end there, and that there is a Providence which governs the world and all the nations of it, and that to the God of Israel the worshippers of false gods were accountable, and liable to his judgments. 2. To give them a proof of God's care of them and jealousy for them, and to convince them that God was an enemy to their enemies, for such the Moabites had often been. 3. That the accomplishment of this prophecy now shortly, within three years, might be a confirmation of the prophet's mission, and of the truth of all his other prophecies, and might encourage the faithful to depend upon them. Now concerning Moab it is here foretold,

First. That their chief cities should be surprised and taken in a night by the enemy, probably because the inhabitants, as the men of Laish, indulged themselves in ease and luxury, and dwelt securely, ver. 1. Therefore there shall be great grief, "because in the night Ar of Moab is laid waste," "and Kir of Moab," the two principal cities of that kingdom; "In the night that they were taken," or sacked, "Moab was cut off." The seizing of them laid the whole country open, and made all the wealth of it an easy prey to the victorious army. Note, 1. Great changes, and very dismal ones, may be made in a very little time. Here are two cities lost in a night, though that is the time of quietness. Let us therefore lie down as those that know not what a night may bring forth. 2. As the country feeds the cities, so the cities protect the country, and neither can say to the other, "I have no need of thee."

Secondly. That the Moabites, being hereby put into the utmost consternation imaginable, should have recourse to their idols for relief, and pour out their tears before them, ver. 2. "He," that is Moab, especially the king of Moab, "is gone up to Bajith," or rather, to the house or temple of Chemosh; "and Dibon," that is, the inhabitants of Dibon, are gone up to "the high places," where they worshipped their idols, there to make their complaints. Note, It becomes a people in distress to seek to their God; and shall not we then thus "walk in the name of the Lord our God," and call upon him in the time of trouble, before whom we shall not shed such useless, profitless tears as they did before their gods?

Thirdly. That there should be the voice of an universal grief all the country over. It is described here elegantly and very affectingly; Moab shall be a vale of tears, a little map of this world, ver. 2. The Moabites shall lament the loss of Nemo and Medeba, two considerable cities, which it is likely were plundered and burnt. They shall tear their hair for grief to that degree, that "on all their heads shall be baldness," and they shall cut off their beards, according to the customary expression of mourning in those times and countries. When they go abroad, they shall be so far from coveting to appear handsome, that "in the streets they shall gird themselves with sackcloth;" and perhaps being forced to use that poor clothing, the enemy having stripped them, and rifled their houses, and left them no other clothing. When they come home, instead of applying themselves to their business, they shall go up to the tops of their houses, which were flat-roofed, and there they shall weep abundantly, nay, they shall howl in crying to their gods. Those that "cry not to God with their hearts" do but "howl upon their beds," Hos. vii. 14; Am. viii. 3. They shall 'come down with weeping,' so the margin reads it; they shall come down from their high places and the tops of their houses, weeping as much as they did when they went up. Prayer to the true God is heart's ease, 1 Sam. i. 18, but prayers to false gods are not. Divers places are here named that should be full of lamentation, ver. 4. It is but a poor relief to have so many fellow-sufferers, fellow mourners; to a public spirit, that is rather an aggravation, socios habuisse doloris,—'to have associates in woe.'

Fourthly. That the courage of their militia should fail them. Though they were bred soldiers and were well armed, yet they "shall cry out," and shriek for fear, and every one of them shall have his life become "grievous to him," though it is a military life, which useth to delight in danger, ver. 4. See how easily God can dispirit the stoutest of men, and deprive a nation of benefit by those whom it most depended upon for strength and defence. The Moabites shall generally be so overwhelmed with grief, that life itself shall be a burthen to them. Those that are most fond of life God can easily make them sick of it.

Fifthly. That the outcry for these calamities should propagate grief to all the adjacent parts, ver. 5. 1. The prophet himself hath very sensible impressions made upon his spirit by the prediction of it, "My heart shall cry out for Moab." Though they are enemies to Israel, they are our fellow creatures, of the same rank with us, and therefore it should pity us to see them in such distress, the rather because we know not how soon it may be our turn to drink of the same cup of trembling. Note, It becomes God's ministers to be of a tender spirit, not to desire the woful day, but to be like their Master, who wept over Jerusalem, even then when he gave her up to ruin, like their God, who "desires not the death of sinners." 2. All the neighbouring cities shall echo to the lamentations of Moab. The fugitives that are making the best of their way to shift for their own safety, shall carry the cry to Zoar, the city to which their ancestor, Lot, fled for shelter from Sodom's flames, and which was spared for his sake. They shall make as great a noise with their cry as "a heifer of three years old" doth when she goes lowing for her calf, as 1 Sam. vi. 12. They shall go up the hill of Luhith, as David went up the ascent of mount Olivet; many a weary step, and all in tears, 2 Sam. xv. 30. And in the way of Horonaim,—a dual termination,—the way that leads to the two Beth-horons, the upper and nether, which we read of Jos. xv. 3, 5, thither the cry should be carried, there it should be raised, even at that great distance, a cry of destruction, that shall be the cry; like, Fire, fire, we are all undone. Grief is catching, so is fear, and justly, for trouble is spreading, and when it begins who knows where it will end?

6 For the waters of Nimrim shall be desolate:
For the hay is withered away, the grass faileth,
There is no green thing.
7 Therefore the abundance they have gotten, and that which they have laid up,
Shall they carry away to the brook of the willows.
8 For the cry is gone round about the borders of Moab:
The howling thereof unto Eglaim,
And the howling thereof unto Beer-elim.
9 For the waters of Dimon shall be full of blood:
For I will bring more upon Dimon,
Lions upon him that escapeth of Moab,
And upon the remnant of the land.

Here the prophet farther describes the woful and piteous lamentations that should be heard throughout all the country of Moab, when it should become explanation, although Delitzsch explains the word of "cakes made of grapes," both here and in Hos. iii. 1, the only other place where the Hebrew word occurs.

xvi. 8. The vines of Sibmah produced strong wine. "The sea" here is no doubt "the sea of Jazer" of Jer. xlviii. 32; that is, a large pool or tank of water.

xvi. 9. The sense is, "I will bewail the vine of Sibmah with the same lament as I utter over Jazer," &c. At the end of the verse, if we put "faileth" for "is fallen," the meaning will be plain. Most commonly, however, the words are taken to intimate "that a war-cry has come down upon summer fruits and harvest." The Hebrew word usually means a cry of joy, like that of the harvest home, as in verse 10, where our version has "vintage shouting."

xvi. 12. The idol worship of Moab would be useless.

xvii. 1. Although placed here, the prophecy against Damascus is thought to have been uttered sooner than some which stand before it.

a prey to the Assyrian army. By this time the cry is gone round about all the borders of Moab, ver. 8. Every corner of the country has received the alarm, and is in the utmost confusion upon it. It is got to Eglaim, a city at one end of the country, and to Beer-elim, a city as far the other way. Where sin has been general, and all flesh have corrupted their way, what else can be expected but a general desolation?

Two things are here spoken of as causes of this lamentation:

First. The waters of Nimrim are desolate, ver. 6; that is, the country is plundered and impoverished, and all the wealth and substance of it swept away by the victorious army. Famine is usually the sad effect of war. Look into the fields that were well watered, the fruitful meadows that yielded delightful prospects and more delightful products, and there all is eaten up or carried off by the enemy's foragers, and the remainder trodden to dirt by their horses. If an army encamp upon green fields, their greenness is soon gone. Look into the houses, and they are stripped too, ver. 7. The abundance of wealth that they had gotten with a great deal of art and industry, and that which they had laid up with a great deal of care and confidence, "shall they carry away to the brook of the willows;" either the owners shall carry it thither to hide it, or the enemies shall carry it thither to pack it up, and send it home, by water perhaps, to their own country. Note, 1. Those that are eager to get abundance of this world, and solicitous to lay up what they have gotten, little consider what may become of it, and in how little a time it may be all taken from them. 2. Great abundance, by tempting the robbers, exposeth the owners, and they who depend upon it to protect them often find it doth but betray them. 3. In times of distress great riches are many times great burthens, and do but increase the owner's care or the enemy's strength. Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator,—'The penniless traveller will exult, when accosted by a robber, in having nothing about him.'

Secondly. The waters of Dimon are turned into blood, ver. 9; that is, the inhabitants of the country are slain in great numbers, so that the waters adjoining to the cities, whether rivers or pools, are discoloured with human gore, inhumanly shed like water. Dimon signifies bloody; the place shall answer its name. Perhaps it was that place in the country of Moab where the waters seemed to the Moabites as blood, 2 Kin. iii. 22, 23, which occasioned their overthrow. But now, saith God, "I will bring more upon Dimon," more blood than was shed, or thought to be seen at that time. 'I will bring additions upon Dimon,' so the word is, additional plagues; I have yet more judgments in reserve for them; for "all this God's anger is not turned away." When he judgeth he will overcome, and to the roll of curses shall be "added many like words," Jer. xxxvi. 32. See here what is the yet more evil to be brought upon Dimon, upon Moab, which is now to be made a land of blood. Some flee and make their escape, others sit still and are overlooked, and are as a "remnant of the land." But upon both God will bring lions, beasts of prey, which are reckoned one of God's four judgments, Eze. xiv. 21, and these shall glean up those that have escaped the sword of the enemy. Those that continue impenitent in sin, when they are preserved from one judgment, are but reserved for another.

CHAPTER XVI.

This chapter continues and concludes the burthen of Moab. In it, I. The prophet gives good counsel to the Moabites to reform what was amiss among them, and particularly to be kind to God's people, as the likeliest way to prevent the judgments before threatened, ver. 1—5. II. Fearing they would not take this counsel, they were so proud, he goes on to foretell the lamentable devastation of their country, and the confusion they should be brought to, and this within three years, ver. 6—14.

SEND ye the lamb to the ruler of the land
From Sela to the wilderness,
Unto the mount of the daughter of Zion.
2 For it shall be, that, as a wandering bird
Cast out of the nest,
So the daughters of Moab shall be
At the fords of Arnon.
3 Take counsel, execute judgment:
Make thy shadow as the night in the midst of the noonday;
Hide the outcasts;
Bewray not him that wandereth.
4 Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab;
Be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler:
For the extortioner is at an end,
The spoiler ceaseth,
The oppressors are consumed out of the land.
5 And in mercy shall the throne be established:
And he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, [ness.
Judging, and seeking judgment, and hasting righteous-

God has made it to appear he delights not in the ruin of sinners, by telling them what they may do to prevent the ruin; so he doth here to Moab.

First. He adviseth them to be just to the house of David, and to pay the tribute they had formerly covenanted to pay to the kings of his line; ver. 1, "Send ye the lamb to the ruler of the land." David made the Moabites tributaries to him, 2 Sam. viii. 2, they "became his servants, and brought gifts." Afterward they paid their tribute to the kings of Israel, 2 Kin. iii. 4, and paid it in lambs. Now, the prophet requires them to pay it to Hezekiah. Let it be raised and levied from all parts of the country; from Selah, a frontier city of Moab on the one side, "to the wilderness," a boundary of the kingdom on the other side; and let it be sent where it should be, sent to "the mount of the daughter of Zion," the city of David. Some take it as an advice to send a lamb for a sacrifice to God, the ruler of the earth, (so it may be read,) the Lord of the whole earth, ruler of all lands; the land of Moab, as well as the land of Israel; send it to the temple built on mount Zion. And some think it is in this sense spoken ironically, upbraiding the Moabites with their folly in delaying to repent, and make their peace with God. Now you would be glad to send a lamb to mount Zion, to make the God of Israel your friend; but it is too late, the decree hath gone forth, the consumption is determined, and the daughters of Moab shall be cast out "as a wandering bird," ver. 2. I rather take it as good advice seriously given, like that of Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar then when he was reading him his doom, Dan. iv. 27, "Break off thy sins by righteousness, if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity." And it is applicable to the great gospel duty of submission to Christ, as the ruler of the land, and our ruler. Send him the lamb, the best you have, yourselves a living sacrifice. When you come to God, the great ruler, come in the name of the Lamb, the Lamb of God; for else it shall be, (so we may read it, ver. 2,) that as a wandering bird cast out of the nest, so shall the daughters of Moab be. If you will not pay your quit-rent, your just tribute to the king of Judah, you shall be turned out of your houses. The daughters of Moab, the country villages, or the women of your country, shall flutter about the fords of Arnon, attempting that way to make their escape to some other land, like a wandering bird thrown out of the nest half fledged. Those that will not submit to Christ, nor be gathered under the shadow of his wings, shall be as a bird that wanders from her nest; that shall either be snatched up by the next bird of prey, or shall wander endlessly in continual frights. Those that will not yield to the fear of God shall be made to yield to the fear of every thing else.

Secondly. He adviseth them to be kind to the seed of Israel, ver. 3. Take counsel, call a convention, and consult among yourselves what is fit to be done in the present critical juncture; and you will find it your best way to execute judgment, to reverse all the unrighteous decrees you have made, by which you have put hardships upon the people of God; and in token of your repentance for them, study now how to oblige them, and this shall be accepted of God more than all burnt offering and sacrifice.

1. The prophet foresaw some storm coming upon the people of God, perhaps the good people of the ten tribes, or of the two and a half on the other side Jordan, whose country joined to that of Moab, and who, by the merciful providence of God, escaped the fury of the Assyrian army, had their lives given them for a prey, and were reserved for better times, but were put to the utmost extremity to shift for their own safety. The danger and trouble they were in was like the scorching heat at noon. The face of the spoiler was very fierce upon them, and the oppressor and extortioner was ready to swallow them up after what they had.

2. He bespeaks a shelter for them in the land of Moab, when their own land was made too hot for them. This judgment they must execute; thus wisely must they do for themselves, and thus kindly must they deal with the people of God. If they would themselves continue in their habitations, let them now open their doors to the distressed dispersed members of God's church, and be to them like a cool shade to those that "bear the burden and heat of the day." Let them not discover those that absconded among them, nor deliver them up to the pursuers that made search for them; "Bewray not him that wandereth," nor deliver him up, as the Edomites did, Obad. 13, 14, but "hide the outcasts." This was that good work by which Rahab's faith was justified, and proved to be sincere, Heb. xi. 31. Nay, do not only hide them for a time, but, if there be occasion, let them be naturalized: "Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab;" find a lodging for them, and "be thou a covert to them;" let them be taken under the protection of the government, though they are but poor, and likely to be a charge to thee. Note, 1st. It is often the lot even of those who are Israelites indeed, to be outcasts, driven out of house and harbour, by persecution or war, Heb. xi. 37. 2nd. God owns them when men reject and disown them. They are outcasts, but they are mine outcasts. The Lord knows them that are his, wherever he finds them, even there where no one else knows them. 3rd. God will find a rest and shelter for his outcasts; for though they are persecuted they are not forsaken; he will himself be their dwelling-place, if they have no other, and in him they shall be at home. 4th. God can, when he pleaseth, raise up friends for his people, even among Moabites, when they can find none in all the land of Israel that can and dare shelter them. The earth often helps the woman, Rev. xii. 16. 5th. Those that expect to find favour when they are in trouble themselves must shew favour to those that are in trouble; and what service is done to God's outcasts shall, no doubt, be recompensed one way or other.

Thirdly. He assures them of the mercy God had in store for his people. 1. That they should not long need their kindness, or be troublesome to them; "for the extortioner is" almost "at an end" already, and "the spoiler ceaseth." God's people shall not be long outcasts, they "shall have tribulation ten days," Rev. ii. 10, and that is all. The spoiler would never cease spoiling, if he might have his will; but God hath him in a chain. Hitherto he shall go, but no farther. 2. That they should ere long be in a capacity to return their kindness, ver. 5. Though the throne of the ten tribes be sunk and overturned, yet the throne of David shall be established in mercy, by the mercy they receive from God, and the mercy they shew to others; and by the same methods may your throne be established, if you please. It would engage great men to be kind to the people of God, if they would but observe, as they easily might, how often that brings the blessing of God upon kingdoms and families. Make Hezekiah your friend, for you will find it your interest to do so, upon the account both of the grace of God in him, and the presence of God with him. He shall sit upon the throne in truth, and then he doth indeed sit in honour, and sit fast. Then he shall sit judging, and will then be a protector to those that have been a shelter to the people of God. And see in him the character of a good magistrate. 1st. He shall seek judgment; that is, he shall seek occasions of doing right to those that are wronged, and shall punish the injurious even before they are complained of; or, he shall diligently search into every cause brought before him, that he may find where the right lies. 2nd. He shall hasten righteousness, and not delay to do justice, nor keep those long waiting that make application to him for the redress of their grievances. Though he seeks judgment, and deliberates upon it, yet he doth not, under pretence of that, stay the progress of the streams of justice. Let the Moabites take example by this, and then assure themselves that their state shall be established.

6 We have heard of the pride of Moab; he is very proud:
Even of his haughtiness, and his pride, and his wrath:
But his lies shall not be so.
7 Therefore shall Moab howl for Moab,
Every one shall howl:
For the foundations of Kir-hareseth shall ye mourn;
Surely they are stricken.
8 For the fields of Heshbon languish,
And the vine of Sibmah: the lords of the heathen have broken down the principal plants thereof, xvii. 2. More than one city called Aroer existed on the east of the Jordan; there is mention of one on the celebrated Moabite stone.

xvii. 3. Damascus and Israel were conquered by Tiglath-Pileser, when "the glory of the children of Israel" was obscured.

xvii. 8. For "images" the margin has "sun images," which is no doubt right. The sun was very extensively worshipped in Western Asia.

xvii. 9. A very difficult verse to translate. Perhaps we may render it, "In that day shall his strong cities be like a forsaken forest, and a mountain top which they have forsaken, before the children of Israel: and there shall be a desolation." Expositors differ much about the sense of the words.

xvii. 10, 11. These verses refer to the foreign alliances of Israel, which were prized and promised well, but ended in grief and sorrow.

xvii. 12—14. The reference here is to the destruction of the great Assyrian Empire, which included a multitude of nations.

They are come even unto Jazer, they wandered through the wilderness:
Her branches are stretched out, they are gone over the sea.

9 Therefore I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer the vine of Sibmah:
I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon, and Elealeh:
For the shouting for thy summer fruits and for thy harvest is fallen. [field;

10 And gladness is taken away, and joy out of the plentiful
And in the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting:
The treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses;
I have made their vintage shouting to cease.

TREADING WINE.

11 Wherefore my bowels shall sound like an harp for Moab,
And mine inward parts for Kir-haresh.

12 And it shall come to pass, when it is seen
That Moab is weary on the high place,
That he shall come to his sanctuary to pray;
But he shall not prevail.

13 This is the word that the LORD hath spoken concerning Moab since that time.

14 But now the LORD hath spoken, saying,
Within three years, as the years of an hireling,
And the glory of Moab shall be contemned,
With all that great multitude;
And the remnant shall be very small and feeble.

Here we have,

First. The sins with which Moab is charged, ver. 6. The prophet seems to check himself for going about to give good counsel to the Moabites, concluding they would not take the advice he gave them. He told them their duty, whether they would hear or whether they would forbear, but despairs of working any good upon them. He would have healed them, but they would not be healed. They that will not be counselled cannot be helped. Their sins were,

1. Pride. This is most insisted upon; for perhaps there are more precious souls ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever. The Moabites were notorious for this; "We have heard" on both ears "of the pride of Moab;" it is what all their neighbours cry out shame upon them for. "He is very proud;" the body of the nation is so, forgetting the baseness of their original, and the brand of infamy fastened upon them by that law of God which forbade a Moabite to "enter into the congregation of the Lord for ever," Deu. xxiii. 3. We have heard of "his haughtiness and his pride." It is not the rash and rigid censure of one or two concerning them, but it is the character all that know them will give of them. They are a proud people, and therefore they will not take good counsel when it is given them; they think themselves too wise to be advised, therefore they will not take example by Hezekiah to do justly and love mercy; they scorn to make him their pattern, for they think themselves able to teach him; they are proud, and therefore will not be subject to God himself, nor regard the warnings he gives them; "The wicked in the pride of his countenance will not seek after God;" they are proud, and therefore will not entertain and protect God's outcasts, they scorn to have any thing to do with them. But this is not all.

2. We have heard of his wrath too, for those that are very proud are commonly very passionate; particularly his wrath against the people of God, whom therefore he will rather persecute than protect.

3. It is with his lies that he gains the gratification of his pride and his passion; but "his lies shall not be so;" he shall not compass his proud and angry projects, as he hoped he should. Some read it, 'His haughtiness, his pride, and his wrath, are greater than his strength.' We know if we should lie at his mercy, we should find no mercy with him, but he has not power equal to his malice; his pride draws down ruin upon him, for it is the preface to destruction; and he hath not strength to ward it off.

Secondly. The sorrows with which Moab is threatened; ver. 7, "Therefore shall Moab howl for Moab;" all the inhabitants shall bitterly lament the ruin of their country, they shall complain one to another, every one shall howl in despair, and not one shall either see any cause or have any heart to encourage his friend. Observe,

1. The causes of this sorrow. 1st. The destruction of their cities; "For the foundations of Kir-hareseth shall ye mourn;" that great and strong city, which had held out against a mighty force, 2 Kin. iii. 25, should now be levelled with the ground, either burnt or broken down, and its foundations stricken, bruised, and broken, so the word signifies; they shall howl when they see their splendid cities turned into ruinous heaps. 2nd. The desolation of their country. Moab was famous for its fields and vineyards, but those shall all be laid waste by the invading army, ver. 8—10. See, First. What a fruitful, pleasant country they had, as the garden of the Lord, Gen. xiii. 10. It was planted with choice and noble vines, with principal plants, which reached even to Jazer, a city in the tribe of Gad; the luxuriant branches of their vines wandered, and wound themselves along the ranges on which they were spread, even "through the wilderness" of Moab; there were vineyards there; nay, they were "stretched out," and went even to the sea, the Dead sea; the best grapes grew in their hedgerows. Secondly. How merry and pleasant they had been in it. Many a time they had shouted for their summer fruits, and for their harvest, as the country people sometimes do with us, when they have cut down all their corn. They had had joy and gladness in their fields and vineyards, singing and shouting at the treading of their grapes; nothing is said of their praising God for their abundance, and giving him the glory of it. If they had made it the matter of their thanksgiving, they might still have had it the matter of their rejoicing; but they making it the food and fuel of their lusts, see, Thirdly. How they should be stripped of all. The fields shall languish; all the fruits of them being carried away, or trodden down, they cannot now enrich their owners as they have done, and therefore languish. The soldiers, called here "the lords of the heathen," shall break down all the plants, though they were principal plants, the choicest that could be got. Now the shouting for the enjoyment of the summer fruits is fallen, and is turned into howling for the loss of them. The joy of harvest is ceased, there is no more singing, no more shouting for the treading out of wine; they have not what they have had to rejoice in, nor have they a disposition to rejoice, the ruin of their country has marred their mirth. Note, 1*st.* Those that are most addicted to mirth and pleasure God can easily change their note, can soon turn their laughter into mourning, and their joy into heaviness. 2*nd.* Joy in God is, upon this account, far better than the joy of harvest, that is what we cannot be robbed of, Ps. iv. 6, 7. Destroy the vines and the fig-trees, and you make all the mirth of a carnal heart to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. But a gracious soul can rejoice in the Lord as the God of its salvation, even then when the fig-tree doth not blossom, and there is no fruit in the vine, Hab. iii. 17, 18. In God, therefore, let us always rejoice with a holy triumph, and in other things let us always rejoice with a holy trembling; rejoice as though we rejoiced not.

1. The concurrence of the prophet with them in this sorrow. I will with weeping bewail Jazer, and the vine of Sibmah, and look with a compassionate concern upon the desolations of such a pleasant country. "I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon," and mingle them with thy tears. Nay, ver. 11, it appears to be an inward grief, "My bowels shall sound like a harp for Moab;" it should make such an impression upon him, that he should feel an inward trembling, like that of the strings of a harp when it is played upon. It well becomes God's prophets to acquaint themselves with grief; the great Prophet did so. The afflictions of the world, as well as those of the church, should be afflictions to us: see ch. xv. 5.

Thirdly. In the close of the chapter we have,

1. The insufficiency of the gods of Moab, the false gods, to help them, ver. 12. Moab shall be soon weary of the high places; he shall spend his spirits and strength in vain, in praying to his idols, they cannot help him, and he shall be convinced that they cannot. It is seen that it is to no purpose to expect any relief from the high places on earth, it must come from above the hills. Men are generally so stupid that they will not believe, till they are made to see, the vanity of idols, and of all creature confidences, nor will come off from them, till they are made weary of them. But when he is weary of his high places, he will not go, as he should, to God's sanctuary; but to his sanctuary, that is, to the temple of Chemosh, the principal idol of Moab, so it is generally understood; and he shall pray there to as little purpose, and as little to his own ease and satisfaction, as he did in his high places; for whatever honours idolaters do to their idols, they do not thereby make them at all the better able to help them. Whether they are the dii majorum gentium,—'gods of the higher order,' or minorum,—'of the lower order,' they are alike the creatures of men's fancy, and the work of men's hands. Perhaps it may be meant of their coming to God's sanctuary. When they found they could have no succours from their own high places, some of them would come to the temple of God at Jerusalem, to pray there, but in vain; he will justly send them back to "the gods whom they have served," Jud. x. 14.

2. The sufficiency of the God of Israel, the only true God, to make good what he had spoken against them. 1st. The thing itself was long since determined; ver. 13, "This is the word," this is the thing, "that the Lord hath spoken concerning Moab, since that time" that he began to be so proud, and insolent, and abusive to God's people. The country was long ago doomed to ruin; this was enough to give an assurance of it, that it "is the word which the Lord hath spoken;" and, as he will never unsay what he hath spoken, so all the power of hell and earth cannot gainsay it, or obstruct the execution of it. 2nd. Now it was made known when it should be done. The time was before fixed in the counsel of God, but now it was revealed; "The Lord hath spoken," that it shall be "within three years," ver. 14. It is not for us to know, or covet to know, the times and the seasons, any farther than God has thought fit to make them known, and so far we may and must take notice of them. See how God makes known his mind by degrees; the light of Divine revelation shone more and more, and so doth the light of Divine grace in the heart. Observe, First. The sentence passed upon Moab; "The glory of Moab shall be contemned," that is, it shall be contemptible, when all those things they have gloried in shall come to nothing. Such is the glory of this world, so fading and uncertain, admired awhile, but soon slighted. Let that therefore which will soon be contemptible in the eyes of others, be always contemptible in our eyes, in comparison with the far more exceeding weight of glory. It was the glory of Moab that their country was very populous, and their forces courageous; but where is her glory, when all that great multitude is in a manner swept away, some by one judgment and some by another, and the little remnant that is left shall be very small and feeble, not able to bear up under their own griefs, much less to make head against their enemy's insults? Let not therefore the strong glory in their strength, nor the many in their numbers. Secondly. The time fixed for the execution of this sentence; "Within three years as the years of an hireling;" that is, at the three years' end exactly; for a servant that is hired for a certain term keeps count to a day. Let Moab know that her ruin is very near, and prepare accordingly. Fair warning is given, and with it space to repent, which, if they had improved as Nineveh did, we have reason to think the judgments threatened had been prevented.

xviii. 1, 2. Another difficult passage. For "shadowing with wings" most modern scholars put "of rustling wings," the noise of wings being intended. Some, however, think that tziltzal is the name of an insect, "the winged tziltzal," and others keep to the ordinary version. "The sea," in verse 2, may be the Red Sea, or even the river Nile. "Vessels of bulrushes" are boats of papyrus. The words for "scattered and peeled" are explained "tall and swift" by Fürst, but there are various other explanations. For "meted out and trodden down," Fürst renders "of mighty power and treading down." For "have spoiled" several critics translate "divide." Barnes renders the phrase, "is washed away by rivers."

xviii. 7. The present or gift which shall be brought to the Lord is a people in the first place, and "from a people" in the second; hence two peoples have been thought to be referred to.

xix. 1. The idols of Egypt were innumerable, but they have all perished.

CHAPTER XVII.

Syria and Ephraim were confederate against Judah, ch. vii. 1, 2; and they being so closely linked together in their counsels, this chapter, though it be entitled "the burthen of Damascus," which was the head city of Syria, reads the doom of Israel too. I. The destruction of the strong cities, both of Syria and Israel, is here foretold, ver. 1—5; and again, ver. 9—11. II. In the midst of judgment mercy is remembered to Israel, and a gracious promise made, that a remnant should be preserved from the calamities, and should get good by them, ver. 6—8. III. The overthrow of the Assyrian army before Jerusalem is pointed at, ver. 12—14. In order of time this chapter should be placed next after ch. ix.; for the destruction of Damascus here foretold happened in the reign of Ahaz, 2 Kin. xvi. 8.

1 THE burden of Damascus.
Behold, Damascus is taken away from being a city,
And it shall be a ruinous heap.
2 The cities of Aroer are forsaken:
They shall be for flocks,
Which shall lie down, and none shall make them afraid.
3 The fortress also shall cease from Ephraim, [Syria:
And the kingdom from Damascus, and the remnant of
They shall be as the glory of the children of Israel,
Saith the LORD of hosts.
4 And in that day it shall come to pass, that the glory of Jacob shall be made thin,
And the fatness of his flesh shall wax lean.
5 And it shall be as when the harvestman gathereth the corn,
And reapeth the ears with his arm; [Rephaim.
And it shall be as he that gathereth ears in the valley of

We have here "the burden of Damascus." The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, The burthen of the cup of the curse, to drink to Damascus in;' and the ten tribes being in alliance, they must expect to pledge Damascus in this cup of trembling that is to go round.

First. Damascus itself, the head city of Syria, must be destroyed; the houses it is likely will be burnt, at least the walls, and gates, and fortifications demolished, and the inhabitants carried away captive, so that for the present it is "taken away from being a city," and is reduced not only to a village but to a "ruinous heap," ver. 1. Such desolating work as this doth sin make with cities.

Secondly. The country towns are abandoned by their inhabitants, frightened or forced away by the invaders. The cities of Aroer (a province of Syria so called) are forsaken, ver. 12; the conquered dare not dwell in them, and the conquerors have no occasion for them, nor did they seize them for want, but wantonness, so that the places which should be for men to live in are for flocks to lie down in, which they may do, and none will disturb or dislodge them. Stately houses are converted into sheepcotes. It is strange that great conquerors should pride themselves in being common enemies to mankind. But, how unrighteous soever they are, God is righteous in causing these cities to spew out their inhabitants, who by their wickedness had made themselves vile. It is better that flocks should lie down there than that they should harbour such as are in open rebellion against God and virtue.

Thirdly. The strongholds of Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes, will be brought to ruin; "The fortress shall cease from Ephraim," (ver. 3,) that in Samaria, and all the rest. They had joined with Syria in invading Judah very unnaturally, and now they that had been partakers in sin should be made partakers in ruin, and justly. When "the fortress shall cease from Ephraim," by which Israel will be weakened, the kingdom will cease from Damascus, by which Syria will be ruined. The Syrians were the ringleaders in that confederacy against Judah, and therefore they are pushed first and foremost; and, because they boasted of their alliance with Israel, now Israel is weakened they are upbraided with those boasts; "the remnant of Syria shall be as the glory of the children of Israel." Those few that remain of the Syrians shall be in as mean and despicable a condition as the children of Israel are, and the glory of Israel shall be no relief or reputation to them. Sinful confederacies will be no strength, no stay, to the confederates, when God's judgments come upon them.

See here what the glory of Jacob is when God contends with him, and what little reason Syria will have to be proud of resembling the glory of Jacob.

1. It is wasted like a man in a consumption, ver. 4. The glory of Jacob was their numbers, that they were as the sand of the sea for multitude; but this glory shall be made thin, when many are cut off, and few left. Then the "fatness of their flesh," which was their pride and security, "shall wax lean," and the body of the people shall become a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones. Israel died of a lingering disease; the kingdom of the ten tribes wasted gradually; God was to them as a moth, Hos. v. 12. Such is all the glory of this world: it soon withers, and is made thin; but there is a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory designed for the spiritual seed of Jacob, which is not subject to any such decay,—fatness of God's house, which will not wax lean.

2. It is all gathered and carried away by the Assyrian army, as the corn is carried out of the field by the husbandman, ver. 5. The corn is the glory of the fields, Ps. lxv. 13; but when it is reaped and gone where is the glory? The people had by their sins made themselves ripe for ruin, and their glory was as quickly, as easily, as justly, and irresistibly cut down and taken away as the corn is out of the field by the husbandman. God's judgments are compared to the thrusting in of the sickle, when the harvest is ripe, Rev. xiv. 15. And the victorious army, like the careful husbandman in the valley of Rephaim, where the corn was extraordinary, would not, if they could help it, leave an ear behind, would lose nothing that they could lay their hands on.

6 Yet gleaning grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive tree,
Two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough,
Four or five in the outmost fruitful branches thereof,
Saith the LORD God of Israel.
7 At that day shall a man look to his Maker,
And his eyes shall have respect to the Holy One of Israel.
8 And he shall not look to the altars, the work of his hands,
Neither shall respect that which his fingers have made,
Either the groves, or the images.

Mercy is here reserved in a parenthesis, in the midst of judgment, for a remnant that should escape the common ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes. Though the Assyrians took all the care they could that none should slip out of their net, yet the meek of the earth were hid in the day of the Lord's anger, and had their lives given them for a prey, and made comfortable to them by their retirement to the land of Judah, where they had the liberty of God's courts.

First. They shall be but a small remnant, a very few, which shall be marked for preservation; ver. 6, "Gleaning grapes shall be left in it." The body of the people were carried into captivity, but here and there one was left behind, perhaps one of two in a bed, when the other was taken, Lu. xvii. 34. The most desolating judgments in this world are short of the last judgment, which shall be universal, and which none shall escape. In times of the greatest calamity some are kept safe, as in times of the greatest degeneracy some are kept pure. But the fewness of those that escape supposeth the captivity of the far greatest part. Those that are left are but like the poor remains of an olive-tree, when it has been carefully shaken by the owner; if there be "two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough," (out of the reach of them that shook it,) that is all. Such is the remnant according to the election of grace, very few in comparison with the multitudes that walk on in the broad way.

Secondly. They shall be a sanctified remnant, ver. 7, 8; these few that are preserved are such as, in the prospect of the judgment approaching, had repented of their sins and reformed their lives, and therefore were snatched thus as brands out of the burning; or such as being escaped, and becoming refugees in strange countries, were awakened, partly by a sense of the distinguishing mercy of their deliverance, and partly by the distresses they were still in, to return to God. 1. They shall look up to their Creator, shall inquire, "Where is God my Maker, who giveth songs in the night?" in such a night of affliction as this? Job xxxv. 10, 11; shall acknowledge his hand in all the events concerning them, merciful and afflictive, and shall submit to his hand. They shall give him the glory due to his name, and be suitably affected with his providences. They shall expect relief and succour from him, and depend upon him to help them; their "eyes shall have respect" to him, "as the eye of a servant to the hand of his master," Ps. cxxiii. 2. Observe, It is our duty at all times to have respect to God, to have our eyes ever towards him, both as our Maker, the author of our being and the God of nature, and as the Holy One of Israel, a God in covenant with us, and the God of grace; particularly when we are in affliction, our eyes must be towards the Lord, to "pluck our feet out of the net," Ps. xxv. 15. To bring us to this is the design of his providence, as he is our Maker, and the work of his grace, as he is the Holy One of Israel. 2. They shall look off from their idols, the creatures of their own fancy; shall no longer worship them, and seek to them, and expect relief from them; for God will be alone regarded, or he doth not look upon himself as at all regarded. He that looks to his Maker must not "look to the altars, the work of his hands," but disown them, and cast them off; must not retain the least "respect for that which his fingers have made," but break it to pieces, though it were his own workmanship, "the groves and the images." The word signifies images made in honour of the sun, and by which he was worshipped, the most ancient and most plausible idolatry, Deu. iv. 19; Job xxxi. 26. We have reason to account those happy afflictions which part between us and our sins, and by sensible convictions of the vanity of the world, that great idol, cool our affections to it, and lower our expectations from it.

9 In that day shall his strong cities be as a forsaken bough,
And an uppermost branch,
Which they left because of the children of Israel:
And there shall be desolation.
10 Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation,
And hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength,
Therefore shalt thou plant pleasant plants,
And shalt set it with strange slips:
11 In the day shalt thou make thy plant to grow,
And in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish:
But the harvest shall be a heap in the day of grief
And of desperate sorrow.

Here the prophet returns to foretell the woful desolations that should be made in the land of Israel by the army of the Assyrians.

First. That the cities should be deserted; even the strong cities, which should have protected the country, shall not be able to protect themselves. They shall "be as a forsaken bough, and an uppermost branch," of an old tree, which is gone to decay, forsaken of its leaves, and appears on the top of the tree bare, and dry, and dead. So shall their strong cities look when the inhabitants have deserted them, and the victorious army of the enemy pillaged and defaced them, ver. 9; they shall be as the cities (so it may be supplied) which the Canaanites left, the old inhabitants of the land, "because of the children of Israel," when God brought them in with a high hand to take possession of that good land, cities which they builded not. As the Canaanites then fled before Israel, so Israel should now fly before the Assyrians. And herein the word of God was fulfilled, that if they committed the same abominations the land should "spew them out, as it spewed out the nations that were before them," Lev. xviii. 28; and that, as while they had God on their side, "one of them chased a thousand," so when they had made him their enemy "a thousand" of them should "flee at the rebuke of one," so that in the cities should be desolation, according to the threatenings in the law, Lev. xxvi. 31; Deu. xxviii. 52.

Secondly. That the country should be laid waste, ver. 10, 11. Observe here,

1. The sin that had provoked God to bring so great a destruction upon that pleasant land. It was "for the iniquity of them that dwelt therein." It is "because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation," and all the great salvations he hath wrought for thee; hast forgotten thy dependence upon him, and obligations to him; and "hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength," not only who is himself a strong rock, but has been thy strength many a time, or thou hadst been sunk and broken long since. Note, The God of our salvation is the rock

xix. 3. "Idols," i.e., consulted as oracles. "Charmers," i.e., soothsayers. By "them that have familiar spirits" necromancers are meant; "wizards," perhaps magicians.

xix. 5—7. All this refers to the failure of the inundation of the Nile, the consequences of which are described. For "they shall turn the rivers far away" we may render, "the rivers shall dry up." "Brooks of defence" should be "branches of the Nile," or "canals of Egypt." By "paper reeds" we should understand "vegetation."

xix. 9. The word for "networks" means fine white linen or cotton.

xix. 10. This rendering must be corrected: "and her pillars (or foundations) shall be broken down; all workers for hire shall be depressed in soul."

xix. 11. The sense of the words, "how say ye unto Pharaoh," &c., is, "How can each one of you say of himself to Pharaoh, I am the son of the wise?" &c.

of our strength; and our forgetfulness and unmindfulness of him is at the bottom of all sin; therefore we have "perverted our way, because we have forgotten the Lord our God," and so we undo ourselves.

2. The destruction itself, aggravated by the great care they took to improve their land, and make it yet more pleasant. 1st. Look upon it at the time of the seedness, and it was all like a garden and a vineyard. That pleasant land was replenished with "pleasant plants," the choicest of its own growth: nay, so nice and curious were the inhabitants that, not content with them, they sent to all the neighbouring countries for "strange slips," the more valuable for being strange, uncommon, far-fetched, and dear-bought, though perhaps they had of their own not inferior to them. This was an instance of their pride and vanity, and that ruining error, their affectation to be like the nations. Wheat, and honey, and oil were their staple commodities, Eze. xxvii. 17; but not content with these, they must have flowers and greens, with strange names, imported from other nations; and a great deal of care and pains must be taken by hot-beds to make these plants to grow; the soil must be forced, and they must be covered with glasses to shelter them, and early in the morning the gardeners must be up to "make the seed to flourish," that it may excel those of their neighbours. The ornaments of nature are not to be altogether slighted; but it is a folly to be over fond of them, and to bestow more time and cost and pains about them than they deserve, as many do. But here this instance seems to be put in general for their great industry in cultivating their ground, and their expectations from it accordingly; they doubt not but their plants will grow and flourish. But, 2nd. Look upon the same ground at the time of harvest, and it is all like a wilderness, a dismal, melancholy place, even to the spectators, much more to the owners; for "the harvest shall be a heap," all in confusion, "in the day of grief, and of desperate sorrow." The harvest used to be a time of joy, of singing and shouting, ch. xvi. 10, but this "harvest the hungry eateth up," Job v. 5, which makes it a day of grief, and the more, because the plants were pleasant and costly, ver. 10, and the expectations proportionably raised. The harvest had sometimes been a day of grief, if the crop were thin and the weather unseasonable; and yet in that case there was hopes the next would be better, but this shall be "desperate sorrow," for they shall see not only this year's products carried off, but the property of the ground altered, and their conquerors lords of it. The margin reads it, 'The harvest shall be removed' (into the enemy's country or camp, Deu. xxviii. 33,) 'in the day of inheritance,' (when thou thoughtest to inherit it,) 'and there shall be deadly sorrow.' This is a good reason why we should not lay up our treasure in these things which we may so quickly be despoiled of, but in that good part which shall never be taken away from us.

12 Woe to the multitude of many people,
Which make a noise like the noise of the seas;
And to the rushing of nations,
That make a rushing like the rushing of mighty waters!
13 The nations shall rush like the rushing of many waters:
But God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee far off,
And shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind,
And like a rolling thing before the whirlwind.
14 And behold at eveningtide trouble;
And before the morning he is not.
This is the portion of them that spoil us,
And the lot of them that rob us.

These verses read the doom of those that spoil and rob the people of God. If the Syrians and Israelites invade and plunder Judah,—if the Assyrian army take God's people captive, and lay their country waste,—let them know that ruin will be their lot and portion. They are here brought in,

First. Triumphing over the people of God. They rely upon their numbers; the Assyrian army was made up out of divers nations; it is the multitude of many people, ver. 12, by which weight they hope to carry the cause. They are very noisy, like the noise or rout of the seas; they talk big, hector and threaten, to frighten God's people from resisting them, and all their allies from sending in to their aid. Sennacherib and Rabshakeh, in their speeches and letters, made a mighty noise to strike a terror upon Hezekiah and his people; the nations that followed them made a rushing like the rushing of many waters, and those mighty ones, that threaten to bear down all before them, and carry away every thing that stands in their way. "The floods have lifted up their voice, have lifted up their waves." Such is the tumult of the people, and the heathen, when they rage, Ps. ii. 1; xciii. 3.

Secondly. Triumphed over by the judgments of God. They think to carry their point by dint of noise; but woe to them, ver. 12, for he shall rebuke them: that is God shall,—one whom they little think of, have no regard to, stand in no awe of; he shall give them a check with an invisible hand, and then "they shall flee far off." Sennacherib and Rabshakeh, and the remains of their forces, they shall run away in a fright, and "shall be chased" by their own terrors, as the "chaff of the mountains," which stand bleak before the wind, and "like a rolling thing before the whirlwind," like thistle-down, so the margin. They make themselves "as chaff before the wind," Ps. xxxv. 5, and then the angel of the Lord, as it follows there, the same angel that slew many of them, shall chase the rest. God will "make them like a wheel," or rolling thing, and then persecute them with his tempest, and make them afraid with his storm, Ps. lxxxiii. 13, 15. Note, God can dispirit the enemies of his church, when they are most courageous and confident, and dissipate them when they seem most closely consolidated. This shall be done suddenly, ver. 14. At evening-tide they are very troublesome, and threaten trouble to the people of God; but "before the morning he is not;" at sleeping time they are "cast into a deep sleep," Ps. lxxvi. 5, 6. It was in the night that the angel routed the Assyrian army; God can in a moment break the power of his church's enemies, then when it appears most formidable; and this is written for the encouragement of the people of God in all ages, when they find themselves an unequal match for their enemies; for "this is the portion of them that spoil us," they shall themselves be spoiled. God will plead his church's cause, and they that meddle do it to their own hurt.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Whatever country it is that is meant here by "the land shadowing with wings," here is a woe denounced against it, for God hath, upon his people's account, a quarrel with it. I. They threaten God's people, ver. 1, 2. II. All the neighbours are hereupon called to take notice what will be the issue, ver. 3. III. Though God seemed unconcerned in the distress of his people for a time, he will at length appear against their enemies, and will remarkably cut them off, ver. 4—6. IV. This shall redound very much to the glory of God, ver. 7.

WOE to the land shadowing with wings,
Which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia:

ETHIOPIAN EMBLEM OF GOD.

2 That sendeth ambassadors by the sea,
Even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters,
Saying, Go, ye swift messengers, to a nation scattered and peeled,
To a people terrible from their beginning hitherto;
A nation meted out and trodden down,
Whose land the rivers have spoiled!
3 All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth,
See ye, when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains;
And when he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye.
4 For so the LORD said unto me, I will take my rest,
And I will consider in my dwelling place
Like a clear heat upon herbs,
And like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest
5 For afore the harvest, when the bud is perfect,
And the sour grape is ripening in the flower,
He shall both cut off the sprigs with pruning hooks,
And take away and cut down the branches.
6 They shall be left together unto the fowls of the mountains,
And to the beasts of the earth:
And the fowls shall summer upon them,
And all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them.
7 In that time shall the present be brought unto the LORD of hosts
Of a people scattered and peeled,
And from a people terrible from their beginning hitherto;
A nation meted out and trodden under foot,
Whose land the rivers have spoiled,
To the place of the name of the LORD of hosts, the mount Zion

Interpreters are very much at a loss where to find this land that lies beyond the rivers of Cush; some take it to be Egypt, a maritime country, and full of rivers, and which courted Israel to depend upon them, but proved broken reeds. But against this it is strongly objected, that the next chapter is distinguished from this by the title of "the burthen of Egypt." Others take it to be Ethiopia, and read it, Which lies near, or about the river of Ethiopia; not that in Africa, which lay south of Egypt, but that which we call Arabia, which lay east of Canaan, which Tirhakah was now king of. He thought to protect the Jews as it were under the shadow of his wings, by giving a powerful diversion to the king of Assyria, when he made a descent upon his country, at the time that he was attacking Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xix. 9; but though by his ambassadors he bade defiance to the king of Assyria, and encouraged the Jews to depend upon him, God, by the prophet, slights him, will not go forth with him; he may take his own course, but God will take another course to protect Jerusalem, while he suffers the attempt of Tirhakah to miscarry, and his Arabian army to be ruined; for the Assyrian army shall become a present, or sacrifice, to the Lord of hosts, and to the place of his name, by the hand of an angel, not by the hand of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, ver. 7. This is a very probable exposition of this chapter. But from a hint of Dr. Lightfoot's, in his Harmony of the Old Testament, I incline to understand this chapter as a prophecy against Assyria; and so a continuation of the prophecy in the last three verses of the foregoing chapter, with which therefore this should be joined. That was against the army of the Assyrians which rushed in upon Judah, this against the land of Assyria itself, which lay beyond the rivers of Arabia, that is, the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, which bordered on Arabia Deserta. And, in calling it "the land shadowing with wings," he seems to refer to what he himself had said of it, ch. viii. 8, that "the stretching out of his wings shall fill thy land, O Immanuel." And the prophet might perhaps describe the Assyrians by such dark expressions, not naming them, for the same reason that St. Paul in his prophecy speaks of the Roman empire by a periphrasis; "He who now letteth," 2 Thes. ii. 7. Here is,

First. The attempt made by this land (whatever it is) upon "a nation scattered and peeled," ver. 2; swift messengers are sent by water to proclaim war against them, as a nation marked by Providence, and meted out to be trodden under foot. Whether this be the Ethiopians waging war with the Assyrians, or the Assyrians with Judah, it teacheth us, 1. That a people that hath been "terrible from their beginning," has made a figure, and borne a mighty sway, may yet become "scattered and peeled," and may be spoiled even by its own rivers, that should enrich both the husbandman and the merchant. Nations that have been formidable, and have kept all in awe about them, may by a concurrence of accidents become despicable, and an easy prey to their insulting neighbours. 2. Princes and states that are ambitious of enlarging their territories will still have some pretence or other to quarrel with those whose countries they have a mind to. It is a nation that has been terrible, and therefore we must be revenged on it. It is now "a nation scattered and peeled, xix. 13. Zoan is the Tanis of the Greeks, and Noph is Moph, or Memphis; the modern Menouf is the same name, if not the same place.

xix. 17. The land of Judah might be a terror to Egypt, when occupied by such an invading army as that of Sennacherib.

xix. 18 There would be cities in Egypt where Hebrew was spoken, devoted to God, namely, the city of Heres; but what Heres means is altogether uncertain. Our version gives "destruction," others have "deliverance," "happiness," "the sun," "the lion" (Heliopolis and Leontopolis), "righteousness," "protection," &c. To decide in such a case is impossible, and we would leave the word untranslated, "the city of Heres." Dr. Delitzsch would leave the whole phrase untranslated, "Ir ha-Heres;" or, after a various reading, "Ir ha-cheres," which might be "The city of the sun," or Heliopolis.

xix. 19. Josephus says that the Jewish priest, Onias, obtained leave of Ptolemy to erect a temple in Egypt, about twenty-two and a half meted out and trodden down;" and therefore it will be an easy prey for us. Perhaps it is not brought so low as they represent it. God's people are trampled on as "a nation scattered and peeled;" but whoever think to swallow them up may find them still as terrible as they have been from their beginning. They are cast down, but not deserted, not destroyed.

Secondly. The alarm sounded to the nations about, by which they are summoned to take notice of what God is about to do, ver. 3. The Ethiopians and Assyrians have their counsels and designs, which they have laid deep, and promise themselves much from, and in prosecution of them send their ambassadors and messengers from place to place; but let us now inquire what the great God saith to all this. 1. He "lifts up an ensign upon the mountains," and blows a trumpet, by which he proclaims war against the enemies of his church, and calls in all her friends and well-wishers into her service. He gives notice that he is about to do some great work as Lord of hosts. 2. All the world is bidden to take notice of it. All the dwellers on earth must see the ensign, and hear the trumpet, must observe the motions of the Divine providence, and attend the directions of the Divine will. Let all list under God's banner, and be on his side, and hearken to the trumpet of his word, which gives not an uncertain sound.

Thirdly. The assurance God gives to his prophet, by him to be given to his people, that though he might seem for a time to sit by as an unconcerned spectator, yet he would certainly and seasonably appear for the comfort of his people, and the confusion of his and their enemies; ver. 4, "So the Lord said unto me." Men will have their saying, but God also will have his; and, as we may be sure his word shall stand, so he often whispers it in the ears of his servants the prophets. When he saith, "I will take my rest," it is not as if he were weary of governing the world, or as if he either needed or desired to retire from it, and repose himself; but it intimates, 1st. That the great God hath a perfect, undisturbed enjoyment of himself in the midst of all the tosses and changes of this world; the Lord sits even upon the floods unshaken, the Eternal Mind is always easy. 2nd. That sometimes he may seem to his people as if he took not wonted notice of what is done in this lower world; they are tempted to think he is "as one asleep," or "as one astonied," Ps. xliv. 23; Jer. xiv. 8; but even then he knows very well what men do, and what he himself will do.

1. He will take care of his people, and be a shelter to them. He will regard his dwelling-place; his eye and his heart are and shall be upon it for good continually. Zion is his rest for ever, where he will dwell. and he will look after it, so some read it; will lift up the light of his countenance upon it, will consider over it what is to be done, and will be sure to do all for the best. He will adapt the comforts and refreshments he provides for them to the exigencies of their case; and they will therefore be acceptable because seasonable. 1st. Like a 'clear heat after rain,'(so the margin,) which is very reviving and pleasant, and makes the herbs to flourish. 2nd. "Like a dew and a cloud in the heat of harvest," which are very welcome—the dew to the ground, and the cloud to the labourers. Note, There is that in God which is a shelter and refreshment to his people in all weathers, and arms them against the inconveniences of every change. Is the weather cool? there is that in his favour that will warm them. Is it hot? there is that in his favour that will cool them. Great men have their winter house and their summer house, Am. iii. 15; but they that are at home with God have both in him.

2. He will reckon with his and their enemies, ver. 5, 6. When the Assyrian army promiseth itself a plentiful harvest in the taking of Jerusalem, and plundering that city—when the bud of that project is perfect, before the harvest is gathered in—while "the sour grape" of their enmity to Hezekiah and his people "is ripening in the flower," and the design is just ready to be put in execution—God shall destroy that army as easily as the husbandman "cuts off the sprigs" of the vine with pruning-hooks; or, because the grape is sour, and good for nothing, and will not be cured, "takes away, and cuts down the branches." This seems to point at the overthrow of the Assyrian army by a destroying angel; when the dead bodies of the soldiers were scattered like the branches and sprigs of a wild vine, which the husbandman has cut to pieces; and "they shall be left to the fowls of the mountains and the beasts of the earth," to prey upon, both winter and summer; for as God's people are protected all seasons of the year, both in cold and heat, ver. 4, so their enemies are at all seasons exposed. Birds and beasts shall prey both summer and winter upon them till they are quite ruined.

Fourthly. The tribute of praise which should be brought to God from all this; ver. 7, "In that time," when this shall be accomplished, "shall the present be brought unto the Lord of hosts." 1. Some understand this of the conversion of the Ethopians to the faith of Christ in the latter days, of which we have the specimen and beginning in Philip's baptizing the Ethiopian eunuch, Acts viii. 27. They that were "a people scattered and peeled, meted out, and trodden down," ver. 2, shall be a present to the Lord; and, though they seem useless and worthless, they shall be an acceptable present to him who judges of men by the sincerity of their faith and love, not by the pomp and prosperity of their outward condition; therefore, the Gospel was "ministered to the Gentiles," that "the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable," Rom. xv. 16. It is prophesied, Ps. lxviii. 31, that "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God." 2. Others understand it of the spoil of Sennacherib's army, out of which, as usual, presents were brought to the Lord of hosts, Num. xxxi. 50. It was the present of "a people scattered and peeled," that is, 1st. It was won from the Assyrians, who were now themselves reduced to such a condition as they scornfully described Judah to be in, ver. 2. They that unjustly trampled upon others, shall themselves be justly trampled upon. 2nd. It was offered by the people of God, who were in disdain called a people scattered and peeled. God will put honour upon his people, though men put contempt upon them. Lastly, Observe, The present that is brought to the Lord of hosts must be brought "to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts." What is offered to God must be offered in the way that he hath appointed; we must be sure to attend him, and expect him to meet us there where he records his name.

CHAPTER XIX.

As Assyria was a breaking rod to Judah, with which it was smitten, so Egypt was a broken reed, with which it was cheated, and therefore God had a quarrel with them both. We have before read the doom of the Assyrians, now here we have the burthen of Egypt, a prophecy concerning that nation: I. That it should be greatly weakened and brought low, and should be as contemptible among the nations as now it was considerable, rendered so by a complication of judgments which God would bring upon them, ver. 1—17. II. That at length God's holy religion should be brought into Egypt, and set up there, in part by the Jews that should fly thither for refuge, but more fully by the preachers of the Gospel of Christ, through whose ministry churches should be planted in Egypt in the days of the Messiah, ver. 18—25, which would abundantly balance all the calamities here threatened.

THE burden of Egypt.
Behold, the LORD rideth upon a swift cloud,
And shall come into Egypt:
And the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence,
And the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it.
2 And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians:
And they shall fight every one against his brother,
And every one against his neighbour;
City against city,
And kingdom against kingdom.
3 And the spirit of Egypt shall fail in the midst thereof;
And I will destroy the counsel thereof:
And they shall seek to the idols, and to the charmers,
And to them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizards.
4 And the Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord;
And a fierce king shall rule over them,
Saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts.
5 And the waters shall fail from the sea,
And the river shall be wasted and dried up.
6 And they shall turn the rivers far away;
And the brooks of defence shall be emptied and dried up:
The reeds and flags shall wither. brooks,
7 The paper reeds by the brooks, by the mouth of the
And every thing sown by the brooks,
Shall wither, be driven away, and be no more
8 The fishers also shall mourn,
And all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament,
And they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish.
9 Moreover they that work in fine flax,
And they that weave networks, shall be confounded.
10 And they shall be broken in the purposes thereof,
All that make sluices and ponds for fish.
11 Surely the princes of Zoan are fools, brutish.
The counsel of the wise counsellors of Pharaoh is become

The son of ancient kings?

EGYPTIAN IDOLS.

miles from Memphis. He adds that this was predicted by Isaiah 600 years before (Wars, vii. 10, 3; Antiq., xiii. 3, 1—3). The prophecy, however, includes Egyptians among the worshippers of the Lord; and it is said that before the coming of Christ this was the case.

xix. 22—25. Idolatry disappeared in both Egypt and Assyria, and Christianity was widely received by both. After the wane of the churches Mahometanism, the worship of one God, still prevailed, placing Egypt, Assyria, and the Jew almost on the same level.

xx. 1. Professor Rawlinson thinks Tartan is not a proper name, but an official designation, a general or commander-in-chief. It may be a proper name. Sargon is mentioned only here in Scripture, but much information has been obtained respecting him from the great Assyrian inscription of Khorsabad. Ashdod is mentioned because it stood on the Assyrian line of march to Egypt, the subjugation of which was constantly desired.

xx. 3. "Naked" here and in verse 2, like our word "stripped,"

12 Where are they? where are thy wise men?
And let them tell thee now, and let them know
What the LORD of hosts hath purposed upon Egypt.
13 The princes of Zoan are become fools,
The princes of Noph are deceived;
They have also seduced Egypt, even they that are the stay of the tribes thereof. [thereof:
14 The LORD hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst
And they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof,
As a drunken man staggereth in his vomit.
15 Neither shall there be any work for Egypt,
Which the head or tail, branch or rush, may do
16 In that day shall Egypt be like unto women:
And it shall be afraid and fear
Because of the shaking of the hand of the LORD of hosts,
Which he shaketh over it.
17 And the land of Judah shall be a terror unto Egypt, Every one that maketh mention thereof shall be afraid in himself,
Because of the counsel of the LORD of hosts,
Which he hath determined against it.

Though the land of Egypt had of old been a house of bondage to the people of God, where they had been ruled with rigour; yet among the unbelieving Jews there still remained much of the humour of their fathers, who said, "Let us make us a captain, and return into Egypt." Upon all occasions they trusted to Egypt for help, ch. xxx. 2; and thither they fled in disobedience to God's express command, when things were brought to the last extremity in their own country, Jer. xliii. 7; Rabshakeh upbraided Hezekiah with this, ch. xxxvi. 6. While they kept up an alliance with Egypt, and it was a powerful ally, they stood not in awe of the judgments of God; for against them they depended upon Egypt to protect them. Nor did they depend upon the power of God when at any time they were in distress, but Egypt was their confidence. To prevent all this mischief, Egypt must be mortified, and many ways God here tells them he will take to do it.

First. The gods of Egypt shall appear to them to be what they always really were, utterly unable to help them; ver. 1, "The Lord rides upon a cloud, a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt." As a judge goes in state to the bench to try and condemn the malefactors, or as a general takes the field with his troops to crush the rebels, so shall God come into Egypt with his judgments; and when he comes he will certainly overcome. In all this "burden of Egypt," here is no mention of any foreign enemy invading them; but God himself will come against them, and raise up the causes of their destruction from among themselves. He comes upon a cloud, above the reach of opposition or resistance; he comes apace, upon a swift cloud, for their judgment lingereth not when the time is come. He "rides upon the wings of the wind," and, far excelling the greatest pomp and splendour of earthly princes, he "makes the clouds his chariots," Ps. xviii. 9; civ. 3. When he comes, the "idols of Egypt shall be moved," shall be removed at his presence, and perhaps be made to fall as Dagon did before the ark. Isis, Osiris, and Apis, those celebrated idols of Egypt, being found unable to relieve their worshippers, shall be disowned and rejected by them. Idolatry had got deeper rooted in Egypt than in any land besides, even the most absurd idolatries; and yet now the idols shall be moved, and they shall be ashamed of them. When the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, he "executed judgments upon the gods of the Egyptians," Num. xxxiii. 4; no marvel then if, when he comes, they begin to tremble. The Egyptians shall "seek to the idols" when they are at their wit's end, and consult the charmers and wizards, ver. 3; but all in vain, they see their ruin hastening on them notwithstanding.

Secondly. The militia of Egypt, that had been famed for their valour, shall be quite dispirited and disheartened. No kingdom in the world was ever in a better method of keeping up a standing army, than the Egyptians were; but now their heroes, that used to be celebrated for courage, shall be posted for cowards; "The heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it, like wax before the fire," ver. 1; "the spirit of Egypt shall fail," ver. 3. They shall have no inclination, no resolution to stand up in defence of their country, their liberty and property; but shall tamely and ingloriously yield all to the invader and oppressor. The Egyptians shall be like women, ver. 16; they shall be frightened and put into confusion by the least alarm. Even those that dwelt in the heart of the country, in the midst of it, farthest from danger, yet will be as full of frights as those that are situate on the frontiers. Let not the bold and brave be proud or secure, for God can easily cut off the spirit of princes, Ps. lxxviii. 72; and take away their hearts, Job xii. 24.

Thirdly. The Egyptians shall be embroiled in endless dissensions and quarrels among themselves. There shall be no occasion to bring a foreign force upon them to destroy them, they shall destroy one another; ver. 2, "I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians." As these divisions and animosities are their sin, God is not the author of them. They come from men's lusts; but God as a judge permits them for their punishment, and by their destroying differences corrects them for their sinful agreements. Instead of helping one another, and acting each in his place for the common good, "they shall fight one against his brother," and neighbour, whom he ought to love as himself; "city against city, and kingdom against kingdom." Egypt was then divided into twelve provinces or dynasties; but Psammetichus, the governor of one of them, by setting them at variance with one another, at length made himself master of them all. A kingdom thus divided against itself would soon be brought to desolation; En quo discordia cives perduxit miseros!—'Oh the wretchedness brought upon a people by their disagreements among themselves!" It is brought to this by a perverse spirit, a spirit of contradiction which the Lord would mingle, as an intoxicating draught made up of several ingredients, for the Egyptians, ver. 14. One party shall be for a thing for no other reason but because the other is against it. That is a perverse spirit, which, if it mingle with the public counsels, tends directly to the ruin of the public interests.

Fourthly. Their politics shall be all blasted, and turned into foolishness. When God will destroy the nation, he "will destroy the counsel thereof," ver. 3; by taking away wisdom from the statesmen, Job xii. 20, or setting them one against another, as Hushai and Ahithophel, or by his providence breaking their measures even then when they seemed well laid, so that the "princes of Zoan are fools." They make fools of one another, every one betrays his own folly; and Divine providence makes fools of them all, ver. 11. Pharaoh had his wise counsellors, Egypt was famous for such, but their counsel is all become brutish, they have lost their forecast; one would think they were become idiots, and were bereaved of common sense. Let no man glory then in his own wisdom, nor depend upon that, or upon the wisdom of those about him; for he that gives understanding can when he pleaseth take it away; and from them is it most likely to be taken away that boast of their policy, as Pharaoh's counsellors here did, that, to recommend themselves to places of public trust, boasted of their great understanding: "I am the son of the wise," of the God of wisdom, of wisdom itself, saith one; my father was an eminent privy counsellor, of note in his day for wisdom; or of the antiquity and dignity of their families: I am, saith another, "the son of ancient kings." The nobles of Egypt bragged much of their antiquity, producing fabulous records of their succession for above ten thousand years. This humour prevailed much among them about this time, as appears by Herodotus, their common boast being, that Egypt was some thousands of years more ancient than any other nation. But "where are thy wise men?" ver. 12; let them now shew their wisdom, by foreseeing what ruin is coming upon their nation, and preventing it if they can. Let them with all their skill "know what the Lord of hosts hath purposed upon Egypt," and arm themselves accordingly; nay, so far are they from doing this, that they themselves are in effect contriving the ruin of Egypt, and hastening it on, ver. 23. The princes of Noph are not only deceived themselves, but "they have seduced Egypt," by putting their kings upon arbitrary proceedings, by which both themselves and their people were soon undone. The governors of Egypt, that are "the stay and corner stones of the tribes thereof," are themselves undermining it. It is sad with a people, when those that undertake for their safety are helping forward their destruction, and the physicians of the state are her worst disease; when the things that belong to the public peace are so far hid from the eyes of those that are intrusted with the public counsels, that in every thing they blunder, and take wrong measures. So here, ver. 14, "They have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof." Every step they took was a false step; they always mistook either the end or the means, and their counsels were all unsteady and uncertain, like the staggerings and stammerings of a drunken man in his vomit, that knows not what he saith, nor where he goes. See what reason we have to pray for our privy counsellors and ministers of state, who are the great supports and blessings of the state if God give them a spirit of wisdom, but quite contrary if he hides their heart from understanding.

Fifthly. The rod of government shall be turned into the serpent of tyranny and oppression; ver. 4, "The Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord;" not a foreigner, but one of their own, one that shall rule over them by an hereditary right; but shall be a fierce king, and rule them with rigour: either the twelve tyrants that succeeded Sethon, or rather Psammetichus, that recovered the monarchy again; for he speaks of one cruel lord. Now the barbarous usage which the Egyptian taskmasters gave to God's Israel long ago was remembered against them, and they were paid in their own coin by another Pharaoh. It is sad with a people when the powers that should be for edification are for destruction, and they are ruined by those by whom they should be ruled, when such as this is the "manner of the king," as it is described in terrorem,—'in order to impress alarm,' 1 Sam. viii. 11.

Sixthly. Egypt was famous for its river Nile, which was its wealth, and strength, and beauty, and was idolized by them. Now it is here threatened, that "the waters shall fail from the sea," and the river shall be "wasted and dried up," ver. 5. Nature shall not herein favour them as she hath done. Egypt was never watered with the rain of heaven, Zec. xiv. 18; and therefore the fruitfulness of their country depended wholly upon the overflowing of their river; if that therefore be dried up their fruitful land would soon be turned into barrenness, and their harvests cease; "Every thing sown by the brooks will wither" of course, will be "driven away, and be no more," ver. 7. If the "paper reeds by the brooks," at the very mouth of them wither, much more the corn that lies at a greater distance, but derives its moisture from them. Yet this is not all; the drying up of their rivers is the destruction, 1. Of their fortifications, for they are "brooks of defence," ver. 6; making the country difficult of access to an enemy. Deep rivers are the strongest lines, and most hardly forced. Pharaoh is said to be a "great dragon lying in the midst of his rivers," and guarded by them, bidding defiance to all about him, Eze. xxix. 3; but these "shall be emptied and dried up," not by an enemy, as Sennacherib with "the sole of his foot dried up mighty rivers," ch xxxvii. 25, and as Cyrus, who took Babylon by drawing Euphrates into many streams; but by the providence of God, which sometimes "turns water springs into dry ground,' Ps. cvii. 33. 2. It is the destruction of their fish, which in Egypt was much of their food; witness that base reflection which the children of Israel made, Num. xi. 5, "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely." The drying up of the rivers will kill the fish, Ps. cv. 29; and that will ruin those who make it their business, 1st. To catch fish, whether by angling or nets, ver. 8; they shall lament and languish, for their trade is at an end. There is nothing which the children of this world do more heartily lament than the loss of that which they used to get money by; Ploratur lachrymis amissa pecunia veris,—'Those are genuine tears which are shed over lost money.' 2nd. To keep fish, that it may be ready when it is called for. There were those that "made sluices and ponds for fishes," ver. 10; but they shall be "broken in the purposes thereof;" their business will fail either for want of water to fill their ponds or for want of fish to replenish their waters. God can find ways to deprive a country even of that which is its staple commodity. The Egyptians themselves may remember the fish they have formerly eaten freely, but now cannot have for money; and that which aggravates the loss of these advantages by the river is, that it is their own doing; ver. 6, "They shall turn the rivers far away." Their kings and great men, to gratify their own fancy, will drain water from the main river to their own houses and grounds at a distance, preferring their private convenience before the public, and so by degrees the force of the river is sensibly weakened. Thus many do themselves a greater prejudice at last than they think of, First. Who pretend to be wiser than nature, and to do better for themselves than nature has done. Secondly. Who consult their own particular interest more than the common good. Such may gratify themselves, but sure they can never satisfy themselves, who, to serve a turn, contribute to a public calamity which they themselves at long run cannot avoid sharing in. Herodotus tells us, that Pharaoh Necho, (who reigned not long after this,) projecting to cut a free passage by water from Nilus into the Red sea, employed a vast number of men to make a ditch, or channel, for that purpose; in which attempt he impaired the river, lost one hundred and twenty thousand of his people, and yet left the work unaccomplished.

Seventhly. Egypt was famous for the linen manufacture; but that trade shall be ruined. Solomon's merchants traded with Egypt for linen yarn, 1 Kin. x. 28. Their country produced the best flax, and the best hands to work it; but they that work in fine flax shall be confounded, ver. 9, either for want of flax to work on, or for want of a demand for that which they means partially undressed. The prophet's conduct was symbolical, as explained in verse 4, but whether it continued for three literal years, or only for three days, as types of years, is a disputed question.

xx. 4. In the Assyrian inscription already referred to, the Egyptians are said to have been conquered by Sargon. The victory over Ashdod is also recorded.

xx. 6. The words rendered "this isle" are applicable to the coastland of the Philistines and Phœnicians. Those who had relied on the Ethiopians and Egyptians would have no longer any to protect them against the Assyrians.

xxi. 1, 2. Why Babylon is called "the desert of the sea," or, rather, "wilderness of the sea," is much disputed. But as the word yam is used of a great river as well as of a sea, it may here refer to the Euphrates, the country right and left of which has been a wilderness for many ages. The "whirlwinds in the south" should be "hurricanes in the Negeb," which is on the south-west border of have worked, or opportunity to export it. The decay of trade weakens and wastes a nation, and by degrees brings it to ruin. The trade of Egypt must needs sink, for, ver. 15, "There shall not be any work for Egypt" to be employed in; and where there is nothing to be done, there is nothing to be got. There shall be a universal stop put to business, "no work which either head or tail, branch or rush, may do;" nothing for high or low, weak or strong, to do; no hire, Zec. viii. 20. Note, The flourishing of a kingdom depends much upon the industry of the people; and then things are likely to do well when all hands are at work: when the head and top-branch doth not disdain to labour, and the labour of the tail and rush is not disdained. But when the learned professions are unemployed, the topping merchants have no stocks, and the handicraft tradesmen nothing to do, poverty comes upon a people as one that travelleth, and as an armed man.

Eighthly. A general consternation shall seize the Egyptians. They shall be afraid and fear, ver. 16, which will be both an evidence of a universal decay and a means and presage of utter ruin. Two things will put them into this fright: 1. What they hear from the land of Judah; "that shall be a terror to Egypt," ver. 17. When they hear of the desolations made in Judah by the army of Sennacherib, considering both the near neighbourhood and the strict alliance that was between them and Judah, they will conclude it must be their turn next to become a prey to that victorious army. When their neighbour's house was on fire, they could not but see their own in danger; and therefore every one of the Egyptians that maketh mention of Judah, "shall be afraid in himself," expecting the bitter cup shortly to be put into their hands. 2. What they see in their own land. They shall fear, ver. 16, "because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts;" and, ver. 17, "because of the counsel of the Lord of hosts;" which, from the shaking of his hand, they shall conclude he has determined against Egypt as well as Judah. For if judgment begin at the house of God, where will it end? "If this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" See here, 1st. How easily God can make those a terror to themselves that have been not only secure, but a terror to all about them. It is but shaking his hand over them, or laying it upon some of their neighbours, and the stoutest hearts tremble presently. 2nd. How well it becomes us to fear before God when he doth but shake his hand over us, and to humble ourselves under his mighty hand when it doth but threaten us, especially when we see his counsel determined against us; for who can change his counsel?

18 In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt
Speak the language of Canaan,
And swear to the LORD of hosts;
One shall be called, The city of destruction.
19 In that day shall there be an altar to the LORD
In the midst of the land of Egypt,
And a pillar at the border thereof to the LORD
20 And it shall be for a sign and for a witness Unto the LORD of hosts in the land of Egypt:
For they shall cry unto the LORD because of the oppressors,
And he shall send them a saviour, and a great one,
And he shall deliver them
21 And the LORD shall be known to Egypt,
And the Egyptians shall know the LORD in that day,
And shall do sacrifice and oblation;
Yea, they shall vow a vow unto the LORD, and perform it.
22 And the LORD shall smite Egypt: he shall smite and
And they shall return even to the LORD, [heal it:
And he shall be intreated of them, and shall heal them.
23 In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to
And the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, [Assyria,
And the Egyptian into Assyria,
And the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians.
24 In that day shall Israel be the third
With Egypt and with Assyria,
Even a blessing in the midst of the land:
25 Whom the LORD of hosts shall bless, saying,
Blessed be Egypt my people,
And Assyria the work of my hands,
And Israel mine inheritance.

Out of the thick and threatening clouds of the foregoing prophecy, here the sun of comfort breaks forth, and it is the Sun of righteousness. Still God has mercy in store for Egypt, and he will shew it, not so much by reviving their trade, and replenishing their river again, but by bringing the true religion among them, calling them to, and accepting them in, the worship of the one only living and true God; and these blessings of grace were much more valuable than all the blessings of nature, wherewith Egypt was enriched. We know not of any event in which this prophecy can be thought to have its full accomplishment, short of the conversion of Egypt to the faith of Christ, by the preaching (as it is supposed) of Mark the evangelist, and the founding of many Christian churches there, which flourished for many ages. Many prophecies of this book point to the days of the Messiah, and why not this? And it is no unusual thing to speak of gospel graces and ordinances in the language of the Old Testament institutions. And in these prophecies those words, "in that day," perhaps have not always a reference to what goes immediately before, but have a peculiar significancy, pointing at that day which had been so long fixed, and so often spoken of, when "the dayspring from on high" should visit this dark world. Yet, it is not improbable, which some conjecture, that this prophecy was in part fulfilled when those Jews who fled from their own country to take shelter in Egypt, when Sennacherib invaded their land, brought their religion along with them, and, being awakened to great seriousness by the troubles they were in, made an open and zealous profession of it there, and were instrumental to bring many of the Egyptians to embrace it; which was an earnest and specimen of the more plentiful harvest of souls that should be gathered in to God by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ. Josephus indeed tells us that Onias the son of Onias the high priest, living an outlaw at Alexandria in Egypt, obtained leave of Ptolemy Philometer, then king, and Cleopatra his queen, to build a temple to the God of Israel, like that at Jerusalem, at Bubastis in Egypt; and pretended a warrant for doing it from this prophecy in Isaiah, that there shall be an altar to the Lord in the land of Egypt; and the service of God continued in it about three hundred and thirty-three years, when it was shut up by Paulinus, soon after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: see Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 6, and De Bell. Judaic. l. vii. c. 30. But that temple was all along looked upon by the pious Jews as so great an irregularity, and an affront to the temple at Jerusalem, that we cannot suppose this prophecy to be fulfilled in it. Observe how the conversion of Egypt is here described

First. They shall "speak the language of Canaan," the holy language, the Scripture language; they shall not only understand it, but use it, ver. 18; they shall introduce that language among them, and converse freely with the people of God, and not, as they used to do, by an interpreter, Gen. xlii. 23. Note, Converting grace, by changing the heart, changeth the language; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks. Five cities in Egypt shall speak this language; so many Jews shall come to reside in Egypt, and they shall so multiply there that they shall soon replenish five cities; one of which shall be the city of Heres, or of the sun, Heliopolis, where the sun was worshipped,—the most infamous of all the cities of Egypt for idolatry,—even there shall be a wonderful reformation, they shall "speak the language of Canaan." Or it may be taken thus, as we render it, that for every five cities that shall embrace religion, there shall be one—a sixth part of the cities of Egypt—that shall reject it, and that shall be called a city of destruction, because it refuseth the methods of salvation.

Secondly. They shall "swear to the Lord of hosts;" not only swear by him, giving him the honour of appealing to him, as all nations did to the gods they worshipped; but they shall, by a solemn oath and vow, devote themselves to his honour, and bind themselves to his service; they shall swear to cleave to him with purpose of heart, and shall worship him, not occasionally but constantly. They shall swear allegiance to him as their king, to Christ, to whom all judgment is committed.

Thirdly. They shall set up the public worship of God in their land; ver. 19, "There shall be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt," an altar on which "they shall do sacrifice and oblation," ver. 21; therefore, it must be understood spiritually. Christ, the great altar, which sanctifies every gift, shall be owned there, and the gospel sacrifices of prayer and praise shall be offered up; for, by the law of Moses, there was to be no other altar for sacrifice but that at Jerusalem. In Christ Jesus all distinction of nations is taken away, and a spiritual altar, a gospel church in the midst of the land of Egypt is as acceptable to God as one in the midst of the land of Israel; and spiritual sacrifices of faith and love, and a contrite heart, please the Lord better than an ox or bullock.

Fourthly. There shall be a face of religion upon the nation, and an open profession made of it, discernible to all that come among them. Not only in the heart of the country, but even in the borders of it, there shall be a pillar, or pillars, inscribed to Jehovah, to his honour, as before there had been such pillars set up in honour of false gods. As soon as a stranger entered upon the borders of Egypt he might soon perceive what God they worshipped. Those that serve God must not be ashamed to own him, but be forward to do any thing that may be "for a sign, and for a witness, to the Lord of hosts;" that even in the land of Egypt he had some faithful worshippers, who boasted of their relation to him, and made his name their strong tower, or bulwark on their borders, with which their coasts were fortified against all assailants.

Fifthly. Being in distress they shall seek to God, and he shall be found of them; and this "shall be a sign and a witness" for the Lord of hosts, that he is a God hearing prayer to all flesh that come to him, ver. 20: see Ps. lxv. 2. When they cry to God by reason of their oppressors, the cruel lords that shall rule over them, ver. 4, "he shall be entreated of them," ver. 22; whereas, he had told his people Israel, who had made it their own choice to have such a king, that they should "cry to him by reason of their king," and he "would not hear them," 1 Sam. viii. 18.

Sixthly. They shall have an interest in the great Redeemer. When they were under the oppression of cruel lords, perhaps God sometimes raised them up mighty deliverers, as he did for Israel in the days of the judges; and by them, though he had smitten the land, he healed it again; and upon their return to God in a way of duty he returned to them in a way of mercy, and repaired the breaches of their tottering state; for repenting Egyptians shall find the same favour with God that repenting Ninevites did. But all these deliverances wrought for them, as those for Israel, were but figures of gospel salvation. Doubtless Jesus Christ is "the Saviour, and the great One" here spoken of, whom God will send the glad tidings of to the Egyptians, and by whom he will "deliver them out of the hands of their enemies," that they may "serve him without fear," Lu. i. 74, 75. Jesus Christ delivered the Gentile nations from the service of dumb idols, and did himself both purchase and preach liberty to the captives.

Seventhly. The knowledge of God shall prevail among them, ver. 21. 1. They shall have the means of knowledge; for many ages in Judah only was God known, for there only were the lively oracles found; but now the Lord, and his name and will, shall be known to Egypt. Perhaps this may in part refer to the translation of the Old Testament out of Hebrew into Greek by the Seventy, which was done at Alexandria in Egypt, by the command of Ptolemy king of Egypt; and it was the first time that the Scriptures were translated into any other language. By the help of this—the Grecian monarchy having introduced their language into that country—the Lord was known to Egypt, and a happy omen and means it was of his being farther known, ver. 1. 2. They shall have grace to improve those means. It is promised not only that "the Lord shall be known to Egypt," but that "the Egyptians shall know the Lord;" they shall receive and entertain the light granted to them, and shall submit themselves to the power of it. The Lord is known to our nation, and yet I fear there are many of our nation that do not know the Lord. But the promise of the new covenant is, that "all shall know the Lord, from the least even to the greatest;" which promise is sure to all the seed. The effect of this knowledge of God is, that "they shall vow a vow to the Lord, and perform it:" for those do not know God aright who either are not willing to oblige themselves to the Lord or do not make good those obligations.

Eighthly. They shall come into the communion of saints; being joined to the Lord, they shall be added to the church, and be incorporated with all the saints. 1. All enmities shall be slain. Mortal feuds there had been between Egypt and Assyria; they often made war upon one another, but now there shall be a highway between Egypt and Assyria, ver. 23, a happy correspondence settle between the two nations; they shall trade with one another, and every thing that passeth between them shall be friendly. "The Egyptians shall serve Judea. The "terrible" or frightful "land" is the region inhabited by the Medes, the invaders of Babylon. Elam is the Greek Elymais, here identified with Persia.

xxi. 5. This is spoken to Babylon, and seems not to be without irony: "Feast yourselves, but your feasting shall be cut short by the call to arms, and the onslaught of a victorious foe." Dan. v. supplies the true commentary.

xxi 7. The word for "chariot" rather signifies riders, viz., horsemen two abreast, men on asses, and men on camels. Asses and camels were sometimes used in war, and we are told that in the army of Xerxes the Caramanians rode upon asses and the Arabs on camels.

xxi. 8. "A lion:" better as in the margin, "As a lion."

xxi. 9. This may be very differently rendered in the first part of it: "And, behold, there came a cavalcade of men, pairs of horsemen, and it lifted up its voice and said, Fallen, fallen is Babylon," &c. The ancient Syriac favours this turn of the passage, though translating that is, worship the true God "with the Assyrians," and therefore the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria. Note, It becomes those who have communion with the same God, through the same Mediator, to keep up an amicable correspondence with one another. And the consideration of our meeting at the same throne of grace, and our serving with each other in the same business of religion, should put an end to all heats and animosities, and knit our hearts to each other in holy love.

2. The Gentile nations shall not only unite with each other in the gospel fold, under Christ the great Shepherd, but they shall all be united with the Jews. When Egypt and Assyria become partners in serving God, Israel shall make a third with them, ver. 24; they shall become a three-fold cord, not easily broken. The ceremonial law, which had long been the partition-wall between Jews and Gentiles, shall be taken down, and then they shall become "one sheep-fold under one Shepherd." Thus twisted, they shall be "a blessing in the midst of the land whom the Lord of hosts shall bless," ver. 24, 25. 1st. Israel shall be a blessing to them all, because of them "as concerning the flesh Christ came;" and they were the natural branches of the good olive, to whom did originally pertain its root and fatness, and the Gentiles were but "graffed in among them," Rom. xi. 17. Israel lay between Egypt and Assyria, and was a blessing to them both by bringing them to meet in that word of the Lord which went forth from Jerusalem, and that church which was first set up in the land of Israel. Qui conveniunt in aliquo tertio, inter se conveniunt,—'Those who meet in a third meet in each other.' Israel is that third in whom Egypt and Assyria agree, and is therefore a blessing; for those are real and great blessings to their generation who are instrumental to unite those that have been at variance. 2nd. They shall all be a blessing to the world. So the Christian church is, made up of Jews and Gentiles; it is the beauty, riches, and support of the world. 3rd. They shall all be blessed of the Lord. First. They shall all be owned by him as his. Though Egypt was formerly a house of bondage to the people of God, and Assyria an unjust invader of them, yet all this shall now be forgiven and forgotten, and they shall be as welcome to God as Israel. They are all alike his people, whom he takes under his protection; they are formed by him, for they are the work of his hands, not only as a people, but as his; they are formed for him, for they are his inheritance, precious in his eyes, and dear to him, and from whom he hath his rent of honour out of this lower world. Secondly. They shall be owned together by him as jointly his—his in concert; they shall all share in one and the same blessing. Note, Those that are united in the love and blessing of God ought, for that reason, to be united to each other in charity.

CHAPTER XX.

This chapter is a prediction of the carrying away of multitudes, both of the Egyptians and the Ethiopians, into captivity, by the king of Assyria. Here is, I. The sign by which this was foretold, which was the prophet's going for some time barefoot, and almost naked, like a poor captive, ver. 1, 2. II. The explication of that sign, with application to Egypt and Ethiopia, ver. 3—5. III. The good use which the people of God should make of this, which is, never to trust in an arm of flesh, because thus it will deceive them, ver. 6.

IN the year that Tartan came unto Ashdod, (when Sargon the king of Assyria sent him,) and fought against Ashdod, and took it; 2 At the same time spake the LORD by Isaiah the son of Amoz, saying,

Go and loose the sackcloth from off thy loins,
And put off thy shoe from thy foot.
And he did so, walking naked and barefoot.

3 And the LORD said,
Like as my servant Isaiah hath walked Naked and barefoot three years
For a sign and wonder upon Egypt and upon Ethiopia;
4 So shall the king of Assyria lead away
The Egyptians prisoners, and the Ethiopians captives,
Young and old, naked and barefoot, [Egypt.
Even with their buttocks uncovered, to the shame of 5 And they shall be afraid
And ashamed of Ethiopia their expectation,
And of Egypt their glory.
6 And the inhabitant of this isle shall say in that day,
Behold, such is our expectation,
Whither we flee for help
To be delivered from the king of Assyria:
And how shall we escape?

God here as King of nations brings a sore calamity upon Egypt and Ethiopia, but as King of saints brings good to his people out of it. Observe,

First. The date of this prophecy. It was in the year that Ashdod, a strong city of the Philistines, (but which some think was lately recovered from them by Hezekiah, when he smote the Philistines even unto Gaza, 2 Kin. xviii. 8,) was besieged and taken by an army of the Assyrians. It is uncertain what year of Hezekiah that was, but the event was so remarkable that they who lived then could by that token fix the time to a year. He that was now king of Assyria is called Sargon, which some take to be the same with Sennacherib; others think he was his immediate predecessor, and succeeded Shalmanezer. Tartan that was general, or commander-in-chief in this expedition, was one of Sennacherib's officers, sent by him to bid defiance to Hezekiah, in concurrence with Rabshakeh, 2 Kin. xviii. 17.

Secondly. The making of Isaiah a sign by his unusual dress when he walked abroad. He had been a sign to his own people of the melancholy times that were come and coming upon them, by the sackcloth which for some time he had worn, of which he had a gown made which he girt about him. Some think he put himself into that habit of a mourner upon occasion of the captivity of the ten tribes. Others think sackcloth was what he commonly wore, as a prophet, to shew himself mortified to the world, and that he might learn to endure hardness: soft clothing better becomes those that attend in king's palaces, Mat. xi. 8, than those that go on God's errands. Elijah wore haircloth, 2 Kin. i. 8; and John Baptist, Mat. iii. 4; and those that pretended to be prophets supported their pretension by wearing rough garments, Zec. xiii. 4. But Isaiah hath orders given him to loose his sackcloth from his loins, not to exchange it for better clothing, but for none at all; that is, no upper garment, no mantle, cloak, or coat, but only that which was next to him, suppose his shirt, waistcoat, and drawers; and he must put off his shoes and go barefoot; so that, compared with others' dress, and what he himself usually wore, he might be said to go naked. This was a great hardship upon the prophet, it was a blemish to his reputation, and would expose him to contempt and ridicule; the boys in the street would hoot at him; and they who sought occasion against him would say, "The prophet is indeed a fool, and the spiritual man is mad," Hos. ix. 7. It might likewise be a prejudice to his health; he was in danger of catching a cold which might throw him into a fever, and cost him his life; but God bade him do it that he might give a proof of his obedience to God in a most difficult command, and so shame the disobedience of his people to the most easy and reasonable precepts. When we are in the way of our duty we must trust God both with our credit and with our safety. The hearts of people were strangely stupid, and would not be affected with what they heard only, but must be taught by signs, and therefore Isaiah must do this for their edification. If the dress was scandalous, yet the design was glorious, and what a prophet of the Lord needed not to be ashamed of.

Thirdly. The exposition of this sign, ver. 3, 4. It was intended to signify that the Egyptians and the Ethiopians should be led away captives by the king of Assyria, thus stripped, or in rags, and very shabby clothing, as Isaiah was. God calls him his servant Isaiah, because in this matter particularly he had approved himself God's willing, faithful, obedient servant; and for this very thing, which perhaps others laughed at him for, God gloried in him. "To obey is better than sacrifice;" pleaseth God, and praiseth him more, and shall be more praised by him. Isaiah is said to have walked naked and barefoot three years, whenever in that time he appeared as a prophet. But some refer the three years, not to the sign, but to the thing signified. "He hath walked naked and barefoot," there is a stop in the original. Suppose he did so once, that was enough to give occasion to all about him to inquire what was the meaning of his doing so. Or, as some think, he did it three days, a day for a year; and this for a three years' sign and wonder; that is, for a sign of that which shall be done three years hence, or which shall be three years in the doing. Three campaigns successively shall the Assyrian army make in spoiling the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and carrying them away captive in this barbarous manner, not only the soldiers taken in the field of battle, but the inhabitants young and old; and it being a very piteous sight, and such as must needs move compassion in those that had the least degree of tenderness left them, to see those who had gone all their days well dressed, now stripped and scarce having rags to cover their nakedness; that circumstance of their captivity is particularly taken notice of and foretold, the more to affect them to whom this prophecy was delivered. It is particularly said to be "to the shame of Egypt," ver. 4, because the Egyptians were a proud people; and therefore, when they did fall into disgrace, it was the more shameful to them; and the higher they had lifted up themselves the lower was their fall, both in their own eyes and in the eyes of others.

Fourthly. The use and application of this, ver. 5, 6.

1. All that had any dependence upon, or correspondence with, Egypt and Ethiopia, should now be ashamed of them, and afraid of having any thing to do with them. Those countries that were in danger of being overrun by the Assyrians expected that Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, with his numerous forces, should put a stop to the progress of their victorious arms, and be a barrier to his neighbours; and with yet more assurance they gloried that Egypt, a kingdom so famous for policy and prowess, would do their business, would oblige them to raise the siege of Ashdod, and retire with precipitation; but instead of this, by attempting to oppose him they do but expose themselves, and make their country a prey to him. Hereupon all about them are ashamed that ever they promised themselves any advantage by two such weak and cowardly nations, and more afraid now than ever they were of the growing greatness of the king of Assyria, before whom Egypt and Ethiopia proved but as briars and thorns put to stop a consuming fire, which do but make it burn the more strongly. Note, Those who make any creature their expectation and glory, and so put it in the place of God, will sooner or later be ashamed of it, and their disappointment in it will but increase their fear: see Eze. xix. 6, 7.

2. The Jews in particular should be convinced of their folly in resting upon such broken reeds, and should despair of any relief from them; ver. 6, "the inhabitants of this isle," the land of Judah, situated upon the sea, though not surrounded by it, of this country, so the margin; every one shall now have his eyes opened, and shall say, "Behold such is our expectation," so vain, so foolish, and this is that which it will come to; we have fled for help to the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and have hoped by them "to be delivered from the king of Assyria;" but, now they are broken thus, "how shall we escape," that are not able to bring such armies into the field as they did? Note, 1. Those that confide in creatures will be disappointed, and will be made ashamed of their confidence; for "vain is the help of man," and "in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills," or the height and "multitude of the mountains." 2. Disappointment in creature confidence, instead of driving us to despair, as here, "How shall we escape?" should drive us to God, for if we flee to him for help our expectation shall not be frustrated.

CHAPTER XXI.

In this chapter we have a prophecy of sad times coming, and heavy burthens, I. Upon Babylon, here called "the desert of the sea," that it should be destroyed by the Medes and Persians, with a terrible destruction, which yet God's people should have advantage by, ver. 1—10. II. Upon Dumah, or Idumæa, ver. 11, 12. III. Upon Arabia, or Kedar, the desolation of which country was very near, ver. 13—17. These, and other nations, which the princes and people of Israel had so much to do with, the prophets of Israel could not but have something to say to. Foreign affairs must be taken notice of as well as domestic ones, and news from abroad inquired after as well as news at home.

THE burden of the desert of the sea.
As whirlwinds in the south pass through;
So it cometh from the desert, from a terrible land.

differently: "And, behold, there came a man of the riders of horses, and he answered and said, Fallen, fallen is Babylon," &c.

xxi. 11. Dumah may signify "stillness," as descriptive of a region silent through lack of inhabitants. Usually, however, it is taken as a proper name of an Ishmaelite tribe. Seir was the mountainous country of Edom, south-east of Judea.

xxi. 13. For "upon Arabia" some put "in the evening," because the Hebrew form for Arabia is an unusual one. Other critics question the genuineness of the words, "The burden upon Arabia," because not found in certain manuscripts of the Greek version—an insufficient reason. The ancient versions have "in the evening" for "in Arabia;" but our translation is to be preferred, except that "wood" is better than "forest," because the reference is to ground covered with scrub and bushes, rather than with full-grown trees. The "caravans," or "companies of Dedanim," were named from Dedan, and led a roving, unsettled life.

Go up, O Elam: besiege, O Media;
All the sighing thereof have I made to cease
8 Therefore are my loins filled with pain:
Pangs have taken hold upon me, as the pangs of a woman that travaileth:

Fearfulness affrighted me: [me.

ANCIENT WATCH-TOWER.

6 For thus hath the Lord said unto me,
Go, set a watchman,
Let him declare what he seeth
7 And he saw a chariot with a couple of horsemen,
A chariot of asses, and a chariot of camels;
And he hearkened diligently with much heed:
8 And he cried, A lion: [daytime,
My lord, I stand continually upon the watchtower in the
And I am set in my ward whole nights:
9 And, behold, here cometh a chariot of men,
With a couple of horsemen.
And he answered and said,
Babylon is fallen, is fallen;
And all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground.
10 O my threshing, and the corn of my floor: [of Israel,
That which I have heard of the LORD of hosts, the God
Have I declared unto you.

We had one burthen of Babylon before, ch. xiii. 1; here we have another prediction of its fall, which God saw fit thus to possess his people with the belief of by line upon line, because Babylon sometimes pretended to be a friend to them, as ch. xxxix. 1, and God would hereby warn them not to trust to that friendship; and sometimes was really an enemy to them, and God would hereby warn them not to be afraid of that enmity. Babylon is marked for ruin, and all that believe God's prophets can through that glass see it tottering, see it tumbling, even then when with an eye of sense they saw it flourishing, and sitting as a queen. Babylon is here called "the desert," or plain "of the sea," for it was a flat country, and full of lakes or loughs (as they call them in Ireland) like little seas, and was abundantly watered with the many streams of the river Euphrates. Babylon did but now begin to be famous, Nineveh having outshined it while the monarchy was in the Assyrian hands; but in a little time it became the lady of kingdoms; and, before it arrived at that pitch of eminency which it was at in Nebuchadnezzar's time, God, by this prophet, plainly foretold its fall again and again, that his people might not be terrified at its rise, nor despair of relief in due time when they were its prisoners, Job v. 3; Ps. xxxvii. 35, 36. Some think it is here called a desert because, though it was now a populous city, it should in time be made a desert. And therefore the destruction of Babylon is so often prophesied of by this evangelical prophet, because it was typical of the destruction of the man of sin, the great enemy of the New Testament church, which is foretold in the Revelation in many expressions borrowed from these prophecies, which therefore must be consulted and collated by those who would understand the prophecy of that book. Here is,

First. The powerful irruption and descent which the Medes and Persians should make upon Babylon, ver. 1, 2. They will come "from the desert, from a terrible land." The northern parts of Media and Persia, where their soldiers were mostly bred, was waste and mountainous; terrible to strangers that were to pass through it, and producing soldiers that were very formidable. Elam, that is, Persia, is summoned to go up against Babylon, and, in conjunction with the forces of Media, to besiege it. When God hath work of this kind to do he will find, though it be in a desert, in a terrible land, proper instruments to be employed in it. These forces come as whirlwinds from the south, so suddenly, so strongly, and so terribly: such a mighty noise shall they make, and throw down every thing that stands in their way. As is usual in such a case, some deserters will go over to them, the treacherous dealers will deal treacherously. Historians tell us of Gadatas and Gobryas, two great officers of the king of Babylon, that went over to Cyrus, and, being well acquainted with all the avenues of the city, led a party directly to the palace, where Belshazzar was slain. Thus, with the help of the treacherous dealers, the spoiler is spoiled. Some read it thus, 'there shall be a deceiver of that deceiver,' namely, Babylon; 'and a spoiler of that spoiler.' Or, which comes all to one, 'the treacherous dealer' has found 'one that deals treacherously,' and 'the spoiler one that spoileth,' as it is expounded, ch. xxxiii. 4. The Persians shall pay the Babylonians in their own coin; they that by fraud and violence, cheating and plundering, by unrighteous wars and deceitful treaties, have made a prey of their neighbours, shall meet with their match, and by the same methods shall themselves be made a prey of.

Secondly. The different impressions made hereby upon those concerned in Babylon.

1. To the poor oppressed captives it would be welcome news; for they had been told long ago that Babylon's destroyer would be their deliverer; and therefore, when they hear that Elam and Media are coming up to besiege Babylon, all their sighing will be made to cease, they shall no longer mingle their tears with Euphrates' streams, but resume their harps, and smile when they remember Zion, which before they wept at the thought of. For "the sighing of the needy" the God of pity will arise in due time, Ps. xii. 5; he will break the yoke from off their neck, will remove the rod of the wicked from off their lot, and so make their sighing to cease.

2. To the proud oppressors it would be "a grievous vision," ver. 2; particularly to the king of Babylon for the time being; and it should seem that he is here brought in sadly lamenting his inevitable fate; ver. 3, 4, "Therefore are my loins filled with pain, pangs have taken hold upon me," &c., which was literally fulfilled in Belshazzar; for that very night in which his city was taken and himself slain, upon the sight of a hand writing mystic characters upon the wall, "his countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another," Dan. v. 6; and yet that was but the beginning of sorrows. Daniel's deciphering of the writing could not but increase his terror, and the alarm which immediately followed of the executioners at the door would be the completing of it. And those words, "The night of my pleasure hath he turned into fear to me," plainly refer to that aggravating circumstance of Belshazzar's fall, that he was slain on that night when he was in the height of his mirth and jollity, with his cups and concubines about him, and a thousand of his lords revelling with him; that night of his pleasure when he promised himself an undisturbed, unalloyed enjoyment of the most exquisite gratifications of sense, with a particular defiance of God and religion in the profanation of the temple vessels, that was the night that was turned into all this fear. Let this give an effectual check to vain mirth and sensual pleasures, and forbid us ever to lay the reins in the neck of them, that we know not what heaviness the mirth may end in, nor how soon laughter may be turned into mourning; but this we know, that for all these things God shall bring us into judgment. Let us therefore mix trembling always with our joys.

Thirdly. A representation of the posture in which Babylon should be found when the enemy should surprise it; all in festival gaiety; ver. 5, Prepare the table with all manner of dainties, set the guards, let them watch in the watch-tower, while we eat and drink securely and make merry; and if any alarm should be given the princes shall arise and anoint the shield, and be in a readiness to give the enemy a warm reception. Thus secure are they, and thus do they gird on the harness with as much joy as if they had put it off.

Fourthly. A description of the alarm which should be given to Babylon upon its being forced by Cyrus and Darius. The Lord in vision shewed the prophet the watchman set in his watch-tower near the palace, as is usual in times of danger. The king ordered those about him to post a sentinel in the most advantageous place for discovery, and according to the duty of a watchman "let him declare what he seeth," ver. 6. We read of watchmen thus set to receive intelligence in the story of David, 2 Sam. xviii. 24, and in the story of Jehu, 2 Kin. ix. 17. This watchman here discovered a chariot with a couple of horsemen attending it, in which we may suppose the commander-in-chief to ride; he then saw another chariot drawn by asses or mules, which were much in use among the Persians, and a chariot drawn by camels, which were likewise much in use among the Medes; so that, as Grotius thinks, these two chariots signify the two nations combined against Babylon; or, rather, these chariots come to bring tidings to the palace: compare Jer. li. 31, 32, "One post shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to shew the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end," while he is revelling at the other end, and knows nothing of the matter. This watchman, seeing these chariots at some distance, "hearkened diligently with much heed," to receive the first tidings; and, ver. 8, "he cried, A lion." This word coming out of a watchman's mouth no doubt gave them a certain sound, and everybody knew the meaning of it, though we do not know it now. It is likely it was intended to raise attention; he that has an ear to hear let him hear, as when a lion roars. Or, he cried as a lion, very loud and in good earnest, the occasion being very urgent. And what has he to say?

1. He professeth his constancy to the post assigned him; "My lord, I stand continually upon the watch-tower," and have never discovered any thing material till just now; all seemed safe and quiet. Some make it to be a complaint of the people of God that they had long expected the downfal of Babylon according to the prophecy, and it was not yet come; but withal a resolution to continue waiting, as Hab. ii. 1, "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower," to see what will be the issue of the present providences.

2. He gives notice of the discoveries he had made; ver. 9, "Here cometh a chariot of men with a couple of horsemen;" a vision representing the enemy's entry into the city with all their force, or the tidings brought to the royal palace of it.

Fifthly. A certain account is at length given of the overthrow of Babylon. He in the chariot answered and said, when he heard the watchman speak, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen;" or, God answered thus to the prophet inquiring concerning the issue of these affairs. It is now come to this, Babylon is surely and irrecoverably fallen; Babylon's business is done now; "all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground." Babylon was the mother of harlots; that is, of idolatry, which was one of the grounds of God's quarrel with her; but her idols shall now be so far from protecting her that some of them shall be broken down to the ground; and others of them that were worth carrying away should go into captivity, and be a burthen to the beasts that carried them, ch. xlvi. 1, 2.

Sixthly. Notice is given to the people of God who were then captives in Babylon, that this prophecy of the downfal of Babylon was particularly intended for their comfort and encouragement, and they might depend upon it that it should be accomplished in due season, ver. 10. Observe,

1. The title the prophet gives them in God's name, "O my threshing, and the corn of my floor." The prophet calls them his because they were his country-

xxi. 14. Tema is by some believed to be the same as Teman, but others tell us it is upon the road pursued by pilgrims between Damascus and Mecca. The old phrase "to prevent" merely means to meet, or wait for. The hospitality of the people of Tema to fugitives in want is indicated; the fugitives being those called "companies of Dedanim" in verse 13.

xxi. 16. Kedar is equivalent to Arabia in a former verse, and probably its overthrow was to be effected by the Assyrians.

xxii. 1. As Barnes and others have said, there can be no doubt that by "the valley of vision" Jerusalem is intended.

xxii. 3. The words for "they are bound by the archers" are variously rendered. Literally they are, "from the bow are they bound." This, some think, means are made prisoners without fighting, because captured in flight. Others think it means "are taken captive by the bow," or by archers. We omit other explanations, as we think these the best.

men, and such as he had a particular interest in and concern for; but he speaks it as from God, and directs his speech to those that were Israelites indeed, the faithful in the land. Note, 1st. The church is God's floor, in which the most valuable fruits and products of this earth are as it were gathered together and laid up. 2nd. True believers are the corn of God's floor. Hypocrites are but as the chaff and straw, which take up a deal of room, but are of small value, with which the wheat is now mixed, but from which it shall be shortly and for ever separated. 3rd. The corn of God's floor must expect to be threshed by afflictions and persecutions. God's Israel of old was so afflicted from her youth, often under the plougher's plough, Ps. cxxix. 3, and the thresher's flail. 4th. Even then God owns it for his threshing, it is his still; nay, the threshing of it is by his appointment and under his restraint and direction. The threshers could have no power against it but what is given them from above.

2. The assurance he gives them of the truth of what he had delivered to them, which therefore they might build their hopes upon; "That which I have heard of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel," that and nothing else, that and no fiction or fancy of my own, "have I declared unto you." Note, In all events concerning the church, both past, present, and to come, we must have an eye to God, both as the Lord of hosts and as the God of Israel, who hath power enough to do any thing for his church, and grace enough to do every thing that is for her good; and to the words of his prophets as what they received from the Lord. And as they dare not smother any thing which he has intrusted them to declare, so they dare not declare any thing as from him which he has not made known to them, 1 Cor. xi. 23.

11 The burden upon Dumah
He calleth to me out of Seir,
Watchman, what of the night?
Watchman, what of the night?
12 The watchman said,
The morning cometh, and also the night
If ye will enquire, enquire ye:
Return, come.

This prophecy concerning Dumah is very short, and withal dark and hard to be understood. Some think Dumah is a part of Arabia, and that the inhabitants descended from Dumah, the sixth son of Ishmael, as those of Kedar, ver. 16, 17, from Ishmael's second son, Gen. xxv. 13, 14. Others, because mount Seir is here mentioned, by Dumah understand Idumæa, the country of the Edomites. Some or other of Israel's neighbours are certainly meant, whose distress is foretold, not only for warning to them to prepare them for it, but for warning to Israel not to depend upon them, or any of the nations about them, for relief in a time of danger, but upon God only. We must see all creature confidences failing us, and feel them breaking under us, that we may not lay more weight upon them than they will bear. But though the explication of this prophecy be difficult, because we have no history in which we find the accomplishment of it, yet the application will be easy. We have here,

First. A question put by an Edomite to the watchman. Some one or other "calleth to me out of Seir," somebody that was more concerned for the public safety and welfare than the rest, who were generally careless and secure. As the man of Macedonia in a vision desired Paul to come over and help them, Acts xvi. 9, so this man of mount Seir in a vision desired the prophet to inform and instruct them. He calleth not many; it is well there are any, that all are not alike unconcerned about the things that belong to the public peace. Some out of Seir ask advice of God's prophets, and are willing to be taught, when many of God's Israel heed nothing. The question is serious, "What of the night?" it is put to a proper person, the watchman, whose office it is to answer such inquiries. He repeats the question, as one in care, as one in earnest, and desirous to have an answer. Note, 1. God's prophets and ministers are appointed to be watchmen, and we are to look upon them as such. They are as watchmen in the city in a time of peace, to see that all be safe; to knock at every door by personal inquiries: Is it locked? is the fire safe? To direct those that are at a loss, and check those that are disorderly, Cant. iii. 3, and v. 7. They are as watchmen in the camp in time of war, Eze. xxxiii. 7; they are to take notice of the motions of the enemy, and to give notice of them; to make discoveries, and then give warning; and in this they must deny themselves. 2. It is our duty to inquire of the watchmen, especially to ask again and again, "What of the night?" for watchmen wake when others sleep. 1st. What time of the night? After a long sleep in sin and security is it not time to rise, high time to awake out of sleep? Rom. xiii. 11. We have a great deal of work to do; a long journey to go; is it not time to be stirring? Watchman, what o'clock is it? After a long dark night is there any hopes of the day dawning? 2nd. What tidings of the night? What from the night? so some. What vision has the prophet had to night? we are ready to receive it. Or rather, what occurs to night? what weather is it? what news? We must expect an alarm, and never be secure; "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night." We must prepare to receive the alarm, and resolve to keep our ground, and then take the first hint of danger, and to our arms presently, to our spiritual weapons.

Secondly. The watchman's answer to this question. The watchman was neither asleep nor dumb; though it was a man of mount Seir that called to him, he was ready to give him an answer, "The morning comes." He answers, 1. By way of prediction. There comes first a morning of light, and peace, and opportunity; you will enjoy one day of comfort more, but afterwards comes a night of trouble and calamity. Note, In the course of God's providence it is usual that morning and night are counterchanged, and succeed each other. Is it night? yet the morning comes, and the dayspring knows his place, Ps. xxx. 5. Is it day? yet the night comes also; if there be a morning of youth and health, there will come a night of sickness and old age; if a morning of prosperity in the family, in the public, yet we must look for changes. But God usually gives a morning of opportunity before he sends a night of calamity; that his own people may be prepared for the storm and others left inexcusable. 2. By way of excitement; "If ye will inquire, inquire ye." Note, It is our wisdom to improve the present morning in preparation for the night that is coming after it. "Inquire, return, come;" be inquisitive, be penitent, be willing, and obedient. The manner of expression is very observable; for we are put to our choice what we will do, "If ye will inquire, inquire ye." If not, it is at your peril; you cannot say but you have a fair offer made you. We are also urged to be at a point; if ye will, say so, and do not stand pausing; what you will do, do quickly, for it is no time to trifle. Those that return and come to God will find they have a great deal of work to do, and but a little time to do it in, and therefore they had need to be busy.

13 The burden upon Arabia
In the forest in Arabia shall ye lodge,
O ye travelling companies of Dedanim.
14 The inhabitants of the land of Tema
Brought water to him that was thirsty,
They prevented with their bread him that fled.
15 For they fled from the swords,
From the drawn sword,
And from the bent bow,
And from the grievousness of war.
16 For thus hath the Lord said unto me,
Within a year, according to the years of an hireling,
And all the glory of Kedar shall fail:
17 And the residue of the number of archers, the mighty men of the children of Kedar, shall be diminished:
For the LORD God of Israel hath spoken it.

Arabia was a large country that lay eastward and southward of the land of Canaan; much of it was possessed by the posterity of Abraham. The Dedanim here mentioned, ver. 13, descended from Dedan, Abraham's son by Keturah; the inhabitants of Tema and Kedar descended from Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 3, 13, 15. The Arabians generally lived in tents, and kept cattle, were a hardy people, inured to labour. Probably the Jews depended upon them as a sort of a wall between them and the more warlike Eastern nations; and, therefore, to alarm them, they shall hear the burthen of Arabia, and see it sinking under its own burthen.

First. A destroying army shall be brought upon them; with a sword, with a "drawn sword," with a bow ready bent, and with all "the grievousness of war," ver. 15. It is probable the king of Assyria, in some of the marches of his formidable and victorious army, took Arabia in his way, and, meeting with little resistance, made an easy prey of them. The consideration of "the grievousness of war" should make us thankful for the blessings of peace.

Secondly. The poor country people will hereby be forced to flee for shelter wherever they can find a place; so that the "travelling companies of Dedanim," that used to keep the high roads with their caravans, shall be obliged to quit them, and lodge in the forest in Arabia, ver. 13; and shall not have the wonted convenience of their own tents, poor and weatherbeaten as they are.

Thirdly. They shall stand in need of refreshment, being ready to perish for want of it, in their flight from the invading army. "O ye inhabitants of the land of Tema," (who probably were next neighbours to the companies of Dedanim,) 'bring ye water,' so the margin reads it, 'to him that is thirsty, and prevent with your bread those that flee;' for they are objects of your compassion, they do not wander for wandering sake, nor are they reduced to straits by any extravagance of their own, but they flee from the sword. Tema was a country where water was sometimes a scarce commodity, as we find, Job vi. 19; and we may conclude it would be in a particular manner acceptable to these poor distressed refugees. Let us learn hence, 1. To look for distress ourselves; we know not what straits we may be brought into before we die. Those that live in cities may be forced to lodge in forests; and those may know the want of necessary food who now eat bread to the full. Our mountain stands not so strong but that it may be moved, rises not so high but that it may be scaled. These Arabians would the better bear these calamities, because in their way of living they had used themselves to hardships. 2. To look with compassion upon those that are in distress, and with all cheerfulness to relieve them; not knowing how soon their case may be ours. Bring water to them that are thirsty; and not only give bread to those that need and ask it, but prevent those with it that have need; give it them unasked. They that do so, shall find it remembered to their praise, as, according to our reading, it is here remembered to the praise of the land of Tema, that they did bring water to the thirsty, and relieved even those that were on the falling side.

Fourthly. All that which is the glory of Kedar shall vanish away and fail. Did they glory in their numerous herds and flocks? they shall all be driven away by the enemy. It seems they were famous above other nations for the use of the bow in battle; but their archers, instead of foiling the enemy, shall fall themselves; and the "residue of their number," when they are reduced to a small number, "shall be diminished," ver. 17; their mighty, able-bodied men, and men of spirit too, shall become very few. For they, being most forward in the defence of their country, were most exposed, and fell first, either by the enemy's sword or into the enemy's hand. Note, Neither the skill of archers, though they be never so good marksmen, nor the courage of mighty men, can protect a people from the judgments of God, when they come with commission; but rather expose the undertakers. That is poor glory which will thus quickly come to nothing.

Fifthly. All this shall be done in a little time. "Within a year, according to the years of an hireling;" that is, within one year, precisely reckoned, this judgment shall come upon Kedar. If this fixing of the time be of no great use to us now, because we find not either when the prophecy was delivered or when it was accomplished, yet it might be of great use to the Arabians there to awaken them to repentance, that, like the men of Nineveh, they might prevent the judgment when they were thus told it was just at the door. Or, when it begins to be fulfilled, the business shall be done, be begun and ended in one year's time. God when he pleaseth can do a great work in a little time.

Sixthly. It is all ratified by the truth of God; ver. 16, "Thus hath the Lord said to me." You may take my word for it, that it is his word; and we may be sure no word of his shall fall to the ground. And again, ver. 17, "The Lord God of Israel hath spoken it," as the God of Israel, in pursuance of his gracious designs concerning them, and we may be sure "the Strength of Israel will not lie."

CHAPTER XXII.

We are now come nearer home, for this chapter is "the burthen of the valley of vision," that is, Jerusalem. Other places had their burthens for the sake of their being concerned some way or other with Jerusalem, and were reckoned with either as spiteful enemies, or deceitful friends to the people of God; but now, let Jerusalem hear her own doom. This chapter concerns, I. The city of Jerusalem itself and the neighbourhood depending upon it. Here is, 1. A prophecy of the grievous distress they should shortly xxii. 4. "The daughter of my people" here means "my people," or "my fellow-citizens."

---

xxii. 5. "The valley of vision" is Jerusalem, as in verse 1. The Hebrew rendered "breaking down the walls" is very peculiar—M'karkar Kir. The majority of critics favour our version.

xxii. 6. Kir here, as a proper name, applies to a city or province. Fürst follows those who say it is an Assyrian province near Elam. It must not be confounded with Kir of Moab.

xxii. 8—11. The words "and he discovered" require explanation and correction. "To discover" formerly meant to uncover, expose, or bring to light, and here it signifies exposure to public and hostile gaze. In both this verse and the following, we should correct the common version by putting the verbs in the future tense: "Ye will expose to view the covering; ye will inspect the arms; ye will see that the breaches are many; and ye will collect the waters of the lower pool," &c. The prediction is of what would be done when b: brought into, by Sennacherib's invasion of the country, and laying siege to the city, ver. 1—7; 2. A reproof given them for their miscarriage in that distress in two things: 1st. Not having an eye to God in the use of the means of their preservation, ver. 8—11; 2nd. Not humbling themselves under his mighty hand, ver. 12—14. II. The court of Hezekiah, and the officers of that court: 1. The displacing of Shebna, an ill man, and turning him out of the treasury, ver. 15—19; 2. The preferring of Eliakim to his place, who should do his country better service, ver. 20—24.

THE burden of the valley of vision.
What aileth thee now,
That thou art wholly gone up to the housetops?
2 Thou that art full of stirs,
A tumultuous city, a joyous city:
Thy slain men are not slain with the sword,
Nor dead in battle.
3 All thy rulers are fled together,
They are bound by the archers:
All that are found in thee are bound together,
Which have fled from far.
4 Therefore said I, Look away from me; I will weep bitterly,
Labour not to comfort me, because of the spoiling of the daughter of my people.
5 For it is a day of trouble, and of treading down, and of perplexity
By the Lord GOD of hosts in the valley of vision,
Breaking down the walls,
And of crying to the mountains.
6 And Elam bare the quiver
With chariots of men and horsemen,
And Kir uncovered the shield.
7 And it shall come to pass,
That thy choicest valleys shall be full of chariots,
And the horsemen shall set themselves in array at the gate.

The title of this prophecy is very observable; it is "the burthen of the valley of vision," of Judah and Jerusalem, so all agree. Fitly enough is Jerusalem called a valley, for the mountains were round about it; and the land of Judah abounded with fruitful valleys. And by the judgments of God, though they had been as a towering mountain, they should be brought low, sunk and depressed, and become dark and dirty as a valley; but most emphatically is it called a valley of vision, because there God was known, and his name great. There the prophets were made acquainted with his mind by visions; and there the people saw the goings of their God and king in his sanctuary. Babylon being a stranger to God, though rich and great, was called "the desert of the sea;" but Jerusalem being intrusted with his oracles, is a "valley of vision." "Blessed are their eyes, for they see;" and they have seers by office among them. Where Bibles and ministers are, there is a valley of vision, from which is expected fruit accordingly; but here is a "burthen of the valley of vision," and a heavy burthen it is. Note, Church privileges, if they be not improved, will not secure men from the judgments of God; "You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore will I punish you." The valley of vision has a particular burthen; "Thou Capernaum," Mat. xi. 23. The higher any are lifted up in means and mercies the heavier will their doom be if they abuse them. Now "the burthen of the valley of vision" here, is not that which will quite ruin it, but only frighten it; for it refers not to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, but to the attempt made upon it by Sennacherib, which we had the prophecy of, ch. x.; and shall meet with the history of, ch. xxxvi. It is here again prophesied of, beeause the desolations of many of the neighbouring countries which were foretold in the foregoing chapters, were to be brought to pass by the Assyrian army. Now let Jerusalem know, that when the cup is going round, it will be put into her hand; and though it will not be to her a fatal cup, yet it will be a cup of trembling. Here is foretold,

First. The consternation that the city should be in upon the approach of Sennacherib's army. It used to be "full of stirs;" a city of great trade, people hurrying to and fro about their business, a "tumultuous city," populous and noisy. Where there is great trade, there is great tumult. It used to be a joyous, revelling city; what with the busy part, and what with the merry part, of mankind, places of concourse are places of noise. But what ails thee now, that the shops are quitted, and there is no more walking in the streets and exchange, but "thou art wholly gone up to the housetops," ver. 1; to bemoan thyself in silence and solitude, or to secure thyself from the enemy, or to look abroad and see if any succours come to thy relief; or which way the enemy's motions are? Let both men of business and sportsmen rejoice as though they rejoiced not; for something may happen quickly which they little think of, that will be a damp to their mirth, and a stop to their business, and send them to "watch as a sparrow alone upon the housetop," Ps. cii. 7. But why is Jerusalem in such a fright? Her "slain men are not slain with the sword," ver. 2. But, 1. Slain with famine, so some; for Sennacherib's army having laid the country waste, and destroyed the fruits of the earth, provisions must needs be very scarce and dear in the city; which would be the death of many of the poorer sort of people, who would be constrained to feed on that which was unwholesome. 2. Slain with fear; they were put into this mighty fright, though they had not a man killed, but so disheartened themselves, that they seemed as effectually stabbed with fear as if they had been run through with a sword.

Secondly. The inglorious flight of the rulers of Judah, which fled from far, that is, from all parts of the country, to Jerusalem, ver. 3. Fled together, as it were by consent, and were found in Jerusalem; having left their respective cities, which they should have taken care of, to be a prey to the Assyrian army, which meeting with no opposition, when it "came up against all the defenced cities of Judah," easily took them, ch. xxxvi. 1. These rulers were bound from the bow, so the word is; they not only quitted their own cities like cowards, but when they came to Jerusalem were of no service there, but were as if their hands were tied from the use of the bow, by the extreme distraction and confusion they were in; they trembled so that they could not draw a bow. See how easily God can dispirit men, and how certainly fear will do it, when the tyranny of it is yielded to.

Thirdly. The great grief which this should occasion to all serious, sensible people among them; which is represented by the prophet's laying the thing to heart himself. He lived to see it, and was resolved to share with the children of his people in their sorrows, ver. 4, 5; he is not willing to proclaim his sorrow, and therefore bids those about him to look away from him. He will abandon himself to grief, and indulge himself in it; will weep secretly, but weep bitterly; and will have none go about to comfort him, for his grief is obstinate, and he is pleased with his pain. But what is the occasion of his grief? A poor prophet had little to lose, and had been inured to hardship, when he walked naked and barefoot; but it is for the spoiling of the daughter of his people. Note, Public grievances should be our griefs. It is "a day of trouble, and of treading down, and of perplexity;" our enemies trouble us, and tread us down, and our friends are perplexed, and know not what course to take to do us a kindness. The "Lord God of hosts" is now contending with "the valley of vision;" the enemies with their battering rams are "breaking down the walls," and we are in vain "crying to the mountains" to keep off the enemy, or to fall on us and cover us; or looking for help to come to us over the mountains; or appealing, as God doth, to the mountains to hear our controversy, Mic. vi. 1; and to judge between us and our injurious neighbours.

Fourthly. The great numbers and strength of the enemy that should invade their country, and besiege their city, ver. 6, 7; Elam, that is, the Persians, come with their quiver full of arrows, and with chariots of fighting men and horsemen; Kir, that is, the Medes, muster up their arms, unsheath the sword, and uncover the shield, and get every thing ready for battle, every thing ready for the besieging of Jerusalem. Then the choice valleys about Jerusalem, that used to be clothed with flocks, and covered over with corn, shall be full of chariots of war; and at the gate of the city the horsemen shall set themselves in array, to cut off all provisions from going in, and to force their way in. What a condition must the city be in that was beset on all sides with such an army?

8 And he discovered the covering of Judah,
And thou didst look in that day to the armour of the house of the forest.
9 Ye have seen also the breaches of the city of David, that they are many:
And ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool.
10 And ye have numbered the houses of Jerusalem,
And the houses have ye broken down to fortify the wall.
11 Ye made also a ditch between the two walls for the water of the old pool:
But ye have not looked unto the maker thereof,
Neither had respect unto him that fashioned it long ago.
12 And in that day did the Lord GOD of hosts call
To weeping, and to mourning,
And to baldness, and to girding with sackcloth:
13 And behold joy and gladness,
Slaying oxen, and killing sheep,
Eating flesh, and drinking wine:
Let us eat and drink;
For to-morrow we shall die.
14 And it was revealed in mine ears by the LORD of hosts,
Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till ye die,
Saith the Lord GOD of hosts.

What is meant by "the covering of Judah," which in the beginning of this paragraph is said to be "discovered," is not agreed. The fenced cities of Judah were a covering to the country; but those being taken by the army of the Assyrians, they ceased to be a shelter, so that the whole country lay exposed to be plundered. The weakness of Judah, its nakedness and inability to help itself, now appeared more than ever, and thus "the covering of Judah" was "discovered." Its magazines and stores, that had been locked up, were now laid open for the public use. Dr. Lightfoot gives another sense of it, that by this distress into which Judah should be brought, God would discover their covering, that is, would uncloak their hypocrisy, would shew all that was in their heart, as is said of Hezekiah upon another occasion, 2 Chr. xxxii. 31. Now they discovered both their carnal confidence, ver. 9, and their carnal security, ver. 12. Thus by one means or other, "the iniquity of Ephraim will be discovered, and the sin of Samaria," Hos. vii. 1. They were now in a great fright, and in this fright they discovered two things much amiss:

First. A great contempt of God's goodness, and his power to help them. They made use of all the means they could think of for their own preservation; and it is not that they are blamed for, but in doing this they did not acknowledge God. Observe,

1. How careful they were to improve all advantages that might contribute to their safety. When Sennacherib had made himself master of all the defenced cities of Judah, and Jerusalem was left as a cottage in a vineyard, they thought it was time to look about them. A council was presently called, a council of war, and it was resolved to stand upon their defence, and not tamely to surrender. Pursuant to this resolve they took all the prudent measures they could for their own security. We tempt God if, in times of danger, we do not the best we can for ourselves. 1st. They inspected the magazines and stores, to see if they were well stocked with arms and ammunition; they looked "to the armour of the house of the forest," which Solomon built in Jerusalem for an armoury, 1 Kin. x. 17, and from thence they delivered out what they had occasion for. It is the wisdom of princes in times of peace to provide for war, that they may not have arms to seek when they should use them, and perhaps upon a sudden emergency. 2nd. They viewed the fortifications, "the breaches of the city of David;" they walked round the walls and observed where they were gone to decay for want of seasonable repairs, or danger came nigh. Thoroughly to explain some of the expressions would require a greater knowledge of Jerusalem in the days of Isaiah than is now possible.

xxii. 12—14. The thought is here further developed. In their danger the people of Jerusalem would use precautions, but would do so in an improper spirit; nay, when called to repentance, they would indulge in revelry, not knowing that utter ruin was impending over them: "the second death," the Targum calls it.

xxii. 15. This verse introduces a new prophecy, one against Shebna, who was treasurer or steward over the palace, and little expected his utter overthrow. His sin was not the construction of a family sepulchre (which was a merely vain and useless task), but in something not specified.

xxii. 17, 18. The language here is obscure and enigmatic in part, and is therefore variously translated. We might render it, "Behold, the Lord will hurl thee away with a mighty hurl, and will cover thee broken by some former attempts made upon them. These breaches were many, the more shame for the house of David, that they suffered the city of David to lie neglected. It is likely they had seen those breaches many a time, but now they saw them to consider what course to take about them. This good we should get by public distresses; we should be awakened by them to repair our breaches, and amend what is amiss. 3rd. They made sure of water for the city, and did what they could to deprive the besiegers of it; Ye "gathered together the waters" of the lower pools, which it is likely there was no great store of, and therefore they were the more concerned to be good husbands of. See what a mercy it is that, as nothing is more necessary to the support of human life than water, so nothing is more cheap and common. But it is bad indeed when that, as here, is a scarce commodity. 4th. They "numbered the houses of Jerusalem," that every house might send in their quota of men for the public service, or contribute in money to it, which they raised by a poll, so much a head, or so much a house. 5th. Because private property ought to give way to the public safety, those houses that stood in their way when the wall was to be fortified were broken down, which in such a case of necessity is no more an injury to the owner than blowing up houses in case of fire. 6th. They made a ditch between the outer and inner wall, for the greater security of the city; and they contrived to draw "the water of the old pool" to it, that they might have plenty of water themselves, and might deprive the besiegers of it; for it seems that was the project, lest the Assyrian army "should come and find much water," 2 Chr. xxxii. 4, and so should be the better able to prolong the siege. If it be lawful to destroy the forage of a country, much more to divert the streams of its waters, for the straitening and starving of an enemy.

2. How regardless they were of God in all these preparations; "But ye have not looked unto the maker thereof;" that is, of Jerusalem, the city you are so solicitous for the defence of, and of all the advantages which nature has furnished it with for its defence. The mountains round about it, Ps. cxxv. 2, and the rivers which were such as the inhabitants might turn which way soever they pleased for their convenience. Note, 1st. It is God that made his Jerusalem, and fashioned it long ago, in his counsels. The Jewish writers upon this place say, There were seven things which God made before the world, meaning, which he had in his eye when he made the world, namely, The garden of Eden, the law, the just ones, Israel, the throne of glory, Jerusalem, and Messiah the prince. The gospel church has God for its maker. 2nd. Whatever service we do, or endeavour to do, at any time to God's Jerusalem, it must be with an eye to him as the maker of it, and he takes it ill if we do not. That is it that is charged upon them here. They did not look to God; that is, First. They did not design his glory in what they did. They fortified Jerusalem because it was a rich city, and their own houses were in it; not because it was the holy city, and God's house was in it. In all our cares for the defence of the church we must look more at God's interest in it than at our own. Secondly. They did not depend upon him for a blessing upon their endeavours, saw no need of it, and therefore sought not to him for it, but thought their own powers and policies sufficient for them. Of Hezekiah himself it is said, that "he trusted in God," 2 Kin. xviii. 5, and particularly upon this occasion, 2 Chr. xxxii. 8. But there were those about him, it seems, that were great statesmen and soldiers, but had little religion in them. Thirdly. They did not give him thanks for the advantages they had in fortifying their city from "the waters of the old pool," which were fashioned long ago, as Kishon is called an "ancient river," Jud. v. 21. Whatever in nature is at any time serviceable to us, we must therein acknowledge the goodness of the God of nature, who, when he "fashioned it long ago," fitted it to be so, and according to whose ordinance it continues to this day. Every creature is that to us that God makes it to be; and therefore whatever use it is of to us we must look at him that fashioned it, bless him for it, and use it for him.

Secondly. A great contempt of God's wrath and justice in contending with them, ver. 12—14, where observe,

1. What was God's design in bringing this calamity upon them: it was to humble them, bring them to repentance, and makes them serious. In that day of trouble, and treading down, and perplexity, the Lord did thereby "call to weeping and mourning," and all the expressions of sorrow, even to "baldness" and "girding with sackcloth." And all this both to lament their sins by which they had brought those judgments upon the land, and to enforce their prayers, by which they might hope to avert the judgments that were breaking in, and to dispose themselves to a reformation of their lives, by a holy seriousness and a tenderness of heart under the word of God. To this God called them by his prophets, explaining his providences, and by his providences awakening them to regard what his prophets said. Note, When God threatens us with his judgments, he expects and requires that we humble ourselves under his mighty hand, that we tremble when the lion roars, and in a day of adversity consider.

2. How contrary they walked to this design of God; ver. 13, "Behold joy and gladness;" mirth and feasting, all the gaiety and all the jollity imaginable; they were as secure and pleasant as they used to be, as if they had no enemy in their borders, or were in no danger of falling into his hands. When they had taken the necessary precautions for their security, then they set all deaths and dangers at defiance, and resolved to be merry, let come on them what would. They that should have been among the mourners were among "the wine-bibbers, the riotous eaters of flesh;" and observe what they said, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die." This may refer either to the particular danger they were now in, and the fair warning which the prophet gave them of it, or to the general shortness and uncertainty of human life, and the nearness of death at all times. This was the language of the profane scoffers who mocked the messengers of the Lord and misused his prophets. 1st. They made a jest of dying. The prophet tells us we must die shortly, perhaps to-morrow, and therefore we should mourn and repent to-day; no, rather "let us eat and drink," that we may be fattened for the slaughter, and may be in good heart to meet our doom; if we must have a short life, let it be a merry one. 2nd. They ridiculed the doctrine of a future state on the other side death; for if there were no such state the apostle grants there would be something of reason in what they said, 1 Cor. xv. 32. If, when we die, there were an end of us, it were good to make ourselves as easy and merry as we could while we live; but if for all these things God shall bring us into judgment, it is at our peril if we walk in the way of our heart and the sight of our eyes, Eccl. xi. 9. Note, A practical disbelief of another life after this is at the bottom of that carnal security and brutish sensuality which is the sin, and shame, and ruin of so great a part of mankind, as of the old world, who were eating and drinking till the flood came.

3. How much God was displeased at it. He signified his resentment of it to the prophet, revealed it in his ears, to be by him proclaimed upon the house-top, "Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till you die," ver. 14. It shall never be expiated with sacrifice and offering, no more than the iniquity of the house of Eli, 1 Sam. iii. 14; it is a sin against the remedy, a baffling of the utmost means of conviction, and rendering them ineffectual; and therefore it is not likely they should ever repent of it, or have it pardoned. The Chaldee reads it, 'It shall not be forgiven you till you die the second death.' Those that walk contrary to God, he will walk contrary to them; with the froward he will shew himself froward.

15 Thus saith the Lord GOD of hosts, Go, get thee unto this treasurer, even unto Shebna, which is over the house, and say,
16 What hast thou here? and whom hast thou here,
That thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here,
As he that heweth him out a sepulchre on high,
And that graveth an habitation for himself in a rock?

18 He will surely violently turn
And toss thee like a ball into a large country:
There shalt thou die,
And there the chariots of thy glory shall be the shame of 19 And I will drive thee from thy station,

And from thy state shall he pull thee down.
20 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That I will call my servant Eliakim the son of Hilkiah:

And strengthen him with thy girdle,
And I will commit thy government into his hand:

And be cut down, and fall;
And the burden that was upon it shall be cut off:
For the LORD hath spoken it.

We have here a prophecy concerning the displacing of Shebna, a great officer at court, and the preferring of Eliakim to that post of honour and trust that he was in. Such changes are common in the courts of princes; it is therefore strange that so much notice should be taken of it by the prophet here. But by the accomplishment of what was foretold concerning these particular persons, God designed to confirm his word in the mouth of Isaiah concerning other and greater events. And it is likewise to shew that, as God hath burthens in store for those nations and kingdoms abroad that are open enemies to his

with a covering; whirling he will whirl thee with a whirl like a ball, to a land far and wide; there thou shalt die, and there the chariots of thy glory, thou disgrace of the house of the Lord." In this we have endeavoured to imitate the repetition of sounds in the original.

xxii. 22. "The house of David" here is the royal house or palace. "The key" is the symbol of authority to admit or exclude. (Compare Matt. xvi. 19.)

xxii. 25. In this verse the prophet returns to the doom of Shebna, whose fancied security would end, with all his power. So at least we think, though some suppose the fall of Eliakim is intended.

xxiii. 1. By Tarshish here the Greek understands Carthage. There is no doubt that what are called ships of Tarshish traded between Tyre and Carthage; but it is not necessary to suppose that Carthage was ever called Tarshish. Chittim has been variously explained, but it may refer to Citium, in Cyprus, with which the church and people, so he hath for those particular persons at home that are false friends to them, and betray them. It is likewise a confirmation in general of the hand of Divine providence in all events of this kind, which to us seem contingent, and to depend upon the wills and fancies of princes: "Promotion comes neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south, but God is the judge," Ps. lxxv. 6, 7. It is probable this prophecy was delivered at the same time with that in the former part of the chapter, and began to be fulfilled before Sennacherib's invasion, for now Shebna was over the house, but then Eliakim was, ch. xxxvi. 3, and Shebna, coming down gradually, was only scribe. Here is,

First. The prophecy of Shebna's disgrace. He is called "this treasurer," being intrusted with the management of the revenue; and he is likewise said to be "over the house;" for such was his boundless ambition and covetousness, that less than two places, and those two of the greatest importance at court, would not content him. It is common for self-seeking men thus to grasp at more than they can manage, and so the business of their place is neglected, while the pomp and profit of them is wholly regarded. It doth not appear what were the particular instances of Shebna's maladministration for which Isaiah is here sent to prophesy against him; but the Jews say he kept up a traitorous correspondence with the king of Assyria, and was in treaty with him to deliver the city into his hands. However it was, it should seem he was a foreigner, for we never read of the name of his father, and that he was an enemy to the true interests of Judah and Jerusalem; and it is likely he was first preferred by Ahaz. Hezekiah was himself an excellent good prince, but the best masters cannot always be sure of good servants. We have need to pray for princes, that they may be wise and happy in the choice of those they trust. These were times of reformation; yet Shebna, an ill man, complied so far as to keep his places at court; and it is probable many others did like him, for which reason Sennacherib is said to have been sent "against an hypocritical nation," ch. x. 6. In this message to Shebna we have,

1. A reproof of his pride, vanity, and security; ver. 16, "What hast thou here? and whom hast thou here?" What a mighty noise and bustle dost thou make. What estate hast thou here that thou wast born to? "Whom hast thou here?" what relations that thou art allied to? Art thou not of mean and obscure original, filius populi,—'a mere plebeian,'—that comest we know not from whence? What is the meaning of this, then, that thou hast built thee a fine house, hast graved thee a habitation? So very nice and curious was it that it seemed rather to be the work of an engraver than of a mason or carpenter. And it seemed engraven in a rock, so firmly was it founded, and so impregnable was it. Nay, "Thou hast hewn thee out a sepulchre," as if he designed that his pomp should survive his funeral. Though Jerusalem was not "the place of his fathers' sepulchres," as Nehemiah called it with a great deal of tenderness, Neh. ii. 3, he designed it should be the place of his own, and therefore set up a monument for himself in his lifetime, set it up on high. They that make stately monuments for their pride forget that, how beautiful soever they appear outwardly, within they are full of dead men's bones. But it is pity the grave-stone should forget the grave.

2. A prophecy of his fall, and the sullying of his glory.

1st. That he should now presently be displaced and degraded; ver. 19, "I will drive thee from thy station." High places are slippery places, and those are justly deprived of their honour that are proud of it and puffed up with it; and deprived of their power, that do hurt with it. God will do it, who shews himself to be God by looking upon proud men and abasing them, Job xl. 11. To this ver. 25 refers: "the nail that is" now "fastened in the sure place," that is, Shebna, who thinks himself immovably fixed in his office, shall "be removed, and be cut down, and fall." Those are mistaken who think any place in this world a sure place, or themselves as nails fastened in it, for there is nothing here but uncertainty. When the nail falls, the burthen that was upon it is cut off; when Shebna was disgraced, all that had a dependence upon him, fell into contempt too. Those that are in high places will have many hanging upon them as favourites, whom they are proud of, and trust to; but they are burthens upon them, and perhaps with their weight break the nail, and both fall together, and by deceiving ruin one another,—the common fate of great men and their flatterers, who expect more from each other than either perform.

2nd. That after a while he should not only be driven from his station, but driven his country; The Lord will carry thee away with the captivity of a mighty man, ver. 17, 18. Some think the Assyrians seized him and took him away, because he had promised to assist them, and did not, but appeared against them. Or, perhaps Hezekiah, finding out his treachery, banished him, and forbade him ever to return; or he himself, finding that he was become obnoxious to the people, withdrew into some other country, and there spent the rest of his days in meanness and obscurity. Grotius thinks he was stricken with a leprosy, which was a disease commonly supposed to come from the immediate hand of God's displeasure, particularly for the punishment of the proud, as in the case of Miriam and Uzziah; and by reason of this disease he was tossed like a ball out of Jerusalem. Those that, when they are in power, turn and toss others, will be justly turned and tossed themselves when their day shall come to fall. Many that have thought themselves fastened like a nail may come to be tossed like a ball, for here have we no continuing city. Shebna thought his place too strait for him, he had no room to thrive; God will therefore send him into "a large country," where he shall have room to wander, but never find the way back again, for there he shall die, and lay his bones there, and not in the sepulchre he had hewn out for himself. And there the chariots that had been the chariots of his glory, in which he had rattled about the streets of Jerusalem, and which he took into banishment with him, should but serve to upbraid him with his former grandeur, to the shame of his lord's house, of the court of Ahaz that had advanced him.

Secondly. The prophecy of Eliakim's advancement, ver. 20, &c. He is God's servant, has approved himself faithfully so in other employments, and therefore God will call him to this high station. Those that are diligent in doing the duty of a low sphere stand fairest for preferment in God's books. Eliakim doth not undermine Shebna, or make an interest against him, nor doth he intrude into his office, but God calls him to it; and what God calls us to we may expect he will own us in. It is here foretold,

1. That Eliakim shall be put into Shebna's place of lord chamberlain of the household, lord treasurer, and prime minister of state. The prophet must tell Shebna this, ver. 21. He shall have thy robe, the badge of honour; and thy girdle, the badge of power; for he shall have thy government. To hear of it would be a great mortification to Shebna, much more to see it. Great men, especially if proud men, cannot endure their successors. God undertakes the doing of it, not only because he would put it into the heart of Hezekiah to do it, and his hand must be acknowledged guiding the heart of princes in placing and displacing men, Pr. xxi. 1; but because the powers that be, subordinate as well as supreme, are ordained of God. It is God that clothes princes with their robes, and therefore we must submit ourselves to them for the Lord's sake, with an eye to him, 1 Pet. ii. 13. And, since it is he that commits the government into their hand, they must administer it according to his will, for his glory, must judge for him by whom they judge, and decree justice, Pr. viii. 15. And they may depend upon him to furnish them for what he calls them to, according to the promise here, "I will clothe him," and then it follows, I will "strengthen him." Those that are called to places of trust and power should seek unto God for grace to enable them to do the duty of their places, for that ought to be their chief care. Eliakim's advancement is farther described by the laying of the key of the house of David upon his shoulder, ver. 22. Probably he carried a gold key upon his shoulder, as a badge of his office, or had one embroidered upon his cloak or robe, to which this alludes. Being over the house, and having the key delivered to him, as the seals are to the lord keeper, "he shall open, and none shall shut; shut, and none shall open." He had access to "the house of the precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices," and to the "house of the armour" and "the treasures," ch. xxxix. 2, and disposed of the stores there as he thought fit for the public service. He put whom he pleased into the inferior offices, and turned out whom he pleased. Our Lord Jesus describes his own power as Mediator by an allusion to this, Rev. iii. 7, that "he hath the key of David, wherewith he opens, and no man shuts, he shuts, and no man opens." His power in the kingdom of heaven and in the ordering of all the affairs of that kingdom is absolute, irresistible, and uncontrollable.

2. That he should be fixed and confirmed in that office. He shall have it for life, and not durante bene placito,—'during pleasure;' ver. 23, "I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place;" not to be removed or cut down. Thus lasting shall the honour be that comes from God, to all those that use it for him. Our Lord Jesus is "a nail in a sure place;" his kingdom cannot be shaken, and he himself is still the same.

3. That he should be a great blessing in his office; and that is it that crowns the favours here conferred upon him. God makes his name great, for he shall be a blessing, Gen. xii. 2.

1st. He shall be a blessing to his country; ver. 21, "He shall be a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah." He shall take care not only of the affairs of the king's household, but of all the public interests in Jerusalem and Judah. Note, Rulers should be fathers to those that are under their government; to teach them with wisdom, rule them with love, and correct what is amiss with tenderness; to protect them, and provide for them, and be solicitous about them, as a man is for his own children and family. It is happy with a people when neither court, nor city, nor country, have any separate interests, but all centre in the same, so that the courtiers are true patriots, and whom the court blesseth the country has reason to bless too; and when those who are fathers to Jerusalem, the royal city, are no less so to the house of Judah.

2nd. He shall be a blessing to his family; ver. 23, 24, "He shall be for a glorious throne to his father's house." That consummate wisdom and virtue which recommended him to this great trust made him the honour of his family; which probably was very considerable before, but now became much more so. Children should aim to be a credit to their parents and relations. The honour men reflect upon their families by their piety and usefulness is more to be valued than that which they derive from their families by their names and titles.

Eliakim being preferred, "all the glory of his father's house" was hung upon him; they all made their court to him, and his brethren's sheaves bowed to his. Observe, The glory of this world gives a man no intrinsic worth or excellency; it is but hung upon him as an appurtenance, and it will soon drop from him. Eliakim was compared to "a nail in a sure place;" in pursuance of which comparison, all the relations of his family, who it is likely were numerous, and that was the glory of it, are said to have a dependence upon him; as in a house the vessels that have handles to them are hung up upon nails and pins. It intimates likewise, that he shall generously take care of them all, and bear the weight of that care. "All the vessels," not only the flagons, but the cups, the "vessels of small quantity," the meanest that belonged to his family, shall be provided for by him. See what a burthen they bring upon themselves that undertake great trusts; they little think how many and how much will hang upon them, if they resolve to be faithful in the discharge of their trust. Our Lord Jesus, having the key of the house of David, is as "a nail in a sure place," and "all the glory of his Father's house" hangs upon him, is derived from him, and depends upon him; even the meanest that belong to his church are welcome to him, and he is able to bear the stress of them all. That soul cannot perish, nor that concern fall to the ground, though never so weighty, that is by faith hung upon Christ.

CHAPTER XXIII.

This chapter is concerning Tyre, an ancient wealthy city, situated upon the sea, and for many ages one of the most celebrated cities for trade and merchandise in those parts of the world. The lot of the tribe of Asher bordered upon it, Jos. xix. 29, where it is called the strong city Tyre. We seldom find it any thing of a dangerous enemy to Israel, but sometime their faithful ally, as in the reign of David and Solomon; for trading cities maintain their grandeur, not by conquests of their neighbours, but by commerce with them. In this chapter is foretold, I. The lamentable desolation of Tyre, which was performed by Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldean army, about the same time that they destroyed Jerusalem; and a hard task they had of it, as appears, Eze. xxix. 18, where they are said to have served a hard service against Tyre, and yet to have no wages, ver. 1—14. II. The restoration of Tyre after seventy years, and the return of the Tyrians out of their captivity to their trade again, ver. 15—18.

THE burden of Tyre.
Howl, ye ships of Tarshish;
For it is laid waste,
So that there is no house, no entering in:
From the land of Chittim it is revealed to them.
2 Be still, ye inhabitants of the isle;
Thou whom the merchants of Zidon, that pass over the sea, have replenished.
3 And by great waters the seed of Sihor, the harvest of the river, is her revenue;
And she is a mart of nations.
4 Be thou ashamed, O Zidon: for the sea hath spoken,
Even the strength of the sea, saying,
I travail not, nor bring forth children,
Neither do I nourish up young men, nor bring up virgins.

Phœnician vessels are known to have traded. See also verse 6 of this chapter.

xxiii. 2. The word for "isle" sometimes means only a district bordering the sea, and it may be so here; but it must be remembered that Tyre was at one time built upon a small island. Sidon was more ancient than Tyre, which was founded by colonists from Sidon, and afterwards associated in the same trade.

xxiii. 3. The sense is that the products of the Nile valley were conveyed upon the sea to Tyre, and thence dispersed to other nations. Sihor means the upper Nile, and the peculiar word for "river" applies to the Nile generally.

xxiii. 4. Tyre is meant both by "the sea" and "the strength" or fortress "of the sea;" and is represented as lamenting over its ruin, in the hearing of Sidon.

xxiii. 5. The sense is that when the news shall reach Egypt, the Egyptians will be grieved at the news from Tyre.

5 As at the report concerning Egypt,
So shall they be sorely pained at the report of Tyre.
6 Pass ye over to Tarshish;
Howl, ye inhabitants of the isle.
7 Is this your joyous city,
Whose antiquity is of ancient days?
Her own feet shall carry her afar off to sojourn.
8 Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre,
The crowning city,
Whose merchants are princes,
Whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth?
9 The LORD of hosts hath purposed it,
To stain the pride of all glory, [earth.
And to bring into contempt all the honourable of the

There is no more strength.

He shook the kingdoms: [chant city,
The LORD hath given a commandment against the mer-
To destroy the strong holds thereof.
12 And he said, Thou shalt no more rejoice,
O thou oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon:
Arise, pass over to Chittim;
There also shalt thou have no rest.
13 Behold the land of the Chaldeans;
This people was not, [wilderness:

They set up the towers thereof,
They raised up the palaces thereof;
And he brought it to ruin.
14 Howl, ye ships of Tarshish:
For your strength is laid waste.

Tyre being a seaport town, this prophecy of its overthrow fitly begins and ends with, "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish;" for all its business, wealth, and honour, depended upon its shipping. If that be ruined, they are all undone. Observe,

First. Tyre flourishing. This is taken notice of, that her fall may appear the more dismal. 1. The "merchants of Zidon," that traded at sea, had at first replenished her, ver. 2. Zidon was the more ancient city, situate upon the same sea-coast, a few leagues more to the north, and Tyre was at first only a colony of that. But the daughter had outgrown the mother, and was become much more considerable. It may be a mortification to great cities, to think how they were at first replenished. 2. Egypt had helped very much to raise her, ver. 3; Sihor was the river of Egypt. By that river, and the ocean into which it ran, the Egyptians traded with Tyre; and the harvest of that river was her revenue. The riches of the sea, and the gains by goods exported and imported, are as much the harvest to trading towns as that of hay and corn is to the country. And sometimes the harvest of the river proves a better revenue than the harvest of the land. Or it may be meant of all the products of the Egyptian soil, which the men of Tyre traded in, and which were the harvest of the river Nile, owing themselves to the overflowing of that river. 3. She was become the mart of the nations; the great emporium of that part of the world. Some of every known nation might be found there, especially at some times of the year, when there was a general rendezvous of merchants. This is enlarged upon by another prophet, Eze. xxvii. 2, &c. See how "the hand of the diligent," by the blessing of God upon it, "maketh rich." Tyre became rich and great by industry, though she had no other ploughs going but those that plough the waters. 4. She was a "joyous city," noted for mirth and jollity, ver. 7. Those that were so disposed might find there all manner of sports and diversions, all the delights of the sons and daughters of men; balls, and plays, and operas, and every thing of that kind that a man had a fancy to. This made them secure and proud, and they despised the country people, that neither knew nor relished any joys of that nature. And this made them very loath to believe and consider what warnings God gave them by his servants; they were too merry to mind them. Her antiquity likewise was "of ancient days," and she was proud of that, and that helped to make her secure. As if, because she had been a city time out of mind, and her antiquity had been of ancient days, therefore she must continue a city time without end, and her continuance must be to the days of eternity. 5. She was a "crowning city," ver. 8, that crowned herself. Such was the power and pomp of her magistrates, that crowned those who had dependence on her, and dealings with her. It is explained in the following words: Her "merchants are princes," and live like princes, for the ease and state they take; and her traffickers, whatever country they go to, are "the honourable of the earth," that are respected by all. How slightly soever some now speak of tradesmen, it seems formerly, and among the wisest nations, there were merchants and traders, and men of business, that were the honourable of the earth.

Secondly. Here is Tyre falling. It doth not appear that she brought trouble upon herself, by provoking her neighbours with her quarrels, but rather by tempting them with her wealth. But if that was it that induced Nebuchadnezzar to fall upon Tyre, he was disappointed; for after it had stood out a siege of thirteen years, and could hold out no longer, the inhabitants got away by sea with their families and goods, to other places where they had an interest, and left Nebuchadnezzar nothing but the bare city. See a history of Tyre in Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, lib. ii. c. 7, sec. 3, 43, p. 283, which will give much light to this prophecy, and that in Ezekiel, concerning Tyre. See how the destruction of Tyre is here foretold:

1. The haven should be spoiled or at least neglected. There shall be no convenient harbour for the reception of the ships of Tarshish, but all laid waste, ver. 1, so that there shall be no house, no dock, for the ships to ride in, no inns or public houses for the seamen, no entering into the port; perhaps it was racked up with sand, or blocked up by the enemy. Or, Tyre being destroyed and laid waste, the ships that used to come from Tarshish and Chittim into that port shall now no more enter in; for it is revealed, or made known to them, they have received the dismal news that Tyre is destroyed and laid waste; so that there is now no more business for them there. See how it is in this world; those that are spoiled by their enemies are commonly slighted by their old friends.

2. The inhabitants are struck with astonishment. Tyre was an island; the inhabitants of it, that had made a mighty noise and bustle in the world, had revelled with loud huzzas, shall now be still and silent, ver. 2; they shall sit down as mourners, so overwhelmed with grief, that they shall not be able to express it. Their proud boast of themselves, and defiances of their neighbours, shall be silenced. God can soon quiet those, and strike them dumb, that are the noisy, busy people of the world. Be still, for God will do his work, Ps. xlvi. 10; Zec. ii. 13; and you cannot resist him.

3. The neighbours are amazed, blush, and are in pain for them. Zidon is ashamed, ver. 4, by whom Tyre was at first replenished; for the rolling waves of the sea brought to Zidon this news from Tyre; and there the "strength of the sea," a high spring tide, proclaimed, saying, "I travail not, nor bring forth children" now, as I have done. I do not now bring shiploads of young people to Tyre, to be bred up there in trade and business, as I used to do; which was the thing that had made Tyre so rich and populous. Or, the sea, that had used to be loaded with fleets of ships about Tyre, shall now be as desolate as a sorrowful widow that is bereaved of all her children, and has none about her to nourish and bring up. Egypt indeed was a much larger and more considerable kingdom than Tyre was; and yet Tyre had so large a correspondence, upon the account of trade, that all the nations about shall be as much in pain, upon the report of the ruin of that one city, as they would have been, and not long after were, upon the report of the ruin of all Egypt, ver. 5. Or, as some read it, 'When as the report shall reach to the Egyptians, they shall be sorely pained to hear it of Tyre;' both because of the loss of their trade with that city, and because it was a threatening step towards their own ruin; when their neighbour's house was on fire, their own was in danger.

4. The merchants, as many as could, should transmit their effects to other places, and abandon Tyre, where they had raised their estates, and thought they had made them sure; ver. 6, Ye that have long been inhabitants of this isle, (for it lay off in the sea about half a mile from the continent,) it is time to howl now, for ye must pass over to Tarshish. The best course you can take is to make the best of your way to Tarshish, to the sea, to Tartessus, a city in Spain, so some; or to some other of your plantations. Those that think their mountain stands strong, and cannot be moved, will find that here they have no continuing city. "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed."

5. Those that could not make their escape must expect no other but to be carried into captivity; for that was the way of conquerors in those times, to take those they conquered to be bondmen in their own country, and send of their own to be freemen in theirs; ver. 7, "Her own feet shall carry her afar off to sojourn;" she shall be hurried away on foot into captivity, and many a weary step they shall take towards their own misery. Those that have lived in the greatest pomp and splendour know not what hardships they may be reduced to before they die.

6. Many of those that attempted to escape should be pursued, and fall into the hands of the enemy. Tyre shall pass through her land as a river, ver. 10; running down, one company after another, into the ocean, or abyss of misery. Or, though they hasten away as a river, with the greatest swiftness, hoping to outrun the danger, yet "there is no more strength," they are quite tired presently, and cannot get forward, but fall an easy prey into the hands of the enemy. And as Tyre has "no more strength," so her sister Zidon has no more comfort; ver. 12, "Thou shalt no more rejoice, O oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon," that art now ready to be overpowered by the victorious Chaldeans. Thy turn is next, therefore "arise, pass over to Chittim." Flee to Greece, to Italy, any whither, to shift for thy own safety; yet "there also shalt thou have no rest." Thine enemies shall disturb thee, and thine own fears shall disquiet thee, there where thou hopedst to find some repose. Note, We deceive ourselves if we promise ourselves rest anywhere in this world. Those that are uneasy in one place will be so in another; and when God's judgments pursue sinners they will overtake them.

But whence shall all this trouble come?

1st. God will be the author of it. It is a destruction from the Almighty. It will be asked, ver. 8, "Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre?" Who hath contrived it? Who hath resolved it? Who can find in his heart to lay such a stately, lovely city, in ruins? and how is it possible it should be effected? To this it will be answered:

First. God hath designed it, who is infinitely wise and just, and never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of his creatures; ver. 9, "The Lord of hosts," that has all things at his dispose, and gives not account of any of his matters, he hath purposed it. It shall be done according to the counsel of his will; and that which he aims at herein is, "to stain the pride of all glory," to pollute it, profane it, and throw it to be trodden upon; and to bring into contempt, and make despicable, all the honourable ones of the earth, that they may not admire themselves, and be admired by others, as usual. God did not bring those calamities upon Tyre in a way of sovereignty, to shew an arbitrary and irresistible power; but he did it to punish the Tyrians for their pride. Many other sins no doubt reigned among them; idolatry, sensuality, and oppression; but the sin of pride is fastened upon, as that which was the particular ground of God's controversy with Tyre, for he resists the proud. All the world observing, and being surprised at the desolation of Tyre, we have here an exposition of it: God tells the world what he meant by it. 1*st.* He designed to convince men of the vanity and uncertainty of all earthly glory; to shew them what a withering, fading, perishing thing it is, even then when it seems most substantial. And it were well if men would be thoroughly taught this lesson, though it were at the expense of so great a destruction. Is men's learning and wealth their glory? their pomp and power, their interest in, and influence upon, all about them? Are their stately houses, rich furniture, and splendid appearances, their glory? Look upon the ruins of Tyre, and see all this glory stained, and sullied, and buried in the dust. The honourable ones of heaven will be for ever so; but see the grandees of Tyre, some fled into banishment, others forced into captivity, and all impoverished; and you will conclude, that "the honourable of the earth," even the most honourable, know not how soon they may be brought into contempt. 2*nd.* He designed hereby to prevent their being proud of that glory, their being puffed up, and confident of the continuance of it. Let the ruin of Tyre be a warning to all places and persons to take heed of pride, for it proclaims to all the world that "he that exalteth himself shall be abased."

Secondly. God will do it, who has all power in his hand, and can do it effectually; ver. 11, "He stretched out his hand over the sea," has done it many a xxiii. 6. Here, as in verse 1, the Greek translation has Carthage (Carchedon) for Tarshish. It is related that when Tyre was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, and again by Alexander, many fled to Carthage.

xxiii. 8. Tyre is called a "crowning city" because some of its colonies had kings, which it appointed in the exercise of its supremacy.

xxiii. 10. We understand the first clause to mean "overflow thy land like the Nile." The "daughter of Tarshish" can hardly be Tyre, but is rather the people of Tarshish introduced in verse 6. The Greek again applies it to Carthage, but curiously mistranslates the verse, "Cultivate thy land, for ships no more come from Carthage." The latter clause, "there is no more strength," rather means that the restraints imposed upon her colonies by Tyre are removed, and they are now free to develop.

xxiii. 11. For "against the merchant city" we may fairly put "concerning Canaan," the whole of which would suffer by the overthrow of Tyre.

time, witness the dividing of the Red sea, and the drowning of Pharaoh in it. He hath shaken the kingdoms that were most secure; and he hath now "given commandment" concerning this "merchant city, to destroy the strongholds thereof." As its beauty shall not intercede for it, but that shall be stained, so its strength shall not protect it, but that shall be broken. If any think it strange that a city so well fortified, and that hath so many powerful allies, should be so totally ruined, let them know that it is the Lord of hosts that hath "given a commandment to destroy the strongholds thereof;" and who can gainsay his orders, or hinder the execution of them?

2nd. The Chaldeans shall be the instrument of it; ver. 13, "Behold the land of the Chaldeans;" how easily they and their land were destroyed by the Assyrians. Though their own hands founded it, set up the towers of Babylon, and raised up its palaces, yet he, that is, the Assyrian, brought it to ruin; whence the Tyrians might infer that, as easily as the old Chaldeans were subdued by the Assyrians, so easily shall Tyre be vanquished by those new Chaldeans. Babel was built by the Assyrian, for "them that dwell in the wilderness." It may be rendered, for the ships. The Assyrians founded it for ships and shipmen, that traffic upon those vast rivers, Tigris and Euphrates, to the Persian and Indian seas, for men of the desert; for Babylon is called, "the desert of the sea," ch. xxi. 1. Thus Tyrus was built upon the sea for the like purpose; but the Assyrians (saith Dr. Lightfoot) brought that to ruin, now lately, in Hezekiah's time, and so shall Tyre hereafter be brought to ruin by Nebuchadnezzar. Would we look more upon others' falling and withering, we should not be so confident as we commonly are of the continuance of our own flourishing and standing.

15 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years,
According to the days of one king:
After the end of seventy years shall Tyre sing as an harlot.
16 Take an harp, go about the city,
Thou harlot that hast been forgotten;
Make sweet melody, sing many songs,
That thou mayest be remembered.
17 And it shall come to pass after the end of seventy years,
That the LORD will visit Tyre,
And she shall turn to her hire, [the world
And shall commit fornication with all the kingdoms of
Upon the face of the earth. [LORD:
18 And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the
It shall not be treasured nor laid up;
For her merchandise shall be for them that dwell before the LORD,
To eat sufficiently, and for durable clothing.

Here is, First. The time fixed for the continuance of the desolations of Tyre, which were not to be perpetual desolations; "Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years," ver. 15. So long it shall lie neglected and buried in obscurity. It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar much about the time that Jerusalem was, and lay as long as it did in its ruins. See the folly of that proud, ambitious conqueror. What the richer, what the stronger, was he for making himself master of Tyre, when all the inhabitants were driven out of it, and he had none of his own subjects to spare for the replenishing and fortifying of it? It is strange what pleasure men could take in destroying cities, and making "their memorial perish with them," Ps. ix. 6. He trampled on the pride of Tyre, and therein served God's purpose, but with greater pride; for which God soon after humbled him.

Secondly. A prophecy of the restoration of Tyre to its glory again. After the end of "seventy years, according to the years of one king," or one dynasty or family of kings, namely, that of Nebuchadnezzar; when that expired, the desolations of Tyre came to an end. And we may presume that Cyrus, at the same time when he released the Jews, and encouraged them to rebuild Jerusalem, released the Tyrians also, and encouraged them to rebuild Tyre. Thus the prosperity and adversity of places, as well as persons, are set the one over against the other; that the most glorious cities may not be secure, nor the most ruinous despair. It is foretold,

1. That God's providence shall again smile upon this ruined city; ver. 17, "The Lord will visit Tyre" in mercy; for, though he contend, he will not contend for ever. It is not said her old acquaintance shall visit her, the colonies she has planted, and the trading cities she has had correspondence with, they have forgotten her; but the Lord shall visit her by some unthought of turn; he shall cause his indignation towards her to cease, and then things will run of course into the former channel.

2. That she shall use her best endeavour to recover her trade again. She shall "sing as an harlot" that has been some time under correction for her lewdness; but when she is set at liberty, (so violent is the bent of corruption,) she will use her old arts of temptation. The Tyrians being returned from their captivity, and those that remained recovering new spirits thereupon, they shall contrive how to force a trade, shall procure the best choice of goods, undersell their neighbours, and be obliging to all customers; as a harlot that has been forgotten, when she comes to be spoken of again, recommends herself to company by singing and playing; takes a harp, goes about the city, perhaps in the night serenading, makes sweet melody, and sings many songs. These are innocent and allowable diversions, if soberly, and moderately, and modestly used, but those that value themselves upon their virtue should not be over fond of them, nor ambitious to excel in them; because, whatever they are now, anciently they were some of the baits with which harlots used to entice fools. Tyre shall now by degrees come to be the mart of nations again. She shall return to her hire, to her traffic again, and shall "commit fornication," that is, shall have dealings in trade (for he carries on the similitude of a harlot) "with all the kingdoms of the world," that she had formerly traded with in her prosperity. The love of worldly wealth is a spiritual whoredom, and therefore covetous people are called adulterers and adulteresses, Jas. iv. 4; and covetousness is a spiritual idolatry.

3. That having recovered her trade again, she shall make a better use of it than she had done formerly; and this good she should get by her calamities, ver. 18, "Her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord." The trade of Tyre, and all the gains of her trade, shall be devoted to God, and to his honour, and employed in his service; "It shall not be treasured" and hoarded up, as formerly, to be the matter of their pride, and the support of their carnal confidence; but it shall be laid out in acts of piety and charity. What they can spare from the maintenance of themselves and their families "shall be for them that dwell before the Lord," that is, for the priests, the Lord's ministers, that attend in his temple at Jerusalem; not to maintain them in pomp and grandeur, but that they and theirs may "eat sufficiently," may have food convenient for them, with as little as may be of that care which would divert them from their ministration; and that they may not have rich and fine clothing, but "durable clothing," that which is strong and lasting, (clothing for old men, so some read it,) as if the priests, though they were young, must wear such plain, grave clothing as old men used to wear. Now, 1st. This supposeth that religion should be set up in new Tyre, that they should come to the knowledge of the true God, and into communion with the Israel of God. Perhaps their being fellow captives with the Jews in Babylon (who had prophets with them there) disposed them to join with them in their worship there, and turned them from idols, as it cured the Jews of their idolatry; and when they were released with them, and, as they had reason to believe, for their sakes, when they were settled again in Tyre, they would send gifts and offerings to the temple, and presents to the priests. We find men of Tyre then dwelling in the land of Judah, Neh. xiii. 16. Tyre and Sidon were better disposed to religion in Christ's time than the cities of Israel; for if Christ had gone among them they would have repented, Mat. xi. 21. And we meet with Christians at Tyre, Acts xxi. 3, and many years after did Christianity flourish there. Some of the rabbins refer this prophecy of the conversion of Tyre to the days of the Messiah. 2nd. It directs those who have estates to make use of them in the service of God and religion, and to reckon that best laid up which is so laid out. Both the merchandise of the tradesmen and the hire of the day labourers shall be devoted to God. Both the merchandise, that is, the employment we follow, and the hire, that is, the gain of our employments, must be "holiness to the Lord," alluding to the motto engraven on the frontlet of the high priest, Ex. xxxix. 30; and to the separation of the tithe under the law, Lev. xxvii. 30. See a promise like this referring to gospel times, Zec. xiv. 20, 21. We must first give up ourselves to be holiness to the Lord, before what we do, or have, or get, can be so. When we abide with God in our particular callings, and do common actions after a godly sort,—when we abound in works of piety and charity, are liberal in relieving the poor, and supporting the ministry, and encouraging the Gospel,—then our merchandise and our hire is holiness to the Lord, if we sincerely look at his glory in it; and it need not be treasured and laid up on earth, for it is treasured and laid up in heaven, in "bags that wax not old," Lu. xii. 33.

CHAPTER XXIV.

It is agreed that here begins a new sermon, which is continued to the end of ch. xxvii., and in it the prophet, according to the directions he had received, doth in many precious promises, say to the righteous, It shall be well with them; and in many dreadful threatenings saith, Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them, ch. iii. 10, 11, and these are interwoven, that they may illustrate each other. This chapter is mostly threatening; and, as the judgments threatened are very sore and grievous ones, so the people threatened with those judgments are very many. It is not the burthen of any particular city or kingdom, as those before, but the burthen of the whole earth. The word indeed signifies only the land, because our own land is commonly to us as all the earth; but it is here explained by another word that is not so confined,—it is the world, ver. 4, so that it must at least take in a whole neighbourhood of nations. I. Some think (and very probably) that it is a prophecy of the great havoc that Sennacherib and his Assyrian army should now shortly make of many of the nations in that part of the world. II. Others make it to point at the like devastation which, about one hundred years after, Nebuchadnezzar and his armies should make in the same countries, going from one kingdom to another, not only to conquer them, but to ruin them, and lay them waste; for that was the method which those Eastern nations took in their wars. And the promises that are mixed with the threatenings are intended for the support and comfort of the people of God in those very calamitous times. And since here are no particular nations named either by whom or on whom those desolations should be brought, I see not but it may refer to both those events. Nay, the Scripture has many fulfillings, and we ought to give it its full latitude; and therefore I incline to think that the prophet from those and the like instances, which he had a particular eye to, designs here to represent in general the calamitous state of mankind, and the many miseries which human life is liable to, especially those that attend the wars of the nations. Surely the prophets were sent, not only to foretell particular events, but to form the minds of men to virtue and piety, and for that end their prophecies were written and preserved even for our learning, and therefore ought not to be looked upon as of private interpretation. Now, since a thorough conviction of the vanity of the world, and its insufficiency to make us happy, will go far towards bringing us to God, and drawing out our affections towards another world, the prophet here shews what vexation of spirit we must expect to meet with in these things, that we may never take up our rest in them, nor promise ourselves satisfaction anywhere short of the enjoyment of God. In this chapter we have, I. A threatening of desolating judgments for sin, ver. 1—12; to which is added an assurance that in the midst of them good people should be comforted, ver. 13—16. II. A farther threatening of the like desolations, ver. 16—22; to which is added an assurance that in the midst of all God should be glorified.

BEHOLD, the LORD maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste,
And turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof.
2 And it shall be, as with the people, so with the priest;
As with the servant, so with his master;
As with the maid, so with her mistress;
As with the buyer, so with the seller;
As with the lender, so with the borrower; [to him
As with the taker of usury, so with the giver of usury
3 The land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled:
For the LORD hath spoken this word.
4 The earth mourneth and fadeth away,
The world languisheth and fadeth away,
The haughty people of the earth do languish.
5 The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof;

xxiii. 12. Tyre is called the "virgin daughter of Zidon" because it had not before been conquered. Chittim may be Citium, in Cyprus.

xxiii. 13. Very different explanations have been given of this verse, which names the conqueror of Tyre. To remove the obscurity by any literal translation appears impossible, although a consistent sense may easily be conveyed by a slight paraphrase: "Behold, the land of the Chaldeans (a nation which did not exist until the Assyrians established the land for desert-rangers, reared its towers, and raised its palaces) reduces it to ruin." The Chaldeans, who owed their position to the Assyrians, should cast down Tyre.

xxiii. 14. "Strength" here is "stronghold." Tyre was the stronghold and protector of the Phœnician merchant-ships.

xxiii. 15—17. The seventy years were not those of any single reign, but of the Chaldean rule, as in Jer. xxv. 11. (Compare 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21.) The allusion to Tyre as a harlot may mean her speedy

Because they have transgressed the laws, changed the Broken the everlasting covenant [ordinance,
6 Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth,
And they that dwell therein are desolate:
Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned,
And few men left
7 The new wine mourneth,
The vine languisheth,
All the merryhearted do sigh.
8 The mirth of tabrets ceaseth,
The noise of them that rejoice endeth,
The joy of the harp ceaseth.
9 They shall not drink wine with a song;
Strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it.
10 The city of confusion is broken down:
Every house is shut up, that no man may come in.
11 There is a crying for wine in the streets;
All joy is darkened, the mirth of the land is gone.
12 In the city is left desolation,
And the gate is smitten with destruction.

It is a very dark and melancholy scene that this prophecy presents to our view; turn our eyes which way we will, everything looks dismal. These desolations are here described in a great variety of expressions to the same purpose, and all aggravating.

First. The earth is stripped of all its ornaments, and looks as if it were taken off its basis; it is made empty and waste, ver. 1, as if it were reduced to its first chaos, Tohu and Bohu, nothing but confusion and emptiness again, Gen. i. 2, "without form and void." It is true, earth sometimes signifies the land, and so the same word eretz, is here translated, ver. 3, "The land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled;" but I see not why it should not there, as well as ver. 1, be translated the earth; for most commonly, if not always, where it signifies some one particular land, it has something joined to it, or at least, not far from it, which doth so appropriate it; as, the land (or earth) of Egypt, or Canaan; or this land, or ours, or yours, or the like. It might indeed refer to some particular country, and an ambiguous word be used to warrant such an application; for it is good to apply to ourselves and our own lands what the Scripture saith in general of the "vanity and vexation of spirit" that attends all things here below; but it should seem designed to speak what often happens to many countries, and will do while the world stands, and what may, we know not how soon, happen to our own, and what is the general character of all earthly things; they are empty of all solid comfort and satisfaction, a little thing makes them waste. We often see numerous families and plentiful estates utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled, by one judgment or other, or perhaps only by a gradual and insensible decay. Sin has turned the earth upside down, it is become quite another thing to man from what it was when God made it to be his habitation; it has also scattered abroad the inhabitants thereof; the rebellion at Babel was the occasion of the dispersion there. How many ways are there in which the inhabitants both of towns and of private houses are scattered abroad, so that near relations and old neighbours know nothing of one another. To the same purpose, ver. 4, "the earth mourneth and fadeth away;" it disappoints those that placed their happiness in it, and raised their expectations high from it, and proves not what they promised themselves it would be. The whole "world languisheth and fadeth away," as hastening towards a dissolution; it is at the best like a flower which withers in the hands of those that please themselves too much with it, and lay it in their bosoms. And, as the earth itself grows old, so "they that dwell therein are desolate." Men carry crazy, sickly bodies along with them, are often solitary, and confined by afflictions, ver. 6. When "the earth languisheth," and that is not so fruitful as it used to be, then "they that dwell therein," that make it their home, and rest, and portion, "are desolate;" whereas they that by faith dwell in God, can rejoice in him even when the fig-tree doth not blossom. If we look abroad, and see in how many places pestilences and burning fevers rage, and what multitudes are swept away by them in a little time, so that sometimes the living scarce suffice to bury the dead, perhaps we shall understand what the prophet means when he saith, "The inhabitants of the earth are burned," or consumed, some by one disease, others by another, and there are but "few men left," in comparison. Note, The world we live in is a world of disappointment, a vale of tears, and a dying world; and the children of men in it are but of few days, and full of trouble.

Secondly. It is God that brings all these calamities upon the earth. The Lord that made the earth, and made it fruitful and beautiful for the service and comfort of man, now maketh it "empty, and maketh it waste," ver. 1; for its Creator is and will be its judge; he has an incontestable right to pass sentence upon it, and an irresistible power to execute that sentence. It is "the Lord that hath spoken this word," and he will do the work, ver. 3; it is his curse that hath "devoured the earth," ver. 6; the general curse which sin brought upon the ground for man's sake, Gen. iii. 17, and all the particular curses which families and countries bring upon themselves by their enormous wickedness. See the power of God's curse, how it makes all empty, and lays all waste. Those whom he curseth they are cursed indeed.

Thirdly. Persons of all ranks and conditions shall share in these calamities; ver. 2, "It shall be, as with the people, so with the priest," &c. This is true of many of the common calamities of human life; all are subject to the same diseases of body, sorrows of mind, afflictions in relations, and the like; there is one event to those of very different stations, time and chance happens to them all. It is in a special manner true of the destroying judgments which God sometimes brings upon sinful nations: when he pleaseth he can make them universal, so that none shall escape them, or be exempt from them; whether men have little or much, they shall lose it all. Those of the meaner rank smart first by famine; but those of the higher rank go first into captivity, while the poor of the land are left. It shall be all alike, 1. With high and low: "As with the people, so with the priest," or prince. The dignity of magistrates and ministers, and the respect and reverence owing to both, shall not secure them; "the faces of elders are not honoured," Lam. v. 12. The priests had been as corrupt and wicked as the people; and if their character serve not to restrain them from sin, how can they expect it should serve to secure them from judgments? in both it is "like people, like priest," Hos. iv. 8, 9. 2. With bond and free; "As with the servant, so with his master; as with the maid, so with her mistress." They have all corrupted their way, and therefore will all be made miserable when the earth is made waste. 3. With rich and poor. Those that have money beforehand, that are purchasing and letting out money to interest, will fare no better than those that are so impoverished that they are forced to sell their estates, and take up money at interest. There are judgments short of the great day of judgment, in which rich and poor meet together. Let not those that are advanced in the world set their inferiors at too great a distance, because they know not how soon they may be set upon a level with them. The rich man's wealth is his strong city in his own conceit; but it does not always prove so.

Fourthly. It is sin that brings these calamities upon the earth. Therefore the earth is made empty, and "fadeth away," because "it is defiled under the inhabitants thereof," ver. 5. It is polluted by the sins of men, and therefore it is made desolate by the judgments of God. Such is the filthy nature of sin, that it defiles the earth itself under the sinful inhabitants thereof, and it is rendered unpleasant in the eyes of God and good men: see Lev. xviii. 25, 27, 28. Blood in particular defiles the land, Num. xxxv. 33. The earth never spues out its inhabitants till they have first defiled it by their sins. Why, what have they done? 1. "They have transgressed the laws" of their creation, not answered the ends of it; the bonds of the law of nature have been broken by them, and they have cast from them the cords of their obligations to the God of nature. 2. They have "changed the ordinances" of revealed religion, those of them that have had the benefit of that; 'they have neglected the ordinances,' (so some read it,) and have made no conscience of observing them; they have passed over the laws in the commission of sin, and have passed by the ordinance in the omission of duty. 3. Herein they have "broken the everlasting covenant," which is a perpetual bond, and will be to those that keep it a perpetual blessing. It is God's wonderful condescension that he is pleased to deal with men in a covenant way; to do them good, and thereby oblige them to do him service. Even those that had no benefit by God's covenant with Abraham had benefit by his covenant with Noah and his sons, which is called an "everlasting covenant," his covenant with day and night; but they observe not the precepts of the sons of Noah, they acknowledge not God's goodness in the day and night, nor study to make him any grateful returns, and so break the everlasting covenant, and defeat the gracious designs and intentions of it.

Fifthly. These judgments shall humble men's pride, and mar their mirth. When the earth is made empty, 1. It is a great mortification to men's pride; ver. 4, "The haughty people of the earth do languish;" for they have lost that which supported their pride, and for which they magnified themselves. Those that have held their heads highest God can make them hang the head. 2. It is a great damp to men's jollity. This is enlarged upon much; ver. 7—9, "All the merry-hearted do sigh." Such is the nature of carnal mirth, it is but "as the crackling of thorns under a pot," Eccl. vii. 6. Great laughters commonly end in a sigh. They that make the world their chief joy cannot rejoice evermore. When God sends his judgment into the earth, he designs thereby to make those serious that were wholly addicted to their pleasures. "Let your laughter be turned into mourning." When the earth is emptied, the noise of them that rejoice in it endeth. Carnal joy is a noisy thing; but the noise of it will soon be at an end, and the end of it is heaviness. Two things are made use of to excite and express vain mirth, and the jovial crew is here deprived of both: 1st. Drinking; "the new wine mourneth," it is grown sour for want of drinking; for how proper soever it may be for "the heavy heart," Pr. xxxi. 6, it doth not relish then as it doth to the merry-hearted. "The vine languisheth," and gives little hopes of a vintage, and therefore "the merry-hearted do sigh;" for they know no other gladness but that of the corn and wine and oil increasing, Ps. iv. 7; and if you destroy their vines and their fig-trees you make all their mirth to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. "They shall not" now "drink wine with a song," as they used to do, and with huzzas; but rather drink it with a sigh. Nay, "strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it," because they cannot but mingle their tears with it; or through sickness they have lost their relish of it. God has many ways to embitter wine and strong drink to those that love them, and have the highest gust of them. Distemper of body, anguish of mind, the ruin of the estate or country, will make the strong drink bitter, and all the delights of sense tasteless and insipid. 2nd. Music; "The mirth of tabrets ceaseth," and "the joy of the harp," which used to be at their feasts, ch. v. 12. The captives in Babylon hang their harps on the willow-trees. In short, "All joy is darkened;" there is not a pleasant look to be seen, nor has any one power to force a smile; all "the mirth of the land is gone," ver. 11; and if it were that mirth which Solomon calls madness, there is no great loss of it.

Sixthly. The cities will, in a particular manner feel these desolations of the country; ver. 10, "The city of confusion is broken," is "broken down," so we read it. It lies exposed to invading powers, not only by the breaking down of its walls, but the confusion that the inhabitants are in. "Every house is shut up," perhaps by reason of the plague, which has burned or consumed the inhabitants, so that there are "few men left," ver. 6. Houses infected used to be shut up that no man may come in; or they are shut up because they are deserted and uninhabited. "There is a crying for wine," that is, for the spoiling of the vintage, so that there is like to be no wine. "In the city," in Jerusalem itself, that had been so much frequented, there shall be left nothing but desolation. Grass shall grow in the street, "and the gate is smitten with destruction," ver. 12; all that used to pass and repass through the gate are smitten, and all the strength of the city is cut off. How soon can God make a city of order a city of confusion, and then it will soon be a city of desolation.

13 When thus it shall be in the midst of the land among the people,
There shall be as the shaking of an olive tree,
And as the gleaning grapes when the vintage is done.
14 They shall lift up their voice, they shall sing [the sea.
For the majesty of the LORD, they shall cry aloud from 15 Wherefore glorify ye the LORD in the fires,
Even the name of the LORD God of Israel in the isles of the sea.

Here is mercy remembered in the midst of wrath. In Judah and Jerusalem, and the neighbouring countries, when they are overrun by the enemy, Sennacherib or Nebuchadnezzar, there shall be a remnant preserved from the general ruin, and it shall be a devout and pious remnant. And this method God usually observes when his judgments are abroad; he doth not make a full end, ch. vi. 13. Or we may take it thus: though the greatest part of mankind have all their comfort ruined by the emptying of the earth, and the making forgetfulness of affliction and return to folly. Phœnician immorality was notorious, and entered into even religious rites.

xxiii. 18. The wealth of resuscitated Tyre would be, in part at least, devoted to the service and worship of Jehovah.

xxiv. 1. The prophet returns again to Judea, and without naming it predicts its devastation. There is a power and depth in the thoughts which seem to indicate a broader and more enduring reference, but it is apparent that the direct aim of the inspired writer is to depict the woes of Israel. Hence, wherever the word "earth" occurs in our version, we should take it in its usual sense of "the land."

xxiv. 15. The word for "the fires" is better explained of "eastern climes," the allusion being to lands lying towards the rising sun. What "isles of the sea" are meant cannot be decided, because commerce was carried on with islands in the Indian Ocean, off the African coast, in the Mediterranean, and perhaps with the British Isles.

of that desolate, yet there are some few that understand themselves better, who have laid up their treasure in heaven, and not in things below, and therefore can keep up their comfort and joy in God, even then when "the earth mourneth and fadeth away." Observe,

First. The small number of this remnant, ver. 13. When all goes to ruin "there shall be as the shaking of an olive-tree, and the gleaning grapes," here and there one that shall escape the common calamity, (as Noah and his family when the old world was drowned,) that shall be able to sit down upon a heap of the ruins of all their creature comforts, and even then rejoice in the Lord, Hab. iii. 16, 17; who, when all faces gather blackness, can "lift up their heads with joy," Lu. xxi. 26, 28. These few are dispersed, and at a distance from each other, like the gleanings of the olive-tree, and they are concealed, hid under the leaves. The Lord only knows them that are his, the world doth not.

Secondly. The great devotion of this remnant, which is the greater for their having so narrowly escaped this great destruction; ver. 14, "They shall lift up their voice, they shall sing." 1. They shall sing for joy in their deliverance. When the mirth of carnal worldlings ceaseth, the joy of the saints is as lively as ever. When "the merry-hearted do sigh," because "the vine languisheth," the upright-hearted do sing, because the covenant of grace, the fountain of their comforts, and the foundation of their hopes, never fails. They that rejoice in the Lord can rejoice in tribulation, and by faith may be in triumphs when all about them are in tears. 2. "They shall sing" to the glory and praise of God; shall sing not only for the mercy but "for the majesty of the Lord." Their songs are awful and serious, and in their spiritual joys they have a reverent regard to the greatness of God, and keep at an humble distance when they attend him with their praises. "The majesty of the Lord," which is matter of terror to wicked people, furnisheth the saints with songs of praise. They shall sing for the magnificence or transcendent excellency of the Lord, shewed both in his judgments and in his mercies; for we must sing, and sing unto him, of both, Ps. ci. 1. Those that have made, or are making, their escape from the land, that being emptied and made desolate, to the sea, and the isles of the sea, shall from thence cry aloud. Their dispersion shall help to spread the knowledge of God, and they shall make even remote shores to ring with his praise. It is much for the honour of God if those that fear him rejoice in him, and praise him, even in the most melancholy times.

Thirdly. Their holy zeal to excite others to the same devotion, ver. 15. They encourage their fellow-sufferers to do likewise. 1. Those that are "in the fires," in the furnace of afflictions, those fires by which "the inhabitants of the earth are burned," ver. 6. Or, in the valleys, the low, dark, dirty places. 2. Those that are in the isles of the sea, whither they are banished, or are forced to flee for shelter, and hide themselves remote from all their friends. They went through fire and water, Ps. lxvi. 12, yet in both let them glorify the Lord, and glorify him as "the Lord God of Israel." They that through grace can glory in tribulation ought to glorify God in tribulation, and give him thanks for their comforts, which abound as their afflictions do abound. We must, in every fire, even the hottest, in every isle, even the remotest, keep up our good thoughts of God. When, though he slay us, yet we trust in him,—though for his sake we are killed all the day long, yet none of these things move us,—then we "glorify the Lord in the fires." Thus the three children, and the martyrs that sung at the stake.

16 From the uttermost part of the earth have we heard songs,
Even glory to the righteous.
But I said, My leanness, my leanness, woe unto me!
The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously;
Yea, the treacherous dealers have dealt very treacherously.
17 Fear, and the pit, and the snare,
Are upon thee, O inhabitant of the earth.
18 And it shall come to pass,
That he who fleeth from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit;
And he that cometh up out of the midst of the pit
Shall be taken in the snare:
For the windows from on high are open,
And the foundations of the earth do shake.
19 The earth is utterly broken down,
The earth is clean dissolved,
The earth is moved exceedingly.
20 The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard,
And shall be removed like a cottage;
And the transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it;
And it shall fall, and not rise again.
21 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall punish the hosts of the high ones that are on high,
And the kings of the earth upon the earth.
22 And they shall be gathered together,
As prisoners are gathered in the pit,
And shall be shut up in the prison,
And after many days shall they be visited.
23 Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed,
When the LORD of hosts shall reign in mount Zion,
And in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.

These verses, as those before, plainly speak,

First. Comfort to saints. They may be driven by the common calamities of the places where they live into "the uttermost parts of the earth," or perhaps they are forced thither for their religion; but there they are singing, not sighing: from thence "have we heard songs," and it is a comfort to us to hear them,—to hear that good people carry their religion along with them, even to the most distant regions; to hear that God visits them there, and gives encouragement to hope that from thence "he will gather them," Deu. xxx. 4. And this is their song, even "glory to the righteous," (it is singular, To the righteous God,) who is just in all he has brought upon us; this is glorifying the Lord in the fires; or, these songs redound to the glory or beauty of the righteous that sing them. We do the greatest honour imaginable to ourselves when we employ ourselves in honouring and glorifying God. This may have reference to the sending of the Gospel to "the uttermost parts of the earth," as far off as this island of ours, in the days of the Messiah, the glad tidings of which are echoed back in songs heard from thence, from churches planted there, even "Glory to the righteous" God; agreeing with the angels' song, "Glory be to God in the highest," and glory to all righteous men; for the work of redemption was ordained before the world for our glory.

Secondly. Terror to sinners. The prophet, having comforted himself and others with the prospect of a saved remnant, returns to lament the miseries he saw breaking in like a mighty torrent upon the earth; "But I said, My leanness, my leanness, woe unto me!" ver. 16; the very thought of it frets me, and makes me lean. He foresees,

1. The prevalency of sin, that iniquity should abound; ver. 16, "The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously." This is itself a judgment, and that which provokes God to bring other judgments. 1st. Men are false to one another. There is no faith in man, but a universal dishonesty; truth, that sacred bond of society, is departed, and there is nothing but treachery in men's dealings: see Jer. ix. 1, 2. 2nd. They are all false to their God. As to him and their covenant with him, the children of men are all "treacherous dealers," and have dealt very treacherously with their God, in departing from their allegiance to him. This is the original, and this is the aggravation of the sin of the world; and when men have been false to their God how should they be true to any other?

2. The prevalency of wrath and judgment for that sin. 1st. The inhabitants of the earth will be pursued from time to time, from place to place, by one mischief or other; ver. 17, 18, "Fear, and the pit, and the snare." Fear of the pit and the snare are upon them wherever they are; for the sons of men know not what evil time they may suddenly be snared in, Eccl. ix. 12. These three words seem to be chosen for the sake of an elegant paronomasia, or, as we now scornfully call it, a jingle of words, pachad, and pachath, and pach; but the meaning is plain, ver. 18, that "evil pursueth sinners," Pr. xiii. 21; that the curse shall overtake the disobedient, Deu. xxviii. 15; that those who are secure, because they have escaped one judgment, know not how soon another may arrest them. What this prophet threatens all the inhabitants of the earth with, another makes part of the judgment of Moab, Jer. xlviii. 43, 44. But it is a common instance of the calamitous state of human life, that when we seek to avoid one mischief we fall into a worse, and that the end of one trouble is often the beginning of another; so that we are least safe when we are most secure. 2nd. The earth itself will be shaken to pieces. It will be literally so at last, when all the works therein shall be burnt up; and often before that period figuratively so; "The windows from on high are open" to pour down wrath, as in the universal deluge. "Upon the wicked God shall rain snares," Ps. xi. 6; and the fountains of the great deep being broken up, "the foundations of the earth do shake" of course; the frame of nature is unhinged, and all is in confusion. See how elegantly this is expressed, ver. 19, 20, "The earth is utterly broken down;" it is "clean dissolved;" it is "moved exceedingly," moved out of its place. God shakes heaven and earth, Hag. ii. 6. See the misery of those who lay up their treasures in the things of the earth, and mind those things; they place their confidence in that which will shortly be "utterly broken down and dissolved;" "The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard," so unsteady, so uncertain, are all the motions of these things. Worldly men dwell in it as in a palace, as in a castle, as in an impregnable tower; but it "shall be removed like a cottage," so easily, so suddenly, and with so little loss to the great Landlord. The pulling down of the earth will be but like the pulling down of a cottage, which the country is willing to be rid of, because it does but harbour beggars; and therefore no care is taken to rebuild it; it "shall fall, and not rise again." But there shall be new heavens and a new earth, in which shall dwell nothing but righteousness. But what is it that shakes the earth thus, and sinks it? It is "the transgression thereof" that "shall be heavy upon it." Note, Sin is a burthen to the whole creation; it is a heavy burthen, a burthen under which it groans now, and will sink at last. Sin is the ruin of states, and kingdoms, and families; they shall fall under the weight of that talent of lead, Zec. v. 7, 8.

3. God will have a particular controversy with the kings and great men of the earth; ver. 21, "He will punish the hosts of the high ones." Hosts of princes are no more before God than hosts of common men. What can a host of high ones do with their combined force, when the Most High, the Lord of hosts, contends with them to abase their height, and scatter their hosts, and break all their confederacies? The "high ones that are on high," that are puffed up with their height and grandeur, that think themselves so high that they are out of the reach of any danger, God will visit upon them all their pride and cruelty, with which they have oppressed and injured their neighbours and subjects, and it shall now return upon their own heads. "The kings of the earth" shall now be reckoned with "upon the earth," to shew that "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth," and will render to the proudest of kings according to the fruit of their doings. Let those that are trampled upon by the high ones of the earth comfort themselves with this, that though they cannot, dare not, must not resist them, yet there is a God that will call them to an account, that will triumph over them upon their own dunghill,—and the earth they are kings of in the eye of God is no better. This is general only; it is particularly foretold, ver. 22, that they shall be "gathered together as prisoners." Convicted, condemned "prisoners are gathered in the pit," or dungeon; and there they shall be shut up under close confinement. The kings and high ones, that took all possible liberty themselves, and took a pride and pleasure in shutting up others, shall now be themselves shut up. Let not the free man glory in his freedom, no more than the strong man in his strength, for he knows not what restraints he is reserved for; but "after many days shall they be visited." Either, 1st. They shall be visited in wrath. It is the same word in another form that is used ver. 21; The Lord shall punish them. They shall be reserved to the day of execution, as condemned prisoners are, and as fallen angels are "reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day," Jude 6. Let this account for the delays of Divine vengeance. Sentence is not executed speedily, because execution-day is not yet come, and perhaps will not come till "after many days;" but it is certain that "the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction," and is therefore preserved in the mean time, but "shall be brought forth to the day of wrath," Job xxi. 30. Let us therefore judge nothing before the time. 2nd. They shall be visited in mercy, and be discharged from their imprisonment, and shall obtain, if not their dignity, yet their liberty again. Nebuchadnezzar, in his conquests, made many kings and princes his captives, and kept them in the dungeon in Babylon, xxiv. 18. It is quite true that the land is spoken of as having foundations, but it is not correct to say "the windows from on high are open." There is no clear case in the Bible in which arubboth means the windows of a house. It only occurs ten times, in seven of which it is put for outlets by which rain, &c., descend from above; once it signifies smoke-holes, or chimneys, once pigeon-holes, and once (Eccles. xii. 3) it is doubtful, though in the last case the allusion may be to the stars. All this passage is of course metaphorical in substance, as it would be impossible to take this and the next verses literally.

xxiv. 23. The splendour of the sun and moon will be as nothing to that of the divine kingdom which shall be set up on Zion. "His ancients" means "his elders," but whether only elders officially or not is doubtful.

xxv. 1, 2. Praise for deliverance is at once followed by reference to the fall of Babylon, as most understand it.

and among the rest, Jehoiachin, king of Judah; but "after many days," when his head was laid, his son visited them, and granted, as should seem, some reviving to them all in their bondage; for it is made an instance of his particular kindness to Jehoiachin, that he "set his throne above the throne of the rest of the kings that were with him," Jer. lii. 32. If we apply it to the general state of mankind, it speaks a revolution of conditions. Those that were high are punished, those that were punished are relieved after many days, that none in this world may be secure, though their condition be never so prosperous, nor any despair, though their condition be never so deplorable.

Thirdly. Glory to God in all this, ver. 23. When all this comes to pass, when the proud enemies of God's church are humbled, and brought down, 1. Then shall it appear beyond contradiction, that the Lord reigns, which is always true, but not always alike evident. When the kings of the earth are punished for their tyranny and oppression, then it is proclaimed and proved to all the world that God is King of kings, King above them, by whom they are conquerable. King over them, to whom they are accountable; that he reigns as "Lord of hosts," of all hosts, of their hosts; that he reigns "in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem;" in his church, for the honour and welfare of that, pursuant to the promises on which that is founded, reigns in his word and ordinances; that he reigns "before his ancients," before all his saints, especially before his ministers, the elders of his church, who have their eye upon all the outgoings of his power and providence, and in all these events observe his hand. God's ancients, the old disciples, the experienced Christians, that have often, when they have been perplexed, gone into the sanctuary of God in Zion and Jerusalem, and acquainted themselves with his manifestation of himself there, they shall see more than others of God's dominion and sovereignty in these operations of his providence. 2. Then it shall appear beyond comparison that he reigns gloriously, in such brightness and lustre, that "the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed," as the lesser lights are eclipsed and extinguished by the greater. Great men, that thought themselves to have as bright a lustre, and as vast a dominion, as the sun and moon, shall be ashamed when God appears above them, much more when he appears against them. Then shall their faces be filled with shame, that they may seek God's name. The Eastern nations worshipped the sun and moon; but when God shall appear so gloriously for his people against his and their enemies, all these pretended deities shall be ashamed that ever they received the homage of their deluded worshippers. The glory of the Creator infinitely outshines the glory of the brightest creatures. In the great day, when the Judge of heaven and earth shall shine forth in his glory, "the sun shall," by his transcendent lustre, "be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood."

CHAPTER XXV.

After the threatenings of wrath in the foregoing chapter, we have here, I. Thankful praises for what God had done, which the prophet, in the name of the church, offers up to God, and teacheth us to offer the like, ver. 1—5. II. Precious promises of what God would yet farther do for his church, especially in the grace of the Gospel, ver. 6—8. III. The church's triumph in God over her enemies thereupon, ver. 9—12. This chapter looks as pleasantly upon the church as the former looked dreadfully upon the world.

O LORD, thou art my God;
I will exalt thee, I will praise thy name;
For thou hast done wonderful things;
Thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth
2 For thou hast made of a city an heap;
Of a defenced city a ruin:
A palace of strangers to be no city;
It shall never be built.
3 Therefore shall the strong people glorify thee
The city of the terrible nations shall fear thee
4 For thou hast been a strength to the poor,
A strength to the needy in his distress,
A refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat,
When the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall.
5 Thou shalt bring down the noise of strangers,
As the heat in a dry place;
Even the heat with the shadow of a cloud:
The branch of the terrible ones shall be brought low.

It was said in the close of the foregoing chapter, that the Lord of hosts shall reign gloriously; now, in compliance with that, the prophet here speaks of "the glorious majesty of his kingdom," Ps. cxlv. 12, and gives him the glory of it; and however it might have an accomplishment in the destruction of Babylon, and the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity there, it seems to look farther to the praises that should be offered up to God by the Gospel church, for Christ's victories over our spiritual enemies, and the comforts he has provided for all believers. Here,

First. The prophet determines to praise God himself; for they that would stir up others should in the first place stir up themselves to praise God; ver. 1, "O Lord, thou art my God," a God in covenant with me. When God is punishing the kings of the earth upon the earth, and making them to tremble before him, a poor prophet can go to him, and with an humble boldness say, "O Lord, thou art my God," and therefore, "I will exalt thee, I will praise thy name." Those that have the Lord for their God are obliged to praise him; for therefore he took us to be his people, that we might be unto him "for a name, and for a praise," Jer. xiii. 11. In praising God we exalt him, not that we can make him higher than he is, but we must make him to appear to ourselves and others higher than he doth: see Ex. xv. 2.

Secondly. He pleaseth himself with the thought that others also shall be brought to praise God; ver. 3, Therefore because of the desolations thou hast made in the earth by thy providence, Ps. xlv. 8, and the just vengeance thou hast taken on thine and thy church's enemies, "therefore shall the strong people glorify thee" in concert, and "the city," that is, the metropolis, "of the terrible nations," or the cities of such nations, "shall fear thee." This may be understood, 1. Of those people that have been strong and terrible against God. Those that have been enemies to God's kingdom, and have fought against the interests of it with a great deal of strength and terror, shall either be converted, and glorify God by joining with his people in his service, or at least convinced, so as to own themselves conquered. Those that had been the terror of the mighty shall be forced to tremble before the judgments of God, and call in vain to rocks and mountains to hide them. Or, 2. Of those that shall be now made strong and terrible for God and by him, though before they were weak and trampled upon. They that fear God, and glorify him, he shall so visibly appear for them, and with them, that all shall acknowledge them a strong people, and shall stand in awe of them. There was a time when "many of the people of the land became Jews, for the fear of the Jews fell upon them," Est. viii. 17, and when they that knew their God were strong and did exploits, Dan. xi. 32, for which they glorify God.

Thirdly. He observes what is and ought to be the matter of this praise. We and others must exalt God and praise him; for,

1. He has done wonders, according to the counsel of his own will, ver. 1. We exalt God by admiring what he has done as truly wonderful; wonderful proofs of his power, beyond what any creature could perform; and wonderful proofs of his goodness, beyond what such sinful creatures as we are could expect. These wonderful things, which are new and surprising to us, and altogether unthought of, are according to his counsels of old, devised by his wisdom, and designed for his own glory, and the comfort of his people. All the operations of providence are according to God's eternal counsels, and those faithfulness and truth itself, all consonant to his attributes, consistent with one another, and sure to be accomplished in their season.

2. He has in particular humbled the pride and broken the power of the mighty ones of the earth; ver. 2, "Thou hast made of a city," of many a city, a heap of rubbish; of many a defenced city, that thought itself well guarded by nature and art, and the multitude and courage of its militia, thou hast made a ruin; for what created strength can hold out against Omnipotence? Many a city that has been so richly built that it might be called a palace, and so much frequented and visited by persons of the best rank from all parts, that it might be called a palace of strangers, yet thou hast made to be no city; it is levelled with the ground, and not one stone left upon another, and it shall never be built again. This has been the case of many cities in divers parts of the world, and in our own nation particularly; cities that flourished once are gone to decay and lost, and it is scarce known (except by urns or coins digged up out of the earth) where they stood. How many of the cities of Israel have long since been heaps and ruins? God hereby teacheth us that "here we have no continuing city," and must therefore seek one to come, which will never be a ruin, or go to decay.

3. He hath seasonably relieved and succoured his necessitous and distressed people; ver. 4, "Thou hast been a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy." As God weakens the strong that are proud and secure, so he strengthens the weak that are humble and serious, and stay themselves upon him; nay, he not only makes them strong, but he is himself their strength, for in him they strengthen themselves, and it is his favour and grace that is the strength of their hearts. He is "a strength to the needy in distress," then when he needs strength, and when his distress drives him to God. And as he strengthens them against their inward decays, so he shelters them from outward assaults. He is a refuge from the storm of rain or hail, and a shadow from the scorching heat of the sun in summer. God is a sufficient protection to his people in all weathers, both hot and cold, wet and dry. The "armour of righteousness" serves both "on the right hand and on the left," 2 Cor. vi. 7. Whatever danger or troubles God's people may be in, effectual care is taken that they shall sustain no real hurt or damage. When perils are most frightening and most threatening, God will then appear for the safety of his people; "When the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall," which makes a great noise, but cannot overthrow the wall. The enemies of God's poor are terrible ones; they do all they can to make themselves so to them; their rage is like a blast of wind, loud, and blustering, and furious, but is, as the wind is, under a Divine check; for God "holds the winds in his fists;" and God will be such a shelter to his people as that they shall be able to stand the shock, keep their ground, and maintain their integrity and peace. A storm beating on a ship tosseth it, but that which beats on a wall never stirs it, Ps. lxxvi. 10; cxxxviii. 7.

4. That he doth and will shelter those that trust in him from the insolence of their proud oppressors; ver. 5, "Thou shalt," or thou dost, "bring down the noise of strangers;" thou shalt abate and still it, as "the heat in a dry place" is abated and moderated by "the shadow of a cloud" interposing; the "branch," or rather, the song or triumph of the "terrible ones," shall be brought low, and they shall be made to change their note, and fall their voice. Observe here, 1st. The oppressors of God's people are called "strangers," for they forget that those they oppress are made of the same mould, of the same blood with them. They are called terrible ones, for so they affect to be, rather than amiable ones; they would rather be feared than loved. 2nd. Their insolence towards the people of God is noisy and hot, and that is all. It is but the noise of strangers, who think to carry their point by hectoring and bullying all that stand in their way, and talking big. "Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise," Jer. xlvi. 17. It is like the heat of the sun scorching in the middle of the day, but where is it when the sun is set? 3rd. Their noise, and heat, and all their triumph will be humbled and brought low, when their hopes are baffled, and all their honours laid in the dust; the branches, even the top branches, of the terrible ones will be broken off and thrown to the dunghill. 4th. If the labourers in God's vineyard be at any time called to "bear the burthen and heat of the day," he will find some way or other to refresh them as "with the shadow of a cloud," that they may not be pressed above measure.

6 And in this mountain shall the LORD of hosts make unto all people
A feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees,
Of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined.
7 And he will destroy in this mountain
The face of the covering cast over all people,
And the vail that is spread over all nations.
8 He will swallow up death in victory;
And the Lord GOD will wipe away tears from off all faces;
And the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth:
For the LORD hath spoken it.

xxv. 5. As a cloud silently deadens the force of the sun's rays, so shall the fury of strange tongues be diminished by providential interposition. For "branch" in the last clause we should put "song," properly a song of triumph, a pæan.

xxv. 6. "Wines on the lees," or wines which have been allowed to stand until they are fine, and the dregs have settled, were prized for their clearness and purity.

xxv. 7. "The face of the covering" really means a face-covering or veil. For the application of a similar idea to Israel by St. Paul, see 2 Cor. iii. 13—16; also verse 18, where the effects of the removal of the veil from the believers of every nation are described.

xxv. 8. This verse is partly quoted by St. Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 54.

xxv. 10. The Moabites were persistent enemies of Israel, and the prophet foretells that one feature of restored prosperity would be the suppression of obstinate foes. The idea is continued in the next verses.

xxvi 1-4. The general idea of these verses is no doubt that of a

If we suppose, as many do, that this refers to the great joy that should be in Zion and Jerusalem, either when the army of the Assyrians was routed by an angel, or when the Jews were released out of their captivity in Babylon, or upon occasion of some other the like surprising deliverance, yet we cannot avoid making it to look farther to the grace of the Gospel, and the glory which is the crown and consummation of that grace; for it is at our resurrection through Christ that the saying that is here written "shall be brought to pass;" then, and not till then, (if we may believe St. Paul,) it shall have its full accomplishment, "Death is swallowed up in victory," 1 Cor. xv. 54; that is a key to the rest of the promises here that are in the same chain. And so we have here a prophecy of that salvation and that grace which was to be brought unto us by Jesus Christ, into which "the prophets inquired and searched diligently," 1 Pet. i. 10.

First. That the grace of the Gospel should be a royal feast for all people; not like that of Ahasuerus, which was intended only to shew the grandeur of the master of the feast, Est. i. 4, for this is intended to gratify the guests; and therefore, whereas all there was for show, all here is for substance. The preparation made in the Gospel for the kind reception of penitents and supplicants with God are often in the New Testament set forth by the similitude of a feast, as Mat. xxii. 1, which seems to be borrowed from this here. 1. God himself is the master of the feast, and we may be sure he prepares like himself, as becomes him to give, rather than as becomes us to receive. The Lord of hosts makes this feast. 2. The guests invited are "all people," Gentiles as well as Jews. "Go, preach the Gospel to every creature:" there is enough for all; and whoever will may "come and take freely," even those that are gathered out of the highways and the hedges. 3. The place is mount Zion; thence the preaching of the Gospel takes rise, the preachers must begin at Jerusalem. The gospel church is the "Jerusalem that is above;" there this feast is made, and to it all the invited guests must go. 4. The provision is very rich, and every thing is of the best. It is a feast, which supposeth abundance and variety; it is a continual feast to believers, it is their own fault if it be not; it is a "feast of fat things," and "full of marrow;" so relishing, so nourishing are the comforts of the Gospel to all those that feast upon them, and digest them. The returning prodigal was entertained with the fatted calf; and David has that pleasure in communion with God with which his soul is "satisfied as with marrow and fatness." It is a feast of "wines on the lees;" the strongest-bodied wines, that have been kept long upon the lees, and then are well refined from them, so that they are clear and fine. There is that in the Gospel which, like wine soberly used, "makes glad the heart," and raiseth the spirits, and is fit for those that are of heavy heart, being under convictions of sin, and mourning for it, that they may drink and forget their misery, (for that is the proper use of wine, it is a cordial for those that need it, Pr. xxxi. 6, 7;) may be of good cheer, knowing that their sins are forgiven; and may be vigorous in their spiritual work and warfare, as a strong man refreshed with wine.

Secondly. That the world should be freed from that darkness of ignorance and mistake, in the mists of which it had been so long lost and buried; ver. 7, "He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering;" that is, the covering of the face, with which all people are covered, that is, hoodwinked or blindfolded, so that they cannot see their way, nor go about their work, and by reason of which they wander endlessly. Their faces are covered as men condemned, or as dead men; there is a veil "spread over all nations," for they all sat in darkness; and no marvel, when the Jews themselves, among whom God was known, had a veil upon their hearts, 2 Cor. iii. 15. But this veil the Lord will destroy by the light of his Gospel shining in the world, and the power of his Spirit opening men's eyes to receive it. He will raise those to spiritual life that had long been dead in trespasses and sins.

Thirdly. That death should be conquered, the power of it broken, and the property of it altered; "He will swallow up death in victory," ver. 8. 1. Christ will himself, in his resurrection, triumph over death; will break its bands, its bars, asunder, and cast away all its cords. The grave seemed to swallow him up, but really he swallowed it up. 2. The happiness of the saints shall be out of the reach of death, which puts a period to all the enjoyments of this world, embitters them, and stains the beauty of them. 3. Believers may triumph over death, and look upon it as a conquered enemy. "O death, where is thy sting?" 4. When the dead bodies of the saints shall be raised at the great day, and their "mortality swallowed up of life," then death will be for ever swallowed up of victory: and it is the last enemy.

Fourthly. That grief shall be banished, and there shall be perfect and endless joy; "The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces." Those that mourn for sin shall be comforted, and have their consciences pacified. In the covenant of grace there shall be that provided which is sufficient to balance all the sorrows of this present time, to wipe away our tears, and to refresh us. Those particularly that suffer for Christ shall have consolation abounding as their afflictions do abound; but in the joys of heaven, and nowhere short of them, will fully be "brought to pass this saying," as that before, for there it is that God shall "wipe away all tears," Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 4; and therefore "there shall be no more sorrow," because "there shall be no more death." The hope of this should now wipe away all excessive tears, all the weeping that hinders sowing.

Fifthly. That all the reproach cast upon religion, and the serious professors of it, shall be for ever rolled away. "The rebuke of his people," which they have long lain under, the calumnies and misrepresentations by which they have been blackened, the insolence and cruelty with which their persecutors have trampled on them, and trodden them down, shall be taken away. Their righteousness shall be brought forth as the light in the view of all the world, who shall be convinced they are not such as they have been invidiously characterised; and so their salvation from the injuries done them as such shall be wrought out. Sometimes in this world God doth that for his people which takes away their reproach from among men; however, it will be done effectually at the great day, for "the Lord hath spoken it," who can and will make it good. Let us patiently bear sorrow and shame now, and improve both, for shortly both will be done away.

9 And it shall be said in that day,
Lo, this is our God;
We have waited for him, and he will save us:
This is the LORD;
We have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.
10 For in this mountain shall the hand of the LORD rest,
And Moab shall be trodden down under him,
Even as straw is trodden down for the dunghill.
11 And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them,
As he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim:
And he shall bring down their pride
Together with the spoils of their hands.
12 And the fortress of the high fort of thy walls shall he bring down,
Lay low, and bring to the ground, even to the dust.

Here is, First. The welcome which the church shall give to these blessings promised in the foregoing verses; ver. 9, "It shall be said in that day," with an humble, holy triumph and exultation, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him." Thus will the deliverance of the church out of long and sore troubles be celebrated; thus will it be as "life from the dead." With such transports of joy and praise will those entertain the glad tidings of the Redeemer who looked for him and for redemption in Jerusalem by him; and with such a triumphant song as this will glorified saints enter into the joy of their Lord. 1. God himself must have the glory of all; "Lo, this is our God," "this is the Lord." This which is done is his doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. Herein he has done like himself; has magnified his own wisdom, power, and goodness. Herein he has done for us like our God, a God in covenant with us, and whom we serve. Note, Our triumphs must not terminate in what God doth for us, and gives to us, but must pass through them to himself, who is the author and giver of them. "This is our God." Have any of the nations of the earth such a God to trust to? No, "their rock is not as our rock: there is none like unto the God of Jeshurun." 2. The longer it has been expected, the more welcome it is. This is he whom we have waited for in dependence upon his word of promise, and a full assurance that he would come in the set time, in due time, and therefore were willing to tarry his time. And now we find it is not in vain to wait for him; for the mercy comes at last, with an abundant recompence for the delay. 3. It is matter of joy unspeakable. "We will be glad and rejoice in his salvation;" we that share in the benefits of it will concur in the joyful thanksgivings for it. 4. It is an encouragement to hope for the continuance and perfection of this salvation: "We have waited for him, and he will save us," will carry on what he has begun; for, as for God, our God, his work is perfect.

Secondly. A prospect of farther blessings for the securing and perpetuating of these. 1. The power of God shall be engaged for them, and shall continue to take their part. "In this mountain shall the hand of the Lord rest," ver. 10. The church and people of God shall have continued proofs of God's presence with them, and residence among them; his hand shall be continually over them to protect and guard them, and continually stretched out to them for their supply. Mount Zion is his rest for ever; here he will dwell. 2. The power of their enemies that is engaged against them shall be broken. Moab is here put for all the adversaries of God's people that are vexatious to them; they shall all be trodden down, or threshed, (for then they beat out the corn by treading it,) and shall be thrown out as straw to the dunghill, being good for nothing but to make muck of. God having caused his hand to rest upon this mountain, it shall not be a hand that hangs down, or is folded up, feeble and inactive; but "he shall spread forth his hands in the midst" of his people, like one that swims; which intimates that he will employ and exert his power for them vigorously, that he will be doing for them on all sides, that he will easily and effectually put by the opposition that is given to his gracious intentions for them, and thereby further and push forward his good work among them; and he will be continually active on their behalf, for so the swimmer is. It is foretold particularly what he shall do for them; 1st. He shall bring down the pride of their enemies (which Moab was notoriously guilty of, ch. xvi. 6) by one humbling judgment after another, stripping them of that which they are proud of. 2. He shall bring down the spoils of their hands, shall take from them that which they have got by spoil and rapine; he shall bring down the arms of their hands, which are lifted up against God's Israel; he shall quite break their power, and disable them to do mischief. 3rd. He shall ruin all their fortifications, ver. 12. Moab hath his walls, and his high forts, with which he hopes to secure himself, and from which he designs to annoy the people of God; but God shall bring them all down, lay them low, bring them to the ground, to the dust; and so they who trusted to them will be left exposed. There is no fortress impregnable to Omnipotence; no fort so high, but the arm of the Lord can overtop it, and bring it down. This destruction of Moab is typical of Christ's victory over death, spoken of ver. 8, his spoiling principalities and powers in his cross, Col. ii. 15, and his pulling down of Satan's strongholds, by the preaching of his Gospel, 2 Cor. x. 4, and his reigning till all his enemies be made his footstool, Ps. cx. 1.

CHAPTER XXVI.

This chapter is a song of holy joy and praise, in which the great things God hath engaged, in the foregoing chapter, to do for his people against his and their enemies are celebrated. It is prepared to be sung when that prophecy shall be accomplished; for we must be forward to meet God with our thanksgivings, when he is coming towards us with his mercies. Now the people of God are here taught, I. To triumph in the safety and holy security both of the church in general and of every particular member of it, under the Divine protection, ver. 1—4. II. To triumph over all opposing powers, ver. 5, 6. III. To walk with God, and wait for him in the worst and darkest times, ver. 7—9. IV. To lament the stupidity of those who regarded not the providences of God, either merciful or afflictive, ver. 10, 11. V. To encourage themselves, and one another, with hopes that God would still continue to do them good, ver. 12, 14; and engage themselves to continue in his service, ver. 13. VI. To recollect the providences of God that had been concerning them in their low and distressed condition, and their carriage under those providences, ver. 15—18. VII. To rejoice in hope of a glorious deliverance, which should be as a resurrection to them, ver. 19; and to retire in the expectation of it, ver. 20, 21. And this is written for the support and assistance of the faith and hope of God's people in all ages, even those upon whom the ends of the world are come.

IN that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah;
We have a strong city;
Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks.
2 Open ye the gates,
That the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in.
3 Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace,
Whose mind is stayed on thee:
Because he trusteth in thee.

---

nation returning from exile to its metropolis, assured that God's providence will watch over the men that trust therein. Walls and other material safeguards may be in ruins, but security and protection will be sure. Of the higher spiritual bearing no doubt can exist.

xxvi. 5, 6. The degradation of the Babylonians, and the fall of their capital, here follow as a contrast to the previous picture of Jerusalem re-occupied.

xxvi. 7. The second clause might be translated, "Thou, who art upright, dost make plain the course of a just man."

xxvi. 8. Barnes has "laws," where our version more correctly has "judgments."

xxvi. 11. This not very clear verse has been made darker by some of the critics. We understand it to mean, "O Lord, they would not see thy lifted hand; they shall see and shall be ashamed at the zeal of the people, yea, fire shall devour thine enemies."

4 Trust ye in the LORD for ever:
For in the LORD JEHOVAH is everlasting strength:

To the prophecies of gospel grace very fitly is a song annexed, in which we may give God the glory and take to ourselves the comfort of that grace. In that day, the gospel day, which the day of the victories and enlargements of the Old Testament church was typical of—to some of which, perhaps, this hath a primary reference—"in that day this song shall be sung;" there shall be persons to sing it, and cause and hearts to sing it. It shall be sung "in the land of Judah," which was a figure of the gospel church; for the gospel covenant is said to be made "with the house of Judah," Heb. viii. 8. Glorious things are here said of the church of God.

First. That it is strongly fortified against those that are bad: ver. 1, "We have a strong city." It is a city incorporated by the charter of the everlasting covenant, fitted for the reception of all that are made free by that charter, for their employment and entertainment. It is a strong city, as Jerusalem was, while it was a city compact together, and had God himself a wall of fire round about it; so strong, that none would have believed that an enemy could ever "have entered into the gates of Jerusalem," Lam. iv. 12. The church is a strong city, for it has walls and bulwarks, or counterscarps, and those of God's own appointing; for he has in his promise appointed salvation itself to be its defence. Those that are designed for salvation, that will be their protection, 1 Pet. i. 4.

Secondly. That it is richly replenished with those that are good, and those are instead of fortifications to it; for the inhabitants of Jerusalem, if they are such as they should be, are its strength, Zec. xii. 5. The gates are here ordered to be opened, "that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in," ver. 2; those had been banished and driven out by the iniquity of the former times, but now the laws that were made against them are repealed, and they have liberty to enter in again. Or, there is an act for a general naturalization of all the righteous, whatever nation they are of, encouraging them to come and settle in Jerusalem. When God hath done great things for any place or people, he expects that thus they should render according to the benefit done unto them; they should be kind to his people, and take them under their protection, and into their bosom. Note, 1. It is the character of righteous men that they keep the truths of God; a firm belief of which will have a mighty influence upon the regularity of the whole conversation. Good principles fixed in the head will produce good resolutions in the heart and good practices in the life. 2. It is the interest of states to countenance such, and court them among them, for they bring a blessing with them.

Thirdly. That all that belong to it are safe and easy, and have a holy security and serenity of mind in the assurance of God's favour. 1. This is here the matter of a promise; ver. 3, "Thou wilt keep him in peace," peace, "in perfect peace;" inward peace, outward peace; peace with God, peace of conscience, peace at all times, under all events; this peace shall he be put into, and kept in the possession of, whose mind is stayed upon God because it trusteth in him. It is the character of every good man, that he trusts in God, puts himself under his conduct and government, and depends upon him that it shall be vastly to his advantage to do so. They that trust in God must have their mind stayed upon him, must trust him at all times, under all events, must firmly and faithfully adhere to him, with an entire satisfaction in him; and such as do so God will keep in perpetual peace, and that peace shall keep them. When evil tidings are abroad they shall calmly expect the event, and not be disturbed by frightful apprehensions arising from them, whose hearts are "fixed, trusting in the Lord," Ps. cxii. 7. 2. It is the matter of a precept, ver. 4. Let us make ourselves easy by trusting in the Lord for ever. Since God has promised peace to those that stay themselves upon him, let us not lose the benefit of that promise, but repose an entire confidence in him. Trust in him for ever; that is, at all times, when we have nothing else to trust to; trust in him for that peace, that portion, which will be for ever. Whatever we trust to the world for, it will be but for a moment; all we expect from it is confined within the limits of time; but what we trust in God for will last as long as we shall last. For in the "Lord Jehovah," 'Jah, Jehovah,' in him who was and is and is to come, there is a Rock of ages, a firm and lasting foundation for faith and hope to build upon. And the house built on that Rock will stand in a storm. They that trust in God shall not only find in him, but receive from him, "everlasting strength," strength that will carry them to everlasting life, to that blessedness which is "for ever;" and, therefore, let them trust in him for ever, and never cast away or change their confidence.

5 For he bringeth down them that dwell on high;
The lofty city, he layeth it low;
He layeth it low, even to the ground;
He bringeth it even to the dust
6 The foot shall tread it down,
Even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy.
7 The way of the just is uprightness:
Thou, most upright, dost weigh the path of the just.
8 Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O LORD, have we waited for thee;
The desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee.
9 With my soul have I desired thee in the night;
Yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early:
For when thy judgments are in the earth,
The inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness.
10 Let favour be shewed to the wicked,
Yet will he not learn righteousness:
In the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly,
And will not behold the majesty of the LORD.
11 LORD, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see:
But they shall see, and be ashamed for their envy at the people;
Yea, the fire of thine enemies shall devour them.

EFFECTS OF THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE AT TIBERIAS.

Here the prophet farther encourageth us to trust in the Lord for ever, and to continue waiting on him; for,

First. He will make humble souls that trust in him to triumph over their proud enemies, ver. 5, 6. They that exalt themselves shall be abased, for he "bringeth down them that dwell on high;" and wherein they deal proudly he is and will be above them; even the lofty city, Babylon itself or Nineveh, he lays it low, ch. xxv. 12. He can do it, be it never so well fortified; he has done it many a time, he will do it, for he resists the proud: it is his glory to do it, for he proves himself to be God by looking on the proud and abasing them, Job xl. 12. But, on the contrary, they that humble themselves shall be exalted; for "the feet of the poor" shall tread upon the lofty cities, ver. 6. He doth not say great armies shall tread them down; but when God will have it done, "even the feet of the poor" shall do it; Mal. iv. 3, "Ye shall tread down the wicked;" "Come, set your feet on the necks of these kings:" see Ps. cxlvii. 6; Rom. xvi. 20.

Secondly. He takes cognizance of the way of his people, and hath delight in it; ver. 7, 'The way of the just is evenness;' so it may be read. It is their endeavour and constant care to walk with God in an even, steady course of obedience and holy conversation; "My foot stands in an even place," goes in an even path, Ps. xxvi. 12; and it is their happiness that God makes their way plain and easy before them. "Thou, most upright," dost level, or make even, "the path of the just," by preventing or removing those things that would be stumblingblocks to them, so that "nothing shall offend them," Ps. cxix. 165. God weighs it, so we read it; he considers it, and will give them grace sufficient for them, to help them over all the difficulties they may meet with in their way. Thus with the upright God will shew himself upright.

Thirdly. It is our duty, and will be our comfort, to wait for God, and to keep up holy desires towards him in the darkest and most discouraging times, ver. 8, 9. This has always been the practice of God's people, even then when God has frowned upon them: 1. To keep up a constant dependence upon him. "In the way of thy judgments we have" still "waited for thee;" that is, when thou hast corrected us, we have looked to no other hand but thine to relieve us; as the "servant looks" only "to the hand of his master, till that he have mercy upon him," Ps. cxxiii. 2. We cannot appeal from God's justice, but to his mercy. If God's judgments continue long, if it be a road of judgments, for so the word signifies, yet we must not be weary, but continue waiting. 2. To let out holy desires towards him. Our troubles, how pressing soever, must never put us out of conceit with our religion, nor turn us away from God; but still the desire of our soul must be to his name, and to the remembrance of him; and in the night, the darkest, longest night of affliction, with our souls must we desire him. 1st. Our great concern must be for God's name, and our earnest desire that that may be glorified, whatever become of us and our names. This is that which we must wait for, and pray for; "Father, glorify thy name," and we are satisfied. 2nd. Our great comfort must be in the remembrance of that name, of all that whereby God has made himself known. The remembrance of God must be our great support and pleasure; and though sometimes we be unmindful of him, yet still our desire must be towards the remembrance of him, and we must take pains with our own hearts to have him always in mind. 3rd. Our desires towards God must be inward, fervent, and sincere. With our soul we must desire him, with our soul we must pant after him, Ps. xlii. 1, and with our spirits within us, with the innermost thought, and the closest application of mind, we must seek him. We make nothing of our religion, whatever our profession be, if we do not make heart-work of it. 4th. Even in the darkest night of affliction, our desires must be towards God, as our sun and shield; for, however God is pleased to deal with us, we must never think the worse of him, nor cool in our love to him. 5th. If our desires be indeed towards God, we must evidence it by seeking him, and seeking him early, as those that desire to find him, and dread the thoughts of missing him. They that would seek God, and find him, must seek betimes, and seek him earnestly. Though we come never so early, we shall find him ready to receive us.

Fourthly. It is God's gracious design in sending abroad his judgments, thereby to bring men to seek him and serve him. "When thy judgments are upon the earth," laying all waste, then we have reason to expect that not only God's professing people, but even "the inhabitants of the world, will learn righteousness," will have their mistakes rectified, and their lives reformed; will xxvi. 14. The natural explanation of our version is to refer this verse to the "other lords" of the previous verse. The word for "deceased" is rephaim, which is the usual term for departed souls.

xxvi. 19. This verse is a contrast to verse 14. The oppressors of Israel are extinguished, but Israel shall revive and rise again. The translation is capable of improvement: "Thy dead shall live, my deceased shall rise," &c.

xxvi. 21. This may or may not refer to Chaldea. In the second clause "blood" means either guilt or innocent blood—i.e., crime shall be revealed, and murder shall not be hidden.

xxvii. 1. The two leviathans and the sea-monster are perhaps emblems of three empires. The tannin (dragon, or sea-monster) may be Egypt, and the others may be Assyria and Babylonia, or Chaldea. Other explanations have been proposed, but this seems as good as any.

xxvii. 4. The question, "Who would set the briars and thorns be brought to acknowledge God's righteousness in punishing them; will repent of their own unrighteousness in offending God, and so be brought to walk in right paths. They will do this; that is, judgments are designed to bring them to this, they have a natural tendency to produce this effect; and though many continue obstinate, yet some even of "the inhabitants of the world" will profit by this discipline, and "will learn righteousness;" sure they will, they are strangely stupid if they do not. Note, The intention of afflictions is to teach us righteousness; and blessed is the man whom God chastens, and thus teaches, Ps. xciv. 12. Discite justitiam, moniti, et non temnere divos,—'Let this rebuke teach you to cultivate righteousness, and cease from despising the gods.'—Virgil.

Fifthly. Those are wicked indeed that will not be wrought upon by the favourable methods God takes to reduce and reform them; and it is necessary God should deal with them in a severe way by his judgments, which shall prevail to humble those that would not otherwise be humbled. Observe,

1. How sinners walk contrary to God, and refuse to comply with the means used for their reformation, and to answer the intentions of them, ver. 10. 1st. Favour is shewed to them; they receive many mercies from God; he causeth his sun to shine, and rain to fall upon them; nay, he prospers them, and into their hands he brings plentifully; they escape many of the strokes of God's judgments which others, less wicked than they, have been cut off by. In some particular instances they seem to be remarkably favoured above their neighbours, and the design of all this is, that they may be won upon to love and serve that God who thus favours them; and yet it is all in vain. They will not learn righteousness, will not be led to repentance by the goodness of God; and therefore it is requisite that God should send his judgments into the earth, to reckon with men for abused mercies. 2nd. They live in a "land of uprightness;" where religion is professed, and is in reputation, and the word of God preached, and where they have many good examples set them; in a land of evenness, where there are not so many stumblingblocks as in other places; in a land of correction, where vice and profaneness are discountenanced and punished; yet there they will deal unjustly, and go on frowardly in their evil ways. They that do wickedly deal unjustly both with God and man, and with their own souls. And those that will not be reclaimed by the justice of the nation may expect the judgments of God upon them. Nor can they expect a place hereafter in the land of blessedness who now conform not to the laws and usages, nor improve the privileges and advantages, of the "land of uprightness." And why do they not? It is because they "will not behold the majesty of the Lord," will not believe, will not consider, what a God of terrible majesty he is whose laws and justice they persist in the contempt of. God's majesty appears in all the dispensations of his providence; but they regard it not, and therefore study not to answer the ends of those dispensations. Even when we receive the mercy of the Lord we must still behold the majesty of the Lord and his goodness. 3rd. God lifts up his hand to give them warning, that they may, by repentance and prayer, make their peace with him; but they take no notice of it, are not aware that God is angry with them, or coming forth against them; "they will not see," and none so blind as those that will not see, that shut their eyes against the clearest conviction of guilt and wrath; who ascribe that to chance, or common fate, which is manifestly a Divine rebuke; who regard not the threatening symptoms of their own ruin, but cry peace to themselves when the righteous God is waging war with them.

2. How God will at length be too hard for them. When he judgeth, he will overcome; "They will not see, but they shall see;" shall be made to see whether they will or no, that God is angry with them. Atheists, scorners, and the secure, will shortly feel what now they will not believe, that it "is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." They will not see the evil of sin, and particularly the sin of hating and persecuting the people of God; but they shall see by the tokens of God's displeasure against them for it, and the deliverances in which God will plead his people's cause, that what is done against them he takes as done against himself, and will reckon for it accordingly. "They shall see" that they have done God's people a great deal of wrong, and therefore shall "be ashamed" of their enmity and envy towards them, and their ill usage of such as deserved better treatment. Note, Those that bear ill-will to God's people have reason to be ashamed of it, so absurd and unreasonable it is; and sooner or later they shall be ashamed of it, and the remembrance of it shall fill them with confusion. Some read it, 'They shall see, and be confounded for the zeal of the people;' that is, by the zeal God will shew for his people; when they shall be made to know how jealous God is for the honour and welfare of his people, they shall be confounded to think that they might have been of that people, and would not. Their doom therefore is, that since they slighted the happiness of God's friends, the fire of his enemies shall devour them; that is, that fire which is prepared for his enemies, and with which they shall be devoured; the fire designed for the devil and his angels. Note, Those that are enemies to God's people, and envy them, God looks upon as his enemies, and will deal with them accordingly.

12 LORD, thou wilt ordain peace for us:
For thou also hast wrought all our works in us.
13 O LORD our God, other lords beside thee have had dominion over us:
But by thee only will we make mention of thy name.
14 They are dead, they shall not live;
They are deceased, they shall not rise:
Therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them,
And made all their memory to perish.
15 Thou hast increased the nation, O LORD,
Thou hast increased the nation: thou art glorified:
Thou hadst removed it far unto all the ends of the earth.
16 LORD, in trouble have they visited thee,
They poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them.
17 Like as a woman with child,
That draweth near the time of her delivery,
Is in pain, and crieth out in her pangs;
So have we been in thy sight, O LORD.
18 We have been with child we have been in pain,
We have as it were brought forth wind;
We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth;
Neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen.
19 Thy dead men shall live,
Together with my dead body shall they arise.
Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust:
For thy dew is as the dew of herbs,
And the earth shall cast out the dead.

The prophet, in these verses, looks back upon what God had done with them, both in mercy and judgment, and sings unto God of both; and then looks forward upon what he hoped God would do for them. Observe,

First. His views and reflections are mixed. When he looks back upon the state of the church, he finds,

1. That God had in many instances been very gracious to them, and had done great things for them; ver. 12, "Thou hast wrought all our works in us;" or, for us. Whatever good work is done by us, it is owing to a good work wrought by the grace of God in us; it is he that puts good thoughts and affections into our hearts, if at any time they be there, and that works in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure. Acti, agimus,—'Being acted upon, we act.' And if any kindness be shewed us, or any of our affairs be prosperous and successful, it is God that works it for us; and every creature, every business, that is any way serviceable to our comfort, it is he that makes it to be so; and sometimes makes that to work for us which seemed to make against us. In particular, ver. 15, "Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord;" so that a little one is become a thousand. In Egypt they multiplied exceedingly, and afterwards in Canaan, so that they filled the land; and in this thou art glorified; for the multitude of the people is the honour of the prince. And therein God was glorified, as faithful to his covenant with Abraham, that he would make him a "father of many nations." Note, God's nation is a growing nation, and it is the glory of God that it is so. The increase of the church, that holy nation, is therefore to be rejoiced in, because it is the increase of those that make it their business to glorify God in this world.

2. That yet he had laid them under his rebukes. 1st. The neighbour nations had sometimes oppressed them, and tyrannized over them; ver. 13, "O Lord our God," thou who hast the sole right to rule us, whose subjects and servants we are, to thee we complain, (for whither else should we go with our complaints?) that "other lords besides thee have had dominion over us." Not only in the days of the judges, but afterwards, God frequently sold them into the hands of their enemies; or rather, by their iniquities, they sold themselves, ch. lii. 3—5. When they had been careless in the service of God, God suffered their enemies to have dominion over them, that they might know the difference between "his service and the service of the kingdoms of the countries." It may be understood as a confession of sin, their serving other gods, and subjecting themselves to the superstitious laws and customs of their neighbours, by which other lords (for they called their idols, Baals, 'lords,') had dominion over them besides God; but now they promise that it shall be so no more: From henceforth "by thee only will we make mention of thy name;" that is, we will worship thee only, and in that way only which thou hast instituted and appointed. The same may be our penitent reflection: "Other lords" besides God "have had dominion over us." Every lust has been our lord, and we have been led captive by it; and it has been long enough, and too long, that we have thus wronged both God and ourselves. The same, therefore, must be our pious resolution, that from henceforth we will make mention of God's name only, and by him only; that we will keep close to God, and to our duty, and never desert it. 2nd. They had sometimes been carried into captivity before their enemies, ver. 15. The nation which at first thou didst increase, and make to take root, thou hast now diminished, and plucked up, and "removed it" to "all the ends of the earth," driven it out to the utmost parts of heaven, as is threatened, Deu. xxx. 4, and xxviii. 64. But observe betwixt the mention of the increasing of them and that of the removing of them, it is said, "Thou art glorified;" for the judgments God inflicts upon his people for their sins are for his honour, as well as the mercies he bestows upon them in performance of his promise.

3. He remembers that when they were thus oppressed and carried captive, they cried unto God, which was a good evidence they neither had quite forsaken him nor were quite forsaken of him, and that there were merciful intentions in the judgments they were under; ver. 16, "Lord, in trouble have they visited thee." This was usual with the people of Israel, as we find frequently in the story of the judges; when other lords had dominion over them, they "humbled themselves," and said, "The Lord is righteous," 2 Chr. xii. 6. See here, 1st. The need we have of afflictions; they are necessary to stir up prayer. When it is said, "In trouble have they visited thee," it is implied that in their peace and prosperity they were strangers to God, kept at a distance from him, and seldom came near him; as if, when the world smiled upon them, they had no occasion for his favours. 2nd. The benefit we often have by afflictions. They bring us to God, and quicken us to our duty, and shew us our dependence upon him. Those that before seldom looked at God, now visit him; they come frequently, they become friendly, and make their court to him. Before, prayer came drop by drop; but now they pour out a prayer. It comes now like water from a fountain, not like water from a still. They poured out a 'secret speech,' so the margin. Praying is speaking to God, but it is a secret speech; for it is the language of the heart, otherwise it is not praying. Afflictions bring us to secret prayer; in which we may be more free and particular in our addresses to him than we can be in public. In affliction, those will seek God early, who before sought him slowly, Hos. v. 15. It will make men fervent and fluent in prayer. "They poured out a prayer," as the drink offerings were poured out, "when thy chastening was upon them." But it is to be feared, when the chastening is off them, they will by degrees return to their former carelessness, as they had often done.

4. He complains that their struggles for their own liberty had been very painful and perilous, but they had not been successful, ver. 17, 18. 1st. They had the throes and pangs they dreaded. We have been like a woman in labour, that "crieth out in her pangs." We have, with a great deal of anxiety and toil, endeavoured to help ourselves, and our troubles have been increased by those attempts; as, when Moses came to deliver Israel, the tale of bricks was doubled. Their prayers were quickened by the acuteness of their pains, and became as strong and vehement as the cries of a woman in sore travail. "So have we been in thy sight, O Lord." It was a comfort and satisfaction to them in their distress, that God had his eye upon them, that all their miseries were in his sight. He was no stranger to their pangs or their prayers. "Lord, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee," Ps. xxxviii. 9. Whenever they came to present themselves before the Lord, with their complaints and petitions, they were in agonies, like those of a woman in travail. 2nd. They against me in battle?" should rather be an exclamation: "Would that the briars and thorns were against me! in battle I would encounter them," &c.

xxvii. 5. On the various shades of thought supposed by critics to be intended in this verse, Dr. Alexander says, "The general meaning is the same in either case, viz., that the alternative presented to the enemy is that of destruction or submission." This remark must, however, comprise verse 4, which is as much as to say, "either let them be destroyed," while here the added thought is, "or let them be reconciled."

xxvii. 6. The first clause may be rendered, "Hereafter Jacob shall take root."

xxvii. 7, 8. "Hath the Lord smitten Israel as severely as he has smitten Israel's foes? Do so many fall in Israel as fall among his enemies? When Israel is cast out she is chastised by him in measure, she is removed by a harsh wind when the east wind blows." Such is came short of the issue and success they desired and hoped for. "We have been with child;" that is, we have had great expectation of a speedy and happy deliverance, have been big with hopes; and when "we have been in pain" have comforted ourselves with this, that the joyful birth would make us forget our misery, Jno. xvi. 21; but alas, "we have as it were brought forth wind;" it has proved a false conception, our expectations have been frustrated, and our pains have been rather dying pains than travailing ones. We have had a miscarrying womb, and dry breasts. All our efforts have proved successless; "We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth," for ourselves, or for our friends and allies; but rather have made our own case and theirs worse. "Neither have the inhabitants of the world," whom we have been contesting with, fallen before us, either in their power or in their hopes; but they are still as high and uppish as ever. Note, A righteous cause may be strenuously pleaded, both by prayer and endeavour, both with God and man; and yet for a great while may go by the worse, and the point not be gained.

Secondly. His prospects and hopes are very pleasant. In general, "Thou wilt ordain peace for us," ver. 12; that is, all that good which the necessity of our case calls for. What peace the church has, or hopes for, it is of God's ordaining; and we may comfort ourselves with this, that, what trouble soever may for a time be appointed to the people of God, peace will at length be ordained for them; for the end of those men is peace. And if God by his Spirit work all our works in us, he will ordain peace for us; for the work of righteousness shall be peace. And that is true and lasting peace, such as the world can neither give nor take away, which God ordains; for to those that have it it shall be unchangeable, as the ordinances of the day and of the night. And from what God hath done for us we may encourage ourselves to hope that he will yet farther do us good. Thou hast heard the desire of the humble, and therefore wilt, Ps. x. 17. And when this peace is ordained for us, then "by thee only will we make mention of thy name," ver. 13; that is, we will give the glory of it to thee only, and not to any other; and we will depend upon thy grace only to enable us to do so. We cannot praise God's name but by his strength.

Two things in particular the prophet here comforts the church with the prospect of:

1. The amazing ruin of her enemies; ver. 14, "They are dead," those other lords that "have had dominion over us." Their power is irrecoverably broken, they are quite cut off and extinguished; and "they shall not live," shall never be able to put up head any more; being deceased, they shall not rise, but, like Haman, when they have begun to fall before the seed of the Jews, they shall sink like a stone. Because they are sentenced to this final ruin, therefore in pursuance of that sentence God himself hath visited them in wrath, as a righteous judge, and hath cut off both the men themselves (he hath destroyed them) and the remembrance of them; they and their names are buried together in the dust. He hath "made all their memory to perish;" either they are forgotten or made mention of with detestation. Note, The cause that is maintained in opposition to God and his kingdom among men, though it may prosper a while, will certainly sink at last, and all that adhere to it will perish with it. The Jewish doctors, comparing this with ver. 19, infer that the resurrection of the dead belongs to the Jews only; and that those of other nations shall not rise. But we know better things, that "all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God," and that this speaks of the final destruction of Christ's enemies, which is the second death.

2. The surprising resurrection of her friends, ver. 19. Though the church rejoiceth not in the birth of the man child, of which she travailed in pain, but "hath as it were brought forth wind," ver. 18, yet the disappointment shall be balanced in a way equivalent; "Thy dead men shall live." Those that were thought to be dead, who had received a sentence of death within themselves, who were cast out as if they had been naturally dead, they shall appear again in their former vigour. A "spirit of life from God" shall enter into the slain witnesses, and they shall prophesy again, Rev. xi. 11. The dry bones shall live, and become an "exceeding great army," Eze. xxxvii. 10. "Together with my dead body shall they arise." If we believe the resurrection of the dead, of our dead bodies at the last day, as Job did, and the prophet here, that will facilitate our belief of the promised restoration of the church's lustre and strength in this world. When God's time is come, how low soever she may be brought, they shall arise; even Jerusalem, the city of God, but now lying like a dead body, a carcase, to which the "eagles are gathered together." God owns it still for his, so doth the prophet; but it shall arise, shall be rebuilt, and flourish again. And therefore let the poor, desolate, melancholy remains of its inhabitants, that dwell as in dust, "awake and sing;" for they shall see Jerusalem, the city of their solemnities, a "quiet habitation" again, ch. xxxiii. 20; for the dew of God's favour shall be to it as the evening dew to the herbs that were parched with the heat of the sun all day, shall revive and refresh them; and as the spring dews that water the earth, and make the herbs that lay buried in it to put forth and bud, so shall they flourish again; and "the earth shall cast out the dead," as it casts the herbs out of their roots; the earth, in which they seemed to be lost, shall contribute to their revival. When the church and her interests are to be restored, neither the dew of heaven nor the fatness of the earth shall be wanting to do their parts towards it. Now this (as Ezekiel's vision, which is a comment upon it) may be fitly accommodated, 1st. To the spiritual resurrection of those that were dead in sin, by the power of Christ's Gospel and grace; so Dr. Lightfoot applies it, Hor. Heb., in Jno. xii. 24. The Gentiles shall live: With my body shall they arise; that is, they shall be called in after Christ's resurrection, shall rise with him, and sit with him in heavenly places; nay, they shall arise my body; that is, (saith he,) they shall become the mystical body of Christ, and shall rise as part of him. 2nd. To the last resurrection, when dead saints shall live and rise together with Christ's dead body; for he rose as the firstfruits, and believers shall rise by virtue of their union with him, and their communion in his resurrection.

20 Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers,
And shut thy doors about thee:
Hide thyself as it were for a little moment,
Until the indignation be overpast.
21 For, behold, the LORD cometh out of his place
To punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity:
The earth also shall disclose her blood,
And shall no more cover her slain.

These two verses are supposed not to belong to the song, which takes up the rest of the chapter, but to begin a new matter, and to be rather an introduction to the following chapter than the conclusion of this. Or, whereas in the foregoing song the people of God had spoken to him, complaining of their grievances, here he returns an answer to their complaints. In which,

First. He invites them into their chambers; ver. 20. "Come, my people," come to me, come with me. He calls them no whither but where he himself will accompany them. Let the storm that disperseth others bring you nearer together. Come, and enter into thy chambers; stay not abroad, lest you be caught in the storm, as the Egyptians in the hail, Ex. ix. 21. 1. Come into chambers of distinction, come into your own apartments, and continue not any longer mixed with the children of Babylon; "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." 2 Cor. vi. 17; Rev. xviii. 4. If God hath set apart them that are godly for himself, they ought to set themselves apart. 2. Into chambers of defence, in which, by the secrecy or by the strength of them, you may be safe in the worst of times. The attributes of God are the "secret of his tabernacle," Ps. xxvii. 5; his name a strong tower, into which we may run for shelter, Pr. xviii. 10. We must by faith find a way into these chambers, and there hide ourselves; that is, with a holy security and serenity of mind, we must put ourselves under the Divine protection. Come as Noah into the ark, for he shut the door about him. When dangers are threatening, it is good to retire, and lie hid, as Elijah did by the brook Cherith. 3. Into chambers of devotion. "Enter into thy closet, and shut thy door," Mat. vi. 6. Be private with God. "Enter into thy chamber," to examine thyself, and commune with thy own heart; to pray and humble thyself before God. This work is to be done in times of distress and danger. And thus we hide ourselves; that is, we recommend ourselves to God to hide us; and he will hide us either under heaven or in heaven. Israel must keep within doors, when the destroying angel is slaying the firstborn of Egypt, else the blood on the door-posts will not secure them; so must Rahab and her family, when Jericho is destroyed. Those are most safe that are least seen. Qui bene latuit, bene vixit,—'He has lived well who has sought a proper degree of concealment.'

Secondly. He assures them that the trouble would be over in a very short time; they should not long be in any fright or peril. Hide thyself for a moment; the smallest part of time we can conceive; like an atom of matter. Nay, if you can imagine one moment shorter than another, it is but for a "little moment," and that with a quasi too, "as it were" for a little moment, less than you think of. When it is over it will seem as nothing to you; you will wonder how soon it is gone. You shall not need to lie long in confinement, long in concealment; the "indignation" will presently be "overpast;" that is, the indignation of the enemies against you; their persecuting power and rage, which forceth you to abscond, as when the wicked rise, a man is hid. This will soon be over; God will cut them off, will break their power, and defeat their purposes, and find a way for your enlargement. When Athanasius was banished Alexandria, by an edict of Julian's, and his friends greatly lamented it, he bade them be of good cheer. Nubecula est quæ cito pertransibit,—'It is a little cloud, that will soon blow over.' "You shall have tribulation ten days," that is all, Rev. ii. 10. This enables God's suffering people to call their afflictions light, that they are but for a moment.

Thirdly. He assures them that their enemies should be reckoned with for all the mischief they had done them by the sword, either of war or persecution, ver. 21. The Lord will punish them for the blood they have shed. Here is, 1. The judgment set, and process issued out; "The Lord cometh out of his place, to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity," in giving such disturbance to all about them. There is a great deal of iniquity among the inhabitants of the earth; but though they all combine in it, "though hand join in hand" to carry it on, yet "it shall not go unpunished." Besides the everlasting punishment into which the wicked shall go hereafter, there are often remarkable punishments of cruelty, oppression, and persecution, in this world. When men's indignation is overpast, and they have done their worst, let them then expect God's indignation; for "he seeth that his day is coming," Ps. xxxvii. 13. God "cometh out of his place to punish;" that is, he shews himself in an extraordinary manner from heaven, the firmament of his power; from the sanctuary, the residence of his grace. He is raised up out of his holy habitation, where he seemed before to conceal himself; and now he will do something great, the product of his wise, and just, and secret counsels; as a prince that goes to take the chair, or take the field, Zec. ii. 13. Some observe, that God's place is the mercy-seat, there he delights to be; when he punisheth he comes out of his place, for he hath no pleasure in the death of sinners. 2. The criminals convicted by the notorious evidence of the fact; "The earth shall disclose her blood." The innocent blood, the blood of the saints and martyrs, which hath been shed upon the earth like water, and has soaked into it, and been concealed and covered by it, shall now be brought to light, and brought to account; for God will make inquisition for it, and will give those that shed it blood to drink, for they are worthy. Secret murders, and other secret wickednesses, shall be discovered sooner or later; and the slain which the earth has long covered, she shall no longer cover, but they shall be produced as evidence against the murderers. The voice of Abel's blood cries from the earth, Gen. iv. 10, 11; Job xx. 27. Those sins which seemed to have been buried in oblivion will be called to mind, and called over again, when the day of reckoning comes. Let God's people therefore wait awhile with patience, for "behold the Judge standeth before the door."

CHAPTER XXVII.

In this chapter the prophet goes on to shew, I. What great things God would do for his church and people, which should now shortly be accomplished in the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib, and the destruction of the Assyrian army. But it is expressed generally for the encouragement of the church in after ages, with reference to the power and prevalency of the enemies of it: I. That proud oppressors should be reckoned with, ver. 1; II. That care should be taken of the church, as of God's vineyard, ver. 2, 3; III. That God would let fall his controversy with them upon their return to him, ver. 4, 5; IV. That he would greatly multiply and increase them, ver. 6; V. That as to their afflictions, the property of them should be altered, ver. 7, they should be mitigated and moderated, ver. 8, and sanctified, ver. 9; VI. That though it might be laid waste, and made desolate for a time, ver. 10, 11, yet it should be restored, and the scattered members should be gathered together again, ver. 12, 13. And all this is applicable to the grace of the Gospel, and God's promises to, and providences concerning, the Christian church, and such as belong to it.

IN that day the LORD with his sore and great and strong sword
Shall punish leviathan the piercing serpent,
Even leviathan that crooked serpent;
And he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea.
2 In that day sing ye unto her, A vineyard of red wine.
3 I the LORD do keep it;
I will water it every moment:

perhaps the true sense, though not the literal translation, of these disputed verses.

xxvii. 9. On the words "when he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalk-stones," &c., Barnes says, "That is, Jehovah shall make the stones of the altars reared in honour of idols like chalk-stones, or shall throw them down and scatter them abroad, like stones that are easily beaten to pieces." Others think Israel was to remove the altars. "The groves and images" alluded to are thought to be especially the emblems of Astarte and the sun-god. Astarte, or Ashtoreth, is by high authorities believed to be the moon-goddess, though some think it the planet Venus. In any case Baal was the sun-god, and the two forms represent the licentious and the cruel aspects of idolatry.

xxvii. 10, 11. It is disputed whether Jerusalem or Babylon is the subject of these verses, or whether it is the cities of Israel in general. The promise in verse 12 strongly favours the last-named explanation.

Lest any hurt it,
I will keep it night and day.
4 Fury is not in me:
Who would set the briers and thorns against me in battle?
I would go through them, I would burn them together.
5 Or let him take hold of my strength,
That he may make peace with me;
And he shall make peace with me.
6 He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root:
Israel shall blossom and bud,
And fill the face of the world with fruit.

The prophet is here singing of judgment and mercy.

First. Of judgment upon the enemies of God's church; ver. 1, "Tribulation to them that trouble" it, 2 Thes. i. 6. When the Lord "comes out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth," ch. xxvi. 21, he will be sure to "punish leviathan, the dragon that is in the sea," every proud, oppressing tyrant, that is the terror of the mighty, and, like the leviathan, is so fierce that none dare stir him up, and his heart as hard as a stone, and "when he raiseth up himself the mighty are afraid," Job xli. 10, 24, 25. The church has many enemies, but commonly some one that is more formidable than the rest. So Sennacherib was in his day, and Nebuchadnezzar in his, and Antiochus in his. So Pharaoh had been formerly; and he is called "leviathan," and "the dragon," Ps. lxxiv. 14; ch. li. 9; Eze. xxix. 3. And the New Testament church has had its leviathans; we read of a "great red dragon, ready to devour it," Rev. xii. 3. Those malignant, persecuting powers are here compared to the leviathan in bulk and strength, and the mighty bustle they make in the world; to dragons, for their rage and fury; to serpents, piercing serpents, penetrating in their counsels, quick in their motions, that if they once get in their head, will soon wind in their whole body; 'crossing like a bar,' so the margin, standing in the way of all their neighbours, and obstructing them; to crooked serpents, subtle and insinuating, but perverse and mischievous. Great and mighty princes, if they oppose the people of God, are in God's account as dragons and serpents, the plagues of mankind; and the Lord will punish them in due time. They are too big for men to deal with, and call to an account; and therefore the great God will take the doing of it into his own hands. He hath a "sore, and great, and strong sword," wherewith to do execution upon them, when the "measure of their iniquity is full," and their day is come to fall. It is emphatically expressed in the original, 'The Lord with his sword, that cruel one, and that great one, and that strong one, shall punish this unwieldy, this unruly criminal;' and it shall be a capital punishment, "he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea;" for the wages of his sin is death; which shall not only be a prevention of his doing farther mischief, as the slaying of a wild beast, but a just punishment for the mischief he has done, as the putting of a traitor or rebel to death. God hath a strong sword for the doing of this; variety of judgments sufficient to humble the proudest, and break the most powerful of his enemies; and he will do it when the day of execution comes; "In that day" he will punish; his day which is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. This is applicable to the spiritual victories obtained by our Lord Jesus over the powers of darkness. He not only disarmed, spoiled, and cast out the prince of this world; but with his "strong sword," the virtue of his death, and the preaching of his Gospel, he doth and will "destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil," that great leviathan, that old serpent, the dragon. He shall be bound, that he may not "deceive the nations," and that is a punishment to him, Rev. xx. 2, 3. And at length for deceiving the nations, he shall be "cast into the lake of fire," Rev. xx. 11.

Secondly. Of mercy to the church. In the same day, when God is punishing the leviathan, let the church and all her friends be easy and cheerful; let those that attend her sing to her for her comfort, sing her asleep with these assurances. Let it be sung in her assemblies,

1. That she is God's vineyard, and is under his particular care, ver. 2, 3. She is in God's eye "a vineyard of red wine." The world is as a fruitless, worthless wilderness; but the church is enclosed as a vineyard, a peculiar place, and of value, that has great care taken of it, and great pains taken with it, and from which precious fruits are gathered, wherewith they honour God and man. It is a vineyard of red wine, yielding the best and choicest grapes; intimating the reformation of the church, that it now brings forth good fruit unto God, whereas before it brought forth fruit to itself, or brought forth wild grapes, ch. v. 4. Now God takes care, 1st. Of the safety of this vineyard; "I the Lord do keep it." He speaks this as glorying in it, that he is, and hath undertaken to be, the keeper of Israel. Those that bring forth fruit to God are, and shall be, always under his protection. He speaks this as assuring us that they shall be so. I the Lord that can do every thing, but cannot lie nor deceive, I do keep it; "lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day." God's vineyard in this world lies much exposed to injury. There are many that would hurt it, would tread it down, and lay it waste, Ps. lxxx. 13; but God will suffer no real hurt or damage to be done it, but what he will bring good out of. He will keep it constantly night and day; and not without need, for the enemies are restless in their designs and attempts against it, and, both night and day, seek an opportunity to do it a mischief. God will keep it in the night of affliction and persecution, and in the day of peace and prosperity, the temptations of which are no less dangerous. God's people shall be preserved not only from "the pestilence that walketh in darkness," but "from the destruction that wasteth at noonday," Ps. xci. 6. This vineyard shall be well fenced. 2nd. Of the fruitfulness of this vineyard; "I will water it every moment," and yet it shall not be over watered. The still and silent dews of God's grace and blessing shall continually descend upon it, that it may bring forth much fruit. We need the constant and continual waterings of the Divine grace; for if that be at any time withdrawn we wither, and come to nothing. God waters his vineyard by the ministry of the word, by his servants the prophets, whose doctrine shall drop as the dew. Paul plants, and Apollos waters, but God gives the increase; for without him the watchman wakes and the husbandman waters in vain.

2. That though sometimes he contends with his people, yet upon their submission he will be reconciled to them; ver. 4, 5, fury is not in him towards his vineyard. Though he meets with many things in it that are offensive to him, yet he doth not seek advantages against it, nor is extreme to mark what is amiss in it. It is true, if he find in it briars and thorns instead of vines, and they be set in battle against him, as indeed that in the vineyard which is not for him is against him, he will tread them down, and burn them; but otherwise, if I am angry with my people, they know what course to take; let them humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and so "take hold of my strength" with a sincere desire to make their peace with me, and I will soon be reconciled to them, and all shall be well. God sees the sins of his people, and is displeased with them; but upon their repentance he turns away his wrath. This may very well be construed as a summary of the doctrine of the Gospel, with which the church is to be watered every moment. 1st. Here is a quarrel supposed between God and man; for here is a battle fought, and peace to be made. It is an old quarrel, ever since sin first entered; it is on God's part a righteous quarrel; but on man's part most unrighteous. 2nd. Here is a gracious invitation given us to take up this quarrel, and to get these matters in variance accommodated. Let him that is desirous to be at peace with God take hold on his strength; on his strong arm which is lifted up against the sinner to strike him dead, and let him by supplication keep back the stroke. Let him wrestle with me as Jacob did, resolving not to let me go without a blessing; and he shall be Israel, a prince with God. Pardoning mercy is called "the power of our Lord;" let him take hold on that. Christ is "the arm of the Lord," ch. liii. 1; Christ crucified, "the power of God," 1 Cor. i. 24. Let him, by a lively faith, take hold on him, as a man that is sinking catches hold of a bough, or cord, or plank that is in his reach, or as the malefactor took hold on the horns of the altar, believing that there is no other name by which he can be saved, by which he can be reconciled. 3rd. Here is a threefold cord of arguments to persuade us to do this: First. Time and space is given us to do it in, for fury is not in God; he doth not carry it towards us as great men carry it towards their inferiors, when the one is in a fault, and the other in a fury. Men in a fury will not take time for consideration; it is with them but a word and a blow. Furious men are soon angry, and implacable when they are angry; a little thing provokes them, and no little thing will pacify them; but it is not so with God, he considers our frame, is slow to anger; doth not stir up all his wrath, nor always chide. Secondly. It is in vain to think of contesting with him. If we persist in our quarrel with him, and think to make our part good, it is but like setting briars and thorns before a consuming fire, which will be so far from giving check to the progress of it that they will but make it burn the more outrageously. We are not an equal match for Omnipotence; "Woe unto him" therefore "that strives with his Maker." He knows not the power of his anger. Thirdly. This is the only way, and it is a sure way, to reconciliation. Let him take this course to "make peace with me," and he "shall make peace;" and thereby good, all good, shall come unto him. God is willing to be reconciled to us, if we be but willing to be reconciled to him.

3. That the church of God in the world shall be a growing body, and come at length to be a great body, ver. 6. In times to come, (so some read it,) in after times, when these calamities are overpassed, or in the days of the Gospel, the latter days, he shall cause Jacob to take root, deeper root than ever yet; for the gospel church shall be more firmly fixed than ever the Jewish church was, and shall spread farther. Or, he shall cause them of Jacob that come back out of their captivity, or, as we read it, "them that come of Jacob," to "take root downward, and bear fruit upward," ch. xxxvii. 31. They shall be established in a prosperous state, and then they "shall blossom and bud," and give hopeful prospects of a great increase; and so it shall prove, for "they shall fill the face of the world with fruit." Many shall be brought into the church; proselytes shall be numerous; some out of all the nations about, that shall be to the God of Israel for a name and a praise; and the converts shall be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. The preaching of the Gospel brought forth fruit in all the world, Col. i. 6; fruit that remains, Jno. xv. 16.

7 Hath he smitten him, as he smote those that smote him?
Or is he slain according to the slaughter of them that are slain by him?
8 In measure, when it shooteth forth, thou wilt debate [with it:
He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind.
9 By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged;
And this is all the fruit to take away his sin;
When he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalkstones that are beaten in sunder,
The groves and images shall not stand up.
10 Yet the defenced city shall be desolate,
And the habitation forsaken, and left like a wilderness:
There shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down,
And consume the branches thereof. [broken off.
11 When the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be
The women come, and set them on fire:
For it is a people of no understanding:
Therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them,
And he that formed them will shew them no favour.
12 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall beat off
From the channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt,
And ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel.
13 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the great trumpet shall be blown,
And they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria,
And the outcasts in the land of Egypt, [salem.
And shall worship the LORD in the holy mount at Jeru-

Here is the prophet again singing of mercy and judgment; not as before, judgment to the enemies, and mercy to the church, but judgment to the church, and mercy mixed with that judgment.

First. Here is judgment threatened even to Jacob and Israel. They "shall blossom and bud," ver. 6. But, 1. They shall be smitten and slain, ver. 7; some of them shall. If God finds anything amiss among them, he shall lay them under xxvii. 12. "The river" here is the Euphrates, and "the stream of Egypt" is the Wady-el-Arish, or river of Egypt, being the extreme limits of the land of promise. "Beating off" signifies either the gathering of olives by knocking them off with rods or the beating of corn to free it from husks and chaff. The sense must be that God will gather a great harvest in Israel, which shall be populous once more, and shall receive again its exiles from every side. This shows that verse 13 is not a mere repetition of verse 12, but carries on the idea; the one being internal and the other external restoration.

xxviii. 1. A new prophecy commences here. The real sense of the verse may be thus expressed: "Woe to the proud crown of the drunken of Ephraim, the fading flower of their glorious beauty on the head of the fruitful valleys of those who are crushed with wine." Samaria, the capital of intoxicated Ephraim, is the crown and flower on the head of the valleys. The head of the valleys was the hill on the tokens of his displeasure for it. Judgment shall begin at the house of God, and those whom God hath known of all the families of the earth, he will punish in the first place. 2. Jerusalem, their "defenced city, shall be desolate," ver. 10, 11. God having tried a variety of methods with them for their reformation, which as to many have proved ineffectual, he will for a time lay their country waste, which was accomplished when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans; then that habitation was for a long time forsaken. If lesser judgments do not do the work, God will send greater; for "when he judgeth he will overcome." Jerusalem had been a "defenced city," not so much by art or nature, as by grace and the Divine protection; but when God was provoked to withdraw her defence was departed from her; and then she was "left like a wilderness;" and in the pleasant gardens of Jerusalem cattle shall feed, shall lie down there; and there shall be none to disturb them or drive them away; there they shall be levant and couchant; and they shall eat the tender branches of the fruit trees; which, perhaps, farther signifies that the people should become an easy prey to their enemies. "When the boughs thereof are withered," as they grow upon the tree, being blasted by winds and frosts, and not pruned, "they shall be broken off" for fuel, and the women and children shall come and "set them on fire." There shall be a total destruction, for the very trees shall be destroyed; and this is a figure of the deplorable state of the vineyard, ver. 2, when it "brought forth wild grapes," ch. v. 2; and our Saviour seems to refer to this, when he saith of the branches of the vine which abide not in him, that they are "cast forth and withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned," Jno. xv. 6, which was in a particular manner fulfilled in the unbelieving Jews. The similitude is explained in the following words: "It is a people of no understanding;" brutish and sottish, and destitute of the knowledge of God, and that have no relish or savour of Divine things, like a withered branch that has no sap in it; and this is at the bottom of all those sins for which God left them desolate, their idolatry first, and afterwards their infidelity. Wicked people, however in other things they may be wits and politicians, in their greatest concerns they are "of no understanding;" and their ignorance being wilful, that shall not only not be their excuse, but it shall be the ground of their condemnation; for therefore "he that made them," that gave them their being, "will not have mercy on them," nor save them from the ruin they bring upon themselves; and "he that formed them," into a people, formed them for himself, to shew forth his praise. Seeing they do not answer the end of their formation, but hate to be reformed, to be new formed, will reject them, and "shew them no favour;" and then they are undone. For if he that made us by his power do not make us happy in his favour, we had better never have been made. Sinners flatter themselves with hopes of impunity, at least that they shall not be dealt with so severely as their ministers tell them, because God is merciful, and because he is their Maker; but here we see how weak and insufficient those pleas will be; for if they be "of no understanding, he that made them," though he made them, and hateth nothing that he hath made, and though he has mercy in store for those who so far understand themselves as to apply themselves to him for it, yet on them he will have no mercy, and "will shew them no favour."

Secondly. Here is a great deal of mercy mixed with this judgment; for there are good people mixed with those that are corrupt and degenerate; a remnant according to the election of grace, on whom God will have mercy, and to whom he will shew favour; and these promises seem to point at all the calamities of the church, to which God would graciously provide these allays.

1. Though they shall be smitten and slain, yet not to that degree, and in that manner, that their enemies shall be smitten and slain; ver. 7, God hath smitten Jacob and Israel, and he is slain. Many of them "that understand among the people," yet "shall fall by the sword and by flame many days," Dan. xi. 33; but it shall not be as those are smitten and slain, 1st. That smote him formerly, that were the rod of God's anger and the staff in his hand, which he made use of for the correction of his people, and to whose turn it shall come to be reckoned with even for that. The child is spared, but the rod is burned. 2nd. That shall afterwards be slain by him, when he shall get the dominion, and repay them in their own coin; or, slain for his sake in the pleading of his cause. God's people and God's enemies are here represented, First. As struggling with each other; so the seed of the woman, and the seed of the serpent have been, are, and will be. In this contest there are slain on both sides. God makes use of wicked men, not only to smite, but slay his people; for they are his sword, Ps. xvii. 13; but when the cup of trembling comes to be put into their hand, it will be much worse with them than ever it was with God's people in their greatest straits. The seed of the woman has only his heel bruised, but the serpent hath his head crushed and broken. Note, Though God's persecuted people may be great losers, and great sufferers for a while, yet they that oppress them will prove to be greater losers, and greater sufferers at last, here or hereafter; for God will render double to them, Rev. xviii. 6. Secondly. As sharing together in the calamities of this present time. They are both smitten, both slain, and both by the hand of God; for there is "one event to the righteous and to the wicked;" but is Jacob smitten as his enemies are? No, by no means; to him the property is altered, and it becomes quite another thing. Note, However it may seem to us, there is really a vast difference between the afflictions and deaths of good people and the afflictions and deaths of wicked people.

2. Though God will debate with them, yet it shall be in measure; and the affliction shall be mitigated and moderated, and proportioned to their strength, not to their deserts, ver. 8. He will deal out afflictions to them, as the wise physician prescribes medicines to his patient, just such a quantity of each ingredient, or orders how much blood shall be taken when he breathes a vein; thus God orders the troubles of his people, not "suffering them to be tempted above what they are able," 1 Cor. x. 13. He measures out their afflictions by a little at a time, that they may not be "pressed above measure;" for he knows their frame, and corrects in judgment, and doth not stir up all his wrath. When the affliction is shooting forth, when he is sending it out and giving it its commission, then he debates in measure, and not in extremity. He considers what we can bear, then when he begins to correct; and when he proceeds in his controversy, so that it is "the day of his east wind," which is not only blustering and noisy, but blasting and noxious; yet he "stayeth his rough wind," checks it, and sets bounds to it, doth not suffer it to blow so hard as it was feared; when he is winnowing his corn, it is with a gentle gale, that shall only blow away the chaff, but not the good corn. God hath the winds at his command, and every affliction under his check; "Hitherto it shall go, but no farther." Let us not despair when things are at the worst; be the winds never so rough, never so high, God can say unto them, "Peace, be still."

3. Though God will afflict them, yet he will make their afflictions to work for the good of their souls, and correct them as the father doth the child, to drive out the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts; ver. 9, "By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged." This is the design of the affliction, to this it is adapted as a proper means; and by the grace of God working with it it shall have this blessed effect. It shall mortify the habits of sin; by this those defilements of the soul shall be purged away; it shall break them off from the practice of it; "This is all the fruit." This is it that God intends; this is all the harm that it will do them, to take away their sin, than which they could not have a greater kindness done them, though it be at the expense of an affliction. Therefore, because the affliction is mitigated and moderated, and the rough wind stayed, therefore we may conclude that he designs their reformation, not their destruction; and, because he deals thus gently with us, we should therefore study to answer his ends in afflicting us. The particular sin which the affliction was intended to cure them of was the sin of idolatry, the sin which did most easily beset that people, and to which they were strangely addicted. Ephraim is joined to idols; but by the captivity in Babylon they were not only weaned from this sin, but set against it; "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Jacob then hath his sin taken away, his beloved sin, "when he maketh all the stones of the altar," of his idolatrous altar, the stones of which were precious and sacred to him, "as chalk-stones that are beaten in sunder;" he not only hath them in contempt, and values them no more than chalk-stones, but he conceives an indignation at them, and in a holy revenge beats them asunder as easily as chalk-stones are broken to pieces. "The groves and the images shall not stand" before this penitent; but they shall be thrown down too, never to be set up again. This was according to the law for the demolishing and destroying of all the monuments of idolatry, Deu. vii. 5; and according to this promise, since the captivity in Babylon, no people in the world have such a rooted aversion to idols and idolatry as the people of the Jews. Note, The design of affliction is to part between us and sin, especially that which has been our own iniquity; and then it appears that the affliction hath done us good, when we keep at a distance from the occasions of sin, and use all needful precautions that we may not only not relapse into it, but not so much as be tempted to it, Ps. cxix. 67.

4. Though Jerusalem shall be desolate and forsaken for a time, yet there will come a day when its scattered friends shall resort to it again out of all the countries whither they were dispersed, ver. 12, 13; though the body of the nation is abandoned as a people of "no understanding," yet those that are indeed children of Israel shall be gathered together again, as the sheep of the flock, when the shepherds that scattered them are reckoned with, Eze. xxxiv. 10—12. Now observe concerning these scattered Israelites, 1st. From whence they shall be fetched. The Lord shall beat them off as fruit from the tree, or beat them out as corn out of the ear; he shall find them out, and separate them from those whom they dwell among, and with whom they seemed to be incorporated, "from the channel of the river" Euphrates, north-east, unto Nile "the stream of Egypt," which lay south-west. Those that were driven into the land of Assyria, and were captives there in the land of their enemies, where they were ready to perish for want of necessaries, and ready to despair of deliverance; and those that were "outcasts in the land of Egypt," whither many of those that were left behind after the captivity into Babylon went, contrary to God's express command, Jer. xliii. 6, and there lived as outcasts. God hath mercy in store for them all, and will make it appear, that though they are cast out, they are not cast off. 2nd. In what manner they shall be brought back. "Ye shall be gathered one by one," not in multitudes, not in troops forcing your way; but silently, and as it were by stealth, dropping in first one and then another. This intimates that the remnant that shall be saved consists but of few, and those saved with difficulty, and so as by fire, scarcely saved; they shall not come for company, but as God shall stir up every man's spirit. 3rd. By what means they shall be gathered together. "The great trumpet shall be blown, and" then "they shall come." Cyrus' proclamation of liberty to the captives is this great trumpet, which awakened the Jews that were asleep in their thraldom to bestir themselves. It was like the sounding of the jubilee trumpet, which published the year of release. This is applicable both to the preaching of the Gospel, by which sinners are gathered in to the grace of God,—such as were "outcasts" and "ready to perish," those that were afar off are made nigh; the Gospel proclaims the acceptable year of the Lord,—and also to the archangel's trumpet at the last day, by which saints shall be gathered to the glory of God, that lay as outcasts in their graves. 4th. For what end they shall be gathered together. To "worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem." When the captives rallied again, and returned to their own land, the chief thing they had their eye upon, and the first thing they applied themselves to, was the worship of God. The holy temple was in ruins, but they had the holy mount, "the place of the altar," Gen. xiii. 4. Liberty to worship God is the most valuable and desirable liberty; and after restraints and dispersions a free access to his house should be more welcome to us than a free access to our own houses. Those that are gathered by the sounding of the gospel trumpet are brought in to worship God, and added to the church; and the great trumpet of all will gather the saints together to "serve God day and night in his temple."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In this chapter, I. Ephraim is reproved and threatened for their pride and drunkenness, their security and sensuality, ver. 1—8. But in the midst of this here is a gracious promise of God's favour to the remnant of his people, ver. 5, 6. II. They are likewise reproved and threatened for their dulness and stupidity, and unaptness to profit by the instructions which the prophets gave them in God's name, ver. 9—13. III. The rulers of Jerusalem are reproved and threatened for their insolent contempt of God's judgments, and setting them at defiance; and, after a gracious promise of Christ and his grace, they are made to know that the vain hopes of escaping the judgments of God with which they flattered themselves would certainly deceive them, ver. 14—22. IV. All this is confirmed by a comparison borrowed from the method which the husbandman takes with his ground and grain, according to which they must expect God would proceed with his people, whom he had lately called his threshing and the corn of his floor, ch. xxi. 10, ver. 23—29. And this is written for our admonition, and is profitable for reproof and warning to us.

WOE to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim,
Whose glorious beauty is a fading flower,
Which are on the head of the fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine!
2 Behold, the Lord hath a mighty and strong one,
Which as a tempest of hail and a destroying storm,
As a flood of mighty waters overflowing,
Shall cast down to the earth with the hand.
3 The crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim,
Shall be trodden under feet: [valley,
4 And the glorious beauty, which is on the head of the fat
Shall be a fading flower, and as the hasty fruit before the summer; which Samaria stood. This hill rises in the midst of a broad vale, which it overlooks on every side, the vale itself being surrounded by hills.

xxviii. 2—4. The fall of Samaria is here predicted. The means by which it shall fall are not stated, but the overthrow is to be violent and complete. "The hasty fruit" is an early fig.

xxviii. 5, 6. Some will not be involved in the threatened ruin; there will be a residue whom the Lord will protect and bless.

xxviii. 7. This verse goes on to declare that even among those who shall be preserved there are sensual and unrighteous men.

xxviii. 9, 10. Many understand these verses as the utterances of those who are described in the two verses preceding, and who speak thus in their pride.

xxviii. 11—13. Here the prophet returns to his theme. God would use strange words to those who rejected and perverted his familiar teachings to their own hurt and ruin. It is very probable that there

Which when he that looketh upon it seeth,
While it is yet in his hand he eateth it up.
5 In that day shall the LORD of hosts be for a crown of glory,
And for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people,
6 And for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment,
And for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate.
7 But they also have erred through wine,
And through strong drink are out of the way;
The priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink,
They are swallowed up of wine,
They are out of the way through strong drink;
They err in vision, they stumble in judgment.
8 For all tables are full of vomit and filthiness,
So that there is no place clean.

Here, First. The prophet warns the kingdom of the ten tribes of the judgments that were coming upon them for their sins; which were soon after executed by the king of Assyria, who laid their country waste, and carried the people into captivity. Ephraim had his name from fruitfulness; their soil being very fertile, and the products of it abundant, and the best of the kind. They had a great many "fat valleys," ver. 1, 4; and Samaria, which was situated on a hill, was as it were "on the head of the fat valleys." Their country was rich and pleasant, and as the garden of the Lord; it was the glory of Canaan, as that was the glory of all lands. Their harvest and vintage was the glorious beauty on the head of their valleys, which were covered over with corn and vines. Now observe,

1. What an ill use they made of their plenty. What God gave them to serve him with they perverted and abused by making it the food and fuel of their lusts.

1st. They were puffed up with pride by it. The goodness with which God crowned their years, which should have been to him a crown of praise, was to them a "crown of pride." They that are rich in the world are apt to be high-minded, 1 Tim. vi. 17. Their king, that wore the crown, was proud that he ruled over so rich a country; Samaria their royal city was notorious for pride. Perhaps it was usual at their festivals or revels to wear garlands made up of flowers and ears of corn, which they wore in honour of their fruitful country. Pride was a sin that generally prevailed among them; and therefore the prophet, in his name who resists the proud, boldly proclaims a "woe to the crown of pride." If those that wear crowns be proud of them, let them not think to escape this woe. What men are proud of, be it never so mean, is to them as a crown; he that is proud thinks himself as great as a king. But woe to those who thus exalt themselves, for they shall be abased; their pride is the preface to their destruction.

2nd. They indulged themselves in sensuality. Ephraim was notorious for drunkenness and excess of riot: Samaria, the head of the fat valleys, was full of those that were overcome with wine, were 'broken' with it, so the margin. See how foolishly drunkards act; and no marvel, when in the very commission of the sin they make fools and brutes of themselves. They yield, First. To be conquered by the sin. It overcomes them, and brings them into bondage, 2 Pet. ii. 19; they are led captive by it, and the captivity is the more shameful and inglorious that it is voluntary. Some of these wretched slaves have themselves owned, that there is not a greater drudgery in the world than hard drinking; they are overcome not with the wine, but with the love of it. Secondly. To be ruined by it. They are broken by wine, their constitution is broken by it, and their health ruined; they are broken in their callings and estates, and their families brought to ruin by it; their peace with God is broken, and their souls in danger of being eternally undone; and all this for the gratification of a base lust. Woe to these drunkards of Ephraim. Ministers must bring the general woes of the word home to particular places and persons. We must say, Woe to drunkards; their condition is a woful condition, their brutish pleasures are to be pitied and not envied. "They shall not inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Cor. vi. 10; the curse is in force against them, Deu. xxix. 19, 20. Nay, we must go farther, and say, Woe to the drunkards of such a place, that they may hear and fear; nay, and woe to this or that person, if he be a drunkard. There is a particular woe to the drunkards of Ephraim, for they are of God's professing people, and it worst becomes them of any other; they know better things, and therefore should give a better example. Some make the crown of pride to belong to the drunkards, and to mean the garlands with which they were crowned that got the victory in their wicked drinking matches, and drunk down the rest of the company. They were proud of their being mighty to drink wine; but woe to them who thus glory in their shame.

2. The justice of God in taking away their plenty from them, which they thus abused. Their glorious beauty, the plenty they were proud of, is but a fading flower, it is meat that perisheth. The most substantial fruits, if God blast them and blow upon them, are but fading flowers, ver. 1. God can easily take away their corn in the season thereof, Hos. ii. 9; and recover locum vastatum,—'ground that has been alienated, and run to waste;' those goods of his which they prepared for Baal. God has an officer ready to make a seizure for him, hath one at his beck, a mighty and strong one, who is able to do the business, even the king of Assyria, who shall "cast down to the earth with the hand," that is, shall easily and effectually, and with the turn of a hand, destroy all that which they are proud of, and pleased with, ver. 2. He shall throw it down to the ground, to be broken to pieces, with a strong hand, with a hand that they cannot oppose. Then "the crown of pride" and "the drunkards of Ephraim shall be trodden under foot," ver. 3; they shall lie exposed to contempt, and shall not be able to recover themselves. Drunkards, in their folly, are apt to talk proudly, and vaunt themselves most then when they most shame themselves; but they render themselves the more ridiculous by it. The beauty of their valleys, which they gloried in, will be, 1st. Like "a fading flower," as before, ver. 1. It will wither of itself, and has in itself the principles of its own corruption; it will perish in time by its own moth and rust. 2nd. Like the "hasty fruit," which as soon as it is discovered is plucked and eaten up. So the wealth of this world, besides that it is apt to decay of itself, is subject to be devoured by others, as greedily as the firstripe fruit, which is earnestly desired, Mic. vii. 1. "Thieves break through and steal." The harvest which the worldling is proud of "the hungry eateth up," Job v. 5; no sooner do they see the prey, but they catch at it, and swallow up all they can lay their hands on. It is likewise easily devoured, as that fruit which, being ripe before it is grown, is very small, and is soon eaten up; and there being little of it, and that of little worth, it is not reserved, but used presently.

Secondly. He next turns himself to the kingdom of Judah, whom he calls the "residue of his people," ver. 5; for they were but two tribes to the other ten.

1. He promiseth them God's favours, and that they should be taken under his conduct and protection, when the beauty of Ephraim shall be left exposed, to be trodden down and eaten up; ver. 5, 6, "In that day," when the Assyrian army is laying Israel waste, and Judah might think that, their neighbour's house being on fire their own was in danger,—in that day of treading down and perplexity, then God will be to the residue of his people all they need and can desire; not only to the kingdom of Judah, but to those of Israel who had kept their integrity, and probably betook themselves to the land of Judah, to be sheltered by good king Hezekiah. When the Assyrian, the mighty one, was in Israel "as a tempest of hail," noisy and battering, as "a destroying storm," bearing down all before it, especially at sea; and as a flood of waters overflowing the country, ver. 2; then, in that day, will the Lord of hosts, of all hosts, distinguish his people by peculiar favours, that have distinguished themselves by a steady and singular adherence to him; and that which they most need he will himself be to them. This very much enhanceth the worth of the promises, that God, covenanting to be to his people a God all-sufficient, undertakes to be himself all that to them that they can desire. 1st. He will put all that credit and honour upon them which is requisite not only to rescue them from contempt, but to gain them esteem and reputation. He will be to them "for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty." They that wore "the crown of pride" looked upon God's people with disdain, and trampled upon them, and they were the "song of the drunkards of Ephraim;" but God will so appear for them by his providence, as to make it evident that they have his favour towards them, and that shall be to them a "crown of glory;" for what greater glory can any people have than for God to own them as his own? And he will so appear in them by his grace, as to make it evident that they have his image renewed on them, and that shall be to them "a diadem of beauty;" for what greater beauty can any person have than the beauty of holiness? Note, Those that have God for their God have him "for a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty," for they are made to him kings and priests. 2nd. He will give them all that wisdom and grace which is necessary to the due discharge of the duty of their place. He will himself be a spirit of judgment to them that sit in judgment; the privy counsellors shall be guided by wisdom and discretion, and the judges governed by justice and equity. It is a great mercy to any people when those that are called to places of power and public trust, are qualified for their places; when those that sit in judgment have a spirit of judgment, a spirit of government. 3rd. He will give them all that courage and boldness which is requisite to carry them resolutely through the difficulties and oppositions they are like to meet with. He will be "for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate;" to the gates of the enemy whose cities they besiege, or to their own gates, when they sally out upon the enemies that besiege them. The strength of the soldiery depends as much upon God, as the wisdom of the magistracy; and where God gives both these, he is to that people a crown of glory. This may well be supposed to refer to Christ, and so the Chaldee paraphrase understands it; 'in that day shall the Messiah be a crown of glory.' Simeon calls him the "glory of his people Israel;" and he is made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, and strength.

2. He complains of the corruptions that were found among them, and the many corrupt ones; ver. 7, "But they also," many of them of Judah, "have erred through wine." There are drunkards of Jerusalem, as well as drunkards of Ephraim; and, therefore, the mercy of God is to be so much the more admired, that he has not blasted the glory of Judah, as he has done that of Ephraim. Sparing mercy is very obliging, when it is thus distinguishing. Ephraim's sins are found in Judah, and yet not Ephraim's ruins. They have erred through wine: their drinking to excess is in itself a practical error, they think to raise their fancy by it, but they ruin their judgment, and so put a cheat upon themselves; think to preserve their health by it, and help digestion, but they spoil their constitution, and hasten diseases and deaths. And it is the occasion of a great many errors in principle: their understanding is clouded, and conscience debauched by it; and, therefore, to support themselves in it, they espouse corrupt notions, and form their minds in favour of their lusts. Probably some were drawn in to worship idols by their love of the wine and strong drink which there was plenty of at their idolatrous festivals; and so they erred through wine, as Israel for love of the daughters of Moab joined themselves to Baal-peor. Three things are here observed as aggravations of this sin:

1st. That those were guilty of it whose business it was to warn others against it, and to teach them better things; and, therefore, who ought to have set a better example. "The priest and the prophet are swallowed up of wine;" their office is quite drowned and lost in it. The priests, as sacrificers, were obliged by a particular law to be temperate, Lev. x. 9; and, as rulers and magistrates, it was not for them to drink wine, Pr. xxxi. 4. The prophets were a kind of Nazarites, as appears by Am. ii. 11; and, as reprovers by office, were concerned to keep at the utmost distance from the sins they reproved in others; yet these were many of them ensnared in this sin. What! a priest, a prophet, a minister, and yet drunk! "Tell it not in Gath." Such a scandal are they to their coat.

2nd. That the consequences of it were very pernicious, not only by the ill influence of their example, but the prophet, when he was drunk, erred in vision. The false prophets plainly discovered themselves to be so when they were in drink. The priest stumbled in judgment, forgot the law, Pr. xxxi. 5; he reeled and staggered as much in the operations of his mind as in the motions of his body. What wisdom or justice can be expected from those that sacrifice reason, and virtue, and conscience, and all that is valuable, to such a base lust as the love of strong drink is? Happy art thou, O land, when thy princes eat and drink "for strength, and not for drunkenness," Eccl. x. 17.

3rd. That the disease was epidemical, and the generality of those that kept anything of a table were infected with it; "All tables are full of vomit," ver. 8. See what an odious thing the sin of drunkenness is; what an affront it is to human society. It is rude and ill-mannered enough to turn men's stomachs; for the tables where they eat their meat are filthily stained with the marks of this sin, which the sinners declare as Sodom; their "tables are full of vomit." So that the victor, instead of being proud of his crown, ought rather to be ashamed of it. It bodes ill to any people when so sottish a sin as drunkenness has become national.

9 Whom shall he teach knowledge?
And whom shall he make to understand doctrine?
Them that are weaned from the milk,
And drawn from the breasts.
10 For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; is a reference to the captivity in Babylon, where the Jews would be compelled to receive instructions from men of another language.

---

xxviii. 14. The mention of Jerusalem here shows that "the residue" of verse 5 included Judah as well as the remnant of Ephraim or Israel.

xxviii. 15. Hell means Hades, or the world of spirits, the Sheol of the Hebrews. The scorners of those days resembled their successors of our own time, in the audacity of their defiance.

xxviii. 16. In spite of their apostacy the divine kingdom should be established. That this is a Messianic prophecy is abundantly declared in the New Testament. The words "shall not make haste" mean shall not be in a state of trepidation and confusion.

xxviii. 17. The salvation of the believer shall not prevent the punishment of the disobedient, which shall be strict and severe.

xxviii. 19. The words "from the time that it goeth forth," &c., may mean "whenever" (or, as often as) the scourge comes over, it

EGYPTIAN YOUTH AT THE BREAST.—ver. 9.

Line upon line, line upon line;
Here a little, and there a little:
11 For with stammering lips and another tongue
Will he speak to this people
12 To whom he said,
This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest;
And this is the refreshing:
Yet they would not hear.
13 But the word of the LORD was unto them
Precept upon precept, precept upon precept;
Line upon line, line upon line;
Here a little, and there a little;
That they might go, and fall back ward, and be broken,
And snared, and taken.

The prophet here complains of the wretched stupidity of this people, that they were unteachable, and made no improvement of the means of grace which they enjoyed; they still continued as they were, their mistakes not rectified, their hearts not renewed, their lives not reformed. Observe,

First. What it was that their prophets and ministers designed and aimed at. It was to teach them knowledge, the knowledge of God and his will, and to make them understand doctrine, ver. 9. This is God's way of dealing with men, to enlighten men's minds first with the knowledge of his truths, and by that means to gain their affections, and bring their wills into a compliance with his laws; thus he enters in by the door, whereas the thief and robber climbs up another way.

Secondly. What method they took in pursuance of this design. They left no means untried to do them good, but taught them as children are taught; little children that are beginning to learn, that are taken from the breast to the book, ver. 9; for among the Jews it was common for mothers to nurse their children till they were three years old, and almost ready to go to school. And it is good to begin betimes with children, to teach them as they are capable the good knowledge of the Lord, and to instruct them, even when they are but newly "weaned from the milk." The prophets taught them as children are taught; for,

1. They were constant and industrious in teaching them. They took great pains with them, and with great prudence, teaching them as they needed it, and were able to bear it; ver. 10, "precept upon precept." It must be so; or, as some read it, it has been so. They have been taught as children are taught to read, by "precept upon precept," and taught to write, by "line upon line;" a little here and a little there, a little of one thing, and a little of another, that the variety of instructions might be pleasing and inviting. A little at one time, and a little at another, that they might not have their memories overcharged; a little from one prophet, and a little from another, that every one might be pleased with his friend and him he admired. Note, For our instruction in the things of God, it is requisite that we have "precept upon precept," and "line upon line;" that one precept and line should be followed, and so enforced by another. The precept of justice must be upon the precept of piety, and the precept of charity upon that of justice. Nay, we have need that the same precept and the same line should be often repeated and inculcated upon us; that we may the better understand them, and the easier recollect them when we have occasion for them. Teachers should accommodate themselves to the capacity of the learners, give them what they most need, and can best bear, and a little at a time, Deu. vi. 6, 7.

2. They courted them, and spoke them fair, ver. 12. God, by his prophets, said to them, This way that we are directing you to, and directing you in, it is the rest, and the only rest "wherewith you may cause the weary to rest, and this" will be "the refreshing" of your own souls, and will bring rest to your country from the wars and other calamities with which it has been long harassed. Note, God by his word calls us to nothing but what is really for our own advantage; for the service of God is the only true rest for those that are weary of the service of sin, and there is no refreshing but under the easy yoke of the Lord Jesus.

Thirdly. What little effect all this had upon the people; they were as unapt to learn as young children newly "weaned from the milk," and it was as impossible to fasten any thing upon them, ver. 9. Nay, one would choose rather to teach a child of two years old than undertake to teach them; for they have not only (like such a child,) no capacity to receive what is taught them, but they are prejudiced against it. As children, they have need of milk, and cannot bear strong meat, Heb. v. 12. 1. They would not hear, ver. 12; no, not that which would be rest and refreshing to them, they had no mind to hear it. The word of God commanded their serious attention, but could not gain it; they were where it was preached, but they turned a deaf ear to it; or, as it came in at one ear it went out at the other. 2. They would not heed. It was unto them "precept upon precept," and "line upon line," ver. 13; that is, they went on in a road of external performances, they kept up the old custom of attending upon the prophet's preaching, and it was continually sounded in their ears; but that was all, it made no impression upon them. They had the letter of the precept, but no experience of the power and spirit of it; it was continually beating upon them, but it beat nothing into them. Nay, 3. It should seem they ridiculed the prophet's preaching, and bantered it. The word of the Lord was unto them Tsau latsau, kau lakau, in the original it is in rhyme; they made a song of the prophet's words, and sung it when they were merry over their wine. David was the song of the drunkards. It is great impiety, and a high affront to God, thus to make a jest of sacred things; to speak of that vainly which should make us serious.

Fourthly. How severely God would reckon with them for this.

1. He would deprive them of the privilege of plain preaching, and speak to them "with stammering lips, and another tongue," ver. 11. They that will not understand what is plain and level to their capacity, but despise it as mean and trifling, are justly amused with that which is above them. Or, God will send foreign armies among them, whose language they understand not, to lay their country waste. Those that will not hear the comfortable voice of God's word shall be made to hear the dreadful voice of his rod. Or, these words may be taken as speaking God's gracious condescension to their capacity in his dealing with them; he lisped to them in their own language, as nurses do to their children, "with stammering lips," to humour them. He changed his voice, tried first one way, and then another; the apostle quotes it as a favour, 1 Cor. xiv. 21, applying it to the gifts of tongues, and complaining that yet for all this they would not hear.

2. He would bring utter ruin upon them. By their profane contempt of God and his word they are but hastening on their own ruin, and ripening themselves for it. It is that they may "go and fall backward," may grow worse and worse, may depart farther and farther from God, and proceed from one sin to another, till they be quite "broken, and snared, and taken," and ruined, ver. 13. They have here a little and there a little of the word of God, they think it too much, and say to the seers, See not; but it proves too little to convert them, and will prove enough to condemn them. If it be not "a savour of life unto life," it will be "a savour of death unto death."

14 Wherefore hear the word of the LORD, ye scornful men,
That rule this people which is in Jerusalem.
15 Because ye have said,
We have made a covenant with death,
And with hell are we at agreement;.
When the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us:
For we have made lies our refuge,
And under falsehood have we hid ourselves:
16 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD,
Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone,
A tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation:
He that believeth shall not make haste.
17 Judgment also will I lay to the line,
And righteousness to the plummet:
And the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies,
And the waters shall overflow the hiding place.
18 And your covenant with death shall be disannulled,
And your agreement with hell shall not stand;
When the overflowing scourge shall pass through,
Then ye shall be trodden down by it.
19 From the time that it goeth forth it shall take you:
For morning by morning shall it pass over,
By day and by night:
And it shall be a vexation only to understand the report 20 For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it: [in it.
And the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself
21 For the LORD shall rise up as in mount Perazim,
He shall be wroth as in the valley of Gibeon,
That he may do his work, his strange work;
And bring to pass his act, his strange act.
22 Now therefore be ye not mockers,
Lest your bands be made strong: [tion,
For I have heard from the Lord GOD of hosts a consump-
Even determined upon the whole earth.

The prophet having reproved those that made a jest of the word of God here goes on to reprove those that made a jest of the judgments of God, and set them at defiance; for he is a jealous God, and will not suffer either his ordinances or his providences to be brought into contempt. He addresseth himself to the "scornful men" that ruled in Jerusalem, were the magistrates of the city, ver. 14. It is bad with a people when their thrones of judgment become the seats of the scornful, when rulers are scorners. But that the rulers of Jerusalem should be men of such a character is very sad; that they should make light of God's judgments, and scorn to take notice of the tokens of his displeasure. Who will be mourners in Zion if they are scorners? Observe,

First. How these scornful men lulled themselves asleep in carnal security, and even challenged God Almighty to do his worst; ver. 15, "Ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and the grave." They thought themselves as sure of their lives, even then when the most destroying judgments were abroad, as if they had made a bargain with death, upon a valuable consideration, not to come till they sent for him; or not to take them away by any violence but by old age. If we be at peace with God, and have made a covenant with him, we have in effect made a covenant with death, that it shall come in the fittest time, that whenever it comes it shall be no terror to us, nor do us any real damage. Death is ours if we be Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. 22; but to think of making death our friend, or being in league with it, while by sin we are making God our enemy, and are at war with him, is the greatest absurdity that can be. It was a fond conceit which these scorners had: "When the overflowing scourge shall pass through" our country, and others shall fall under it, yet "it shall not come unto us," not reach us, though it extend far, nor bear us down, though it is an overflowing scourge. It is the greatest folly imaginable for impenitent sinners to think that either in this world or the other they shall fare better than their neighbours. But what is the ground of their confidence shall smite you. Some understand the last clause thus: "and only to hear the report of it shall produce consternation"—the news alone will be dreadful.

xxviii. 21. The reference here will be to the events recorded in 2 Sam. v. 20, 21; 1 Chron. xiv. 11—16, viz., victories gained by David over the Philistines. (Compare Josh. x. 10.)

xxviii. 22. "A consumption," &c.—i.e., "destruction is decreed on all the land."

xxviii. 24, 25. "Is the ploughman always ploughing? always ploughing and harrowing the ground? Does he not sow as well?" The word for "fitches"—i.e., vetches, or tares—is wrongly translated. Some explain it of fennel or of dill, and Dr. Tristram says it certainly means the Nigella sativa, a small annual, the seeds of which are used for a condiment, and cultivated for that purpose. Cummin is also still cultivated in Syria. "The principal wheat" is probably to be rendered "wheat in rows." "Appointed barley" should rather be

Why truly, "we have made lies our refuge." Either, 1. Those things which the prophets told them would be lies and falsehood to them, and would deceive, but which they themselves looked upon as substantial fences. The protection of their idols, the promises which their false prophets soothed them up with, their policy, their wealth, their interest in the people; these they confided in and not in God; nay, these they confided in against God. Or, 2. Those things which should be lies and falsehood to the enemy, who was flagellum Dei,—'the scourge of God;' the "overflowing scourge;" they would secure themselves by imposing upon the enemy with their stratagems of war, or their feigned submissions in treaties of peace. The rest of the cities of Judah were taken because they made an obstinate defence; but the rulers of Jerusalem hope to play their cards better, they think themselves greater politicians than those of the country towns. They will compliment the king of Assyria with a promise to surrender their city, or to become tributaries to him, with a purpose, at the same time, to shake off his yoke as soon as the danger is over, not caring though they be "found liars" to him, as the expression is, Deu. xxxiii. 29. Note, Those put a cheat upon themselves that think to gain their point by putting cheats upon those they deal with; those that pursue their designs by trick and fraud, by mean and paltry shifts, may perhaps compass them, but cannot expect comfort in them. Honesty is the best policy. But such refuges as these are they driven to that depart from God, and throw themselves out of his protection.

Secondly. How God, by the prophet, awakens them out of this sleep, and shews them the folly of their security.

1. He tells them upon what grounds they might be secure. He doth not disturb their false confidences till he hath first shewed them a firm bottom on which they may repose themselves; ver. 16, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone." This foundation is, 1st. The promises of God in general; his word, upon which he hath caused his people to hope; his covenant with Abraham, that he will be a God to him and his. This is a foundation, a foundation stone firm and lasting, for faith to build upon; it is a tried stone, for all the saints have stayed themselves upon it, and it never failed them. 2nd. The promise of Christ in particular; for to him this is expressly applied in the New Testament, 1 Pet. ii. 6—8; he is that stone which is become "the head of the corner." The great promise of the Messiah and his kingdom, which was to begin at Jerusalem, was sufficient to make God's people easy in the worst of times; for they knew very well that till he was come the sceptre should "not depart from Judah." Zion shall continue while this foundation is yet to be laid there. "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah," for the comfort of those that dare not make lies their refuge, Behold, and look upon me as one that has undertaken to lay in Zion a stone. Jesus Christ is a foundation of God's laying; this is the Lord's doing. He is laid in Zion, in the church, in the holy hill. He is a tried stone; a trying stone, so some; a touchstone that shall distinguish betwixt true and counterfeit. He is a precious stone, for such are the foundations of the new Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 19; a "corner stone," in whom the sides of the building are united; the "head-stone of the corner." And "he that believeth" these promises, and rests upon them, "shall not make haste," shall not run to and fro in a hurry, as men at their wits' end; shall not be shifting here and there for his own safety, nor be driven to his feet by any terrors, as the wicked man is said to be, Job xviii. 11, but with a fixed heart shall quietly wait the event, saying, 'Welcome the will of God.' He "shall not make haste" in his expectations, so as to anticipate the time set in the Divine counsels; but, though it tarry, will wait the appointed hour, knowing that "he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." He that believes will not make more haste than good speed, but be satisfied that God's time is the best time, and with patience wait for it. The apostle, from the Seventy, explains this; 1 Pet. ii. 6, "He that believeth on him, shall not be confounded," his expectations shall not be frustrated, but far outdone.

2. He tells them that upon these grounds which they now built on they could not be safe, but their confidences would certainly fail them; ver. 17, "Judgment will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet." This speaks, 1st. The building up of his church. Having laid the foundation, ver. 16, he will raise the structure, as builders do, by line and plummet, Zec. iv. 10. Righteousness shall be the line, and judgment the plummet; that is, the church being founded on Christ, shall be formed and reformed by the Scripture, the standing rule of judgment and righteousness. "Judgment shall return unto righteousness," Ps. xciv. 15. Or, 2nd. The punishing of the enemies of it, against whom he will proceed in strict justice, according to the threatenings of the law. He will give them their deserts, and bring upon them the judgments they have challenged; but in wisdom too, and by an exact rule, that the tares may not be plucked up with the wheat. And when God comes thus to execute judgment, First. These scornful men will be made ashamed of their vain hopes, with which they had deluded themselves. 1*st.* They designed to make lies their refuge; but it will indeed prove a refuge of lies which "the hail shall sweep away," that "tempest of hail" spoken of ver. 2. They that make lies their refuge build upon the sand; and the building will fall when the storm comes, and bury the builder in the ruins of it. And they that make any thing their hiding-place but Christ, the waters shall overflow it; as every shelter but the ark was overtopped and overthrown by the waters of the deluge. Such is the hope of the hypocrite; this will come of all his confidences. 2*nd.* They boasted of a "covenant with death," and an "agreement with the grave;" but it shall be "disannulled," as made without his consent that has the keys and sovereign command of hell and death. Those do but delude themselves that think by any wiles to evade the judgments of God. 3*rd.* They fancied that when the "overflowing scourge" should pass through the land it should not come near them; but the prophet tells them that then, when others were falling by the common calamity, they should not only share in it, but should be trodden down by it. 'Ye shall be to it for a treading down;' it shall triumph over you as much as over any other, and you shall become its easy prey. They are farther told, ver. 19. (1.) That it shall begin with them. They shall be so far from escaping it, that they shall be the first that shall fall by it. "From the time that it goeth forth, it shall take you," as if it came on purpose to seize you. (2.) That it shall pursue them close. "Morning by morning shall it pass over;" as duly as the day returns you shall hear of some desolation or other made by it, for Divine justice will follow its blow. You shall never be safe or easy by day or by night. There shall be a pestilence walking in darkness, and a destruction wasting at noonday. (3.) That there shall be no avoiding it. The understanding of the report of its approach shall not give you any opportunity to make your escape, for there shall be no way of escape open; but it shall be only a vexation. You shall see it coming, and not see how to help yourselves. Or, the very report of it at a distance will be a terror to you; what then will the thing itself be? Evil tidings are a terror and vexation to scorners; but he whose heart is fixed, trusting in God, is not afraid of them. And when the "overflowing scourge" comes, then all their comforts and confidences fail them, ver. 20. (1st.) That in which they thought to repose themselves reacheth not to the length of their expectations. "The bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it," so that he is forced to cramp and contract himself. (2nd.) That in which they thought to shelter themselves proves insufficient to answer the intention; "the covering is narrower than that a man can wrap himself in it." Those that do not build upon Christ as their foundation, but rest in a righteousness of their own, will prove in the end thus to have deceived themselves; they can never be easy, safe, or warm; the bed is too short, the covering is too narrow; like our first parents' fig-leaves, the shame of their nakedness will still appear. Secondly. God will be glorified in the accomplishment of his counsels, ver. 21. When God comes to contend with these scorners, 1*st.* He will "do his work," and "bring to pass his act;" he will work for his own honour and glory, according to his own purpose. The work shall appear to all that see it to be the work of God, as the righteous judge of the earth. 2*nd.* He will do it now against his people, as formerly he did it against their enemies, by which his justice shall appear to be impartial. He will now rise up against Jerusalem, as in David's time against the Philistines in mount Perazim, 2 Sam. v. 20, and as in Joshua's time against the Canaanites in the valley of Gibeon. If those that profess themselves members of God's church by their pride and scornfulness make themselves like Philistines and Canaanites, they must expect to be dealt with as such. 3*rd.* This will be his strange work, his strange act, his foreign deed. It is work that he is backward to, he rather delights in shewing mercy, and doth not afflict willingly; it is work that he is not used to as to his own people, he uses to protect and favour them. It is a strange work indeed if he turn to be their enemy and fight against them, ch. lxiii. 10; it is work that all the neighbours will stand amazed at, Deu. xxix. 24; and therefore the ruins of Jerusalem are said to be an astonishment, Jer. xxv. 18.

Thirdly. Here is the use and application of all this; ver. 22, "Therefore be ye not mockers;" dare not to ridicule either the reproofs of God's word or the approaches of his judgments. Mocking the messengers of the Lord was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin. The consideration of the judgments of God that are coming upon hypocritical professors should effectually silence mockers, and make them serious. "Be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong," both the bands by which you are bound under the dominion of sin, (for there is little hopes of the conversion of mockers,) and the bands by which you are bound over to the judgments of God. God hath bands of justice strong enough to hold those that break all the bonds of his law in sunder, and cast away all his cords from them. Let not these mockers make light of Divine threatenings; for the prophet, who is one of those with whom the secret of the Lord is, assures them that the Lord God of hosts hath, in his hearing, determined a consumption upon the whole earth; and can they think to escape? or shall their unbelief invalidate the threatening?

23 Give ye ear, and hear my voice;
Hearken, and hear my speech.
24 Doth the plowman plow all day to sow?
Doth he open and break the clods of his ground?
25 When he hath made plain the face thereof, [min,
Doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cum
And cast in the principal wheat and the appointed barley
And the rie in their place?
26 For his God doth instruct him to discretion,
And doth teach him. [ment,
27 For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instru-
Neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cummin;
But the fitches are beaten out with a staff,
And the cummin with a rod.
28 Bread corn is bruised;
Because he will not ever be threshing it,
Nor break it with the wheel of his cart,
Nor bruise it with his horsemen.
29 This also cometh forth from the LORD of hosts,
Which is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working

This parable, which, as many of our Saviour's parables, is borrowed from the husbandman's calling, is ushered in with a solemn preface demanding attention; "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear," hear and understand, ver. 23.

First. The parable is here plain enough that the husbandman applies himself to the business of his calling with a great deal of pains and prudence; that he 'goes by rule' in it,—secundum artem; and, as his judgment directs him, observes a method and order in his work.

1. In his ploughing and sowing. "Doth the ploughman plough all day to sow?" Yes, he doth; and he ploughs in hope, and sows in hope, 1 Cor. ix. 10. Doth he hurl it, and "break the clods?" Yes, he doth; that it may be fit to receive the seed. "And when he has" thus "made plain the face thereof," doth he not sow his seed, seed suitable to the soil? For the husbandman knows what grain is fit for clay ground, and what for sandy ground; and accordingly he sows each in their place; 'wheat in the principal place,' so the margin reads it; for it is the principal grain, and was a staple commodity of Canaan, Eze. xxvii. 17; and barley in the appointed place. The wisdom and goodness of the God of nature is to be observed in this, that to oblige his creatures with a grateful variety of products he hath suited them to an agreeable variety of earths.

2. In his threshing, ver. 27, 28. This also he proportions to the grain that is to be threshed out. The fitches and the cummin, being easily got out of their husk or ear, are only threshed with a staff and a rod; but the bread corn requires more force, and therefore that must be bruised with a threshing instrument, a sledge shod with iron, that was drawn to and fro over it to beat out the corn. And yet he will not be ever threshing it, nor any longer than is necessary to loosen the corn from the chaff. "He will not break it" or crush it into the ground "with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it" to pieces "with his horsemen;" the grinding of it is reserved for another operation. Observe, by the way, what pains is to be taken not only for the earning but for the preparing of our necessary food; and yet, after all, it is "meat that perisheth." Shall we then grudge to labour much more for the meat which endures to everlasting life? "Bread corn is bruised;" Christ was so; "it pleased the Lord to bruise him," that he might be the bread of life to us.

Secondly. The reddition of the parable is not so plain; most interpreters make it a farther answer to those who set the judgments of God at defiance.

"barley in ground set apart for the purpose." "Rie" (or rather "rye") should be "spelt in its border."

xxviii. 26. The marginal rendering of this verse is not to be adopted; it is, "And he bindeth it in such sort as his God doth teach him."

xxviii. 27, 28. The general idea is that the means must be adapted not only to the end in view, but to the nature of the subject. A powerful threshing machine is not used for beating out the delicate seeds of fragile plants, but an ordinary stick, which does not beat them to pieces. Violent measures are reserved for those objects which require and can endure them, and even then moderation is exercised. The Hebrew is very diversely rendered, and it is difficult to give a decided version of verse 28 especially. We suggest the following:—"Corn is bruised; although one will not go on threshing it for ever, he will drive over it the wheel of his wain, but he will not bruise it with horses." Perhaps the wheel was not destructive, while the horses' hoofs were.

let them know that, as the husbandman will not be always ploughing, but will at length sow his seed, so God will not be always threatening, but will at length execute his threatenings, and bring upon sinners the judgments they have deserved; but in wisdom and in proportion to their strength; not that they may be ruined, but reformed and brought to repentance by them. But I think we may give this parable a greater latitude in the exposition of it.

1. In general, that God, who gives the husbandman this wisdom, no doubt is himself infinitely wise. It is God that "instructs the husbandman to discretion," as his God, ver. 26. Husbandmen have need of discretion wherewith to order their affairs, and ought not to undertake that business unless they do in some measure understand it; and they should, by observation and experience, endeavour to improve themselves in the knowledge of it. Since "the king himself is served of the field," the advancing of the art of husbandry is a common service to mankind more than the cultivating of most other arts. This skill of the husbandman is from God, as every good and perfect gift is. This takes off something of the weight and terror of the sentence passed on man for sin, that when God, in execution of it, sent man to till the ground, he taught him how to do it most to his advantage, else, in the greatness of his folly, he might have been for ever tilling the sand of the sea, that is, labouring to no purpose. It is he that gives men capacity for this business, and an inclination to it, and a delight in it; and if some were not by providence cut out for it, and made to rejoice, as Issachar, that tribe of husbandmen, in their tents, notwithstanding the toil and fatigue of this business, we should soon want the supports of life. If some are more discreet and judicious in managing these or any other affairs than others are, God must be acknowledged in it; and to him husbandmen must seek for direction in their business, for they, above other men, have an immediate dependence upon the Divine providence. As to the other instance of the husbandman's conduct in threshing his corn, it is said, "This also cometh forth from the Lord of hosts," ver. 29. Even the plainest dictates of sense and reason must be acknowledged to come forth from the Lord of hosts; and if it is from him that men do things wisely and discreetly, we must needs acknowledge him to be wise in counsel, and excellent in working. God's working is according to his will; he never acts against his own mind, as men often do; and there is a counsel in his whole will. He is therefore excellent in working, because he is wonderful in counsel.

2. God's church is his husbandry, 1 Cor. iii. 9. If Christ is the true vine, his Father is the husbandman, Jno. xv. 1, and he is continually, by his word and ordinances, cultivating it. "Doth the ploughman plough all day," and break the clods of his ground, that it may receive the seed? And doth not God, by his ministers, "break up the fallow ground?" Doth not the ploughman, when the ground is fitted for the seed, cast in the seed in its proper soil? He doth so; and so the great God sows his word by the hand of his ministers, Mat. xiii. 19, who are to divide the word of truth, and give every one their portion. Whatever the soil of the heart is, there is some seed or other in the word proper for it; and as the word of God, so the rod of God is thus wisely made use of. Afflictions are God's threshing instruments, designed to loosen us from the world, to part between us and our chaff, and to prepare us for use. And as to these, God will make use of them as there is occasion, but he will proportion them to our strength; they shall be no heavier than there is need. If the rod and the staff will answer the end, he will not make use of his cart-wheel and his horsemen. And where these are necessary, as for the bruising of the bread-corn,—which will not otherwise be got clean from the straw,—yet he will not be ever threshing it, will not always chide, but his anger shall "endure but for a moment;" nor will he "crush under his feet the prisoners of the earth." And herein we must acknowledge him "wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working."

CHAPTER XXIX.

This woe to Ariel, which we have in this chapter, is the same with the burthen of the valley of vision, ch. xxii. 1, and, it is very probable, points at the same event, the besieging of Jerusalem by the Assyrian army, which was cut off there by an angel, yet applicable to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and its last desolation by the Romans. Here is, I. The event itself foretold, that Jerusalem should be greatly distressed, ver. 1—4, 6; but that their enemies that distressed them should be baffled and defeated, ver. 5, 7, 8. II. A reproof to three sorts of sinners: 1. Those that were stupid, and regardless of the warnings which the prophet gave them, ver. 9—12; 2. Those that were formal and hypocritical in their religious performances, ver. 13, 14; 3. Those politicians that atheistically and profanely despised God's providence, and set up their own projects in competition with it, ver. 15—17. III. Precious promises of grace and mercy to a distinguished remnant, whom God would sanctify, and in whom he would be sanctified, when their enemies and persecutors should be cut off, ver. 18—24.

WOE to Ariel, to Ariel,
The city where David dwelt!
Add ye year to year;
Let them kill sacrifices.
2 Yet I will distress Ariel,
And there shall be heaviness and sorrow:
And it shall be unto me as Ariel.
3 And I will camp against thee round about,
And will lay siege against thee with a mount,
And I will raise forts against thee. [the ground,
4 And thou shalt be brought down, and shalt speak out of
And thy speech shall be low out of the dust,
And thy voice shall be, as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground,
And thy speech shall whisper out of the dust. [dust,
5 Moreover the multitude of thy strangers shall be like small
And the multitude of the terrible ones shall be as chaff that passeth away:
Yea, it shall be at an instant suddenly.
6 Thou shalt be visited of the LORD of hosts
With thunder, and with earthquake, and great noise,
With storm and tempest,
And the flame of devouring fire.
7 And the multitude of all the nations
That fight against Ariel, [distress her,
Even all that fight against her and her munition, and that Shall be as a dream of a night vision.
8 It shall even be
As when an hungry man dreameth, and, behold, he eateth,
But he awaketh, and his soul is empty: [drinketh;
Or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and, behold, he
But he awaketh, and, behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite:
So shall the multitude of all the nations be,
That fight against mount Zion.

ASSYRIANS BESIEGING A CITY.—ver. 3.

That it is Jerusalem which is here called Ariel is agreed, for that was "the city where David dwelt." That part of it which was called Zion was in a particular manner the city of David, in which both the temple and the palace were; but why it is so called is very uncertain. It is likely the name and the reason was then very well known. Cities as well as persons get surnames and nicknames. Ariel signifies the lion of God, or the strong lion. As the lion is king among beasts, so was Jerusalem among the cities, giving law to all about her; it was the city of the great king, Ps. xlviii. 1, 2; it was the head city of Judah, who is called a lion's whelp, Gen. xlix. 9, and whose ensign was a lion; and he that is the lion of the tribe of Judah was the glory of it. Jerusalem was a terror sometimes to the neighbour nations, and while she was a righteous city was bold as a lion. Some make Ariel to signify the altar of burnt-offerings, which devoured the beasts offered in sacrifice, as the lion doth his prey. Woe to that altar in the city where David dwelt; that was destroyed with the temple by the Chaldeans. I rather take it as a woe to Jerusalem, Jerusalem; it is repeated here as it is Mat. xxiii. 37, that it might be the more awakening. Here is,

First. The distress of Jerusalem foretold. Though Jerusalem be a strong city, as a lion, though a holy city, as a lion of God, yet if iniquity be found there, woe be to it. It was "the city where David dwelt;" it was he that brought that to it which was its glory, and which made it a type of the gospel church; and his dwelling in it was typical of Christ's residence in his church. This is mentioned as an aggravation of Jerusalem's sin, that in it was set both the testimony of Israel and the thrones of the house of David.

1. Let Jerusalem know that her external performance of religious services will not serve as an exemption from the judgments of God; ver. 1, "Add ye year to year." Go on in the road of your annual feasts: let all your males appear there three times a year before the Lord, and none empty, according to the law and custom, and let them never miss any of these solemnities; "let them kill the sacrifices," as they used to do. But as long as their lives are unreformed and their hearts unhumbled, let them not think thus to pacify an offended God, and to turn away his wrath. Note, Hypocrites may be found in a constant track of devout exercises, and treading a round in them, and with these they may flatter themselves, but can never please God or make their peace with him.

2. Let her know that God is coming forth against her in displeasure; that she "shall be visited of the Lord of hosts," ver. 6, that is, her sins shall be inquired into and punished. God will reckon for them with terrible judgments, with the frightful alarms and rueful desolations of war, which shall be like thunder and earthquakes, storms and tempests, and devouring fire, especially upon the account of the great noise. When a foreign enemy was not in the borders, but in the bowels of their country, roaring and ravaging, and laying all waste,—especially such an army as that of the Assyrians, whose commanders being so very insolent, as appears by the carriage of Rabshakeh, the common soldiers, no doubt, were much more rude,—they might see the Lord of those hosts visiting them with thunder and storm. Yet this being here said to be a great noise, perhaps it is intimated that they shall be worse frightened than hurt. Particularly,

1st. Jerusalem shall be besieged, straitly besieged. He doth not say, 'I will destroy Ariel,' but "I will distress Ariel," and she is therefore brought into distress, that being thereby awakened to repent and reform, she may not be brought to destruction; ver. 3, "I will camp against thee round about." It was the enemy's army that encamped against it; but God saith he will do it, for they are his hand, he doth it by them. God had often and long, by a host of angels, encamped for them round about them for their protection and deliverance; but now he was turned to be their enemy and fought against them. The siege laid against them was of his laying, and the forts raised against them were of his raising. Note, When men fight against us we must, in them, see God contending with us.

2nd. She shall be in grief to see the country laid waste, and all the fenced xxix. 1. Jerusalem is here called "Ariel," which is by some explained "the hearth of God," or altar, but more commonly "the lion of God." The words, "add year to year, let the festivals go round" (as Barnes translates) mean, "continue your ceremonies," the following verses showing that it would be in vain.

xxix. 3. Here, in accordance with a frequent figure of speech, God represents himself as about to do what will be done by human instrumentality. The ordinary routine of a regular siege is here described; first, the investing, and then the erection of isolated forts and ramparts of earth. The ramparts would combine entrenchments and embankments.

xxix. 4. The voice of Jerusalem in its humiliation should not be haughty and elevated, but, as it were, from the dust of the ground; and its tones should not be loud and clear, but like the mumblings of a necromancer.

xxix. 5. The numbers of the enemy would be immense, but as cities of Judah in the enemy's hand. "There shall be heaviness and sorrow," ver. 2; 'Mourning and lamentation,' so these two words are sometimes rendered. Those that are most merry and jovial, when they come to be in distress are commonly most overwhelmed with heaviness and sorrow; their laughter is then turned into mourning. All Jerusalem shall then "be unto me as Ariel," as the altar, with fire upon it, and slain victims about it. So it was when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans; and many, no doubt, were slain when it was besieged by the Assyrians. The whole city shall be an altar, in which sinners, falling by the judgments that are abroad, shall be as victims to Divine justice. Or thus, "There shall be heaviness and sorrow;" they shall repent, and reform, and return to God, and then "it shall be to me as Ariel;" Jerusalem shall be like itself, shall become to me a Jerusalem again, a holy city, ch. i. 26.

3rd. She shall be humbled, and mortified, and made submissive; ver. 4, "Thou shalt be brought down" from that height of arrogancy and insolence to which thou art come. The proud looks and the proud language shall be brought down, by one humbling providence after another. Those that despised God's judgments shall be humbled by them, for the proudest sinners shall either bend or break before him. They had talked big, had lifted up their horn on high, and had spoken with a stiff neck, Ps. lxxv. 5; but now "Thou shalt speak out of the ground, out of the dust," as one that has a familiar spirit, whispering out of the dust. This intimates that they should be faint and feeble, not able to speak up nor to say all they would say; but, as those who are sick, or whose spirits are ready to fail, their speech shall be low and interrupted. And that they should be fearful and in consternation, forced to speak low, as being afraid lest their enemies should overhear them, and take advantage against them; and that they should be tame, and obliged to submit to the conquerors. When Hezekiah submitted to the king of Assyria, saying, "I have offended; that which thou puttest on me, I will bear," 2 Kin. xviii. 14, then his speech was low, out of the dust. God can make those to sneak that have been most daring, and quite dispirit them.
